The Opera at the Academy in New York opens Monday evening. The programme for the season is unfolded by our correspondent. Among the singers of late European notoriety is CASTELLAN, whom all our concert-goers of some twelve years past will welcome back with eager interest. She has achieved a name since then. The opera, we understand, will visit Boston in December. Meanwhile the elegant and spacious Boston Theatre has put on internally a much more light and cheerful aspect, by exchanging the deep, lurid crimson color of its walls for a delicate and pleasant pink, which however has the fault of badly harmonizing with the other shades of red seen in the backs of the seats, the cushioned borders of the galleries, &c. We have seen nicely acted comedy there within a week or two. Especially Bulwer's ingenious play, called "Money", was quite artistically done in all its details (saving the absurd overdoing of the fop), and with the distinguished aid of Mr. VANDENHOFF. We are glad to see in theatricals, as well as operas, careful attention given to the whole caste of a play, and trust the manager will be rewarded. The orchestra, too, now under the direction of Mr. COMER, aided by Mr. SUCK, is larger and more efficient than has been common in our theatres. Now, all ye Muses, interpose to have RACHEL come to the Boston Theatre, and save us from the mortification of having the world's greatest actress appear in that little, dirty box, the Howard Athenæum! What is so grand a theatre for, if not for Rachel and for Grisi? And now that we have stumbled, as it were, upon theatricals, let us say that there is clever acting, on a small scale, going on just now in that same Howard Athenæum, under the management of those two excellent comedians, Messrs. FIELD & T. PLACIDE. Especially have we been touched by the natural, not overstrained, direct, manly, refined impersonations of an elder actor, who should be a model to our stage sentimentalists and ranters, Mr. J. S. BROWN. The orchestra—apparently extemporaneous enough for Nick Bottom's play—is execrable,—music of that not fabulous kind that sets one's teeth on edge!

Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS arrived by an English packet at New York last Sunday, and has rejoined her family and friends in Boston. We trust we shall soon have an opportunity of welcoming her and enjoying her fine vocal powers in public. We should rejoice to hear her in opera, but trust that opera will not claim the whole of her, since she undoubtedly possesses wherewithal greatly to enrich our oratorios and concerts, in which good music and not mere dramatic excitement is the main thing thought of.

We close to-day the sad and touching chapter of the last days of CHOPIN, from the "Memoirs" of GEORGE SAND—doubly sad from the disturbed relation of two high-minded friends of such distinguished genius. Mme. Sand's estimate of Chopin's musical genius, rare and delicate as it was, is certainly extravagant. The idea of his including in himself BACH, BEETHOVEN and WEBER is as wild as is the coupling of the third in the same trio with the two grander masters. But it is all natural and honorable to the imaginative and sympathetic subjectivity of the woman and the intimate companion.

Mlle. DE LAMOTTE, the energetic and successful teacher of the Piano-Forte, will open two new Classes during the two coming weeks. See advertisement. . . . Much complaint has been made not only that it is proposed to take RACHEL to the Howard Athenæum, instead of the Boston Theatre, but also that Monsieur Raphael Felix announces that there will be no orchestra, whereas the Courier & Enquirer remarks that the admirers of the great tragédienne in New York would count it a blessing were the orchestra to find fifteen hundred bars' rest set down for them at the conclusion of each act!

The Philadelphia papers are rapturous in their praises of the PARODI-STRAKOSCH concerts. . . . The Musical Fund Society gives its first Concert of the season there this evening, with the aid of Mlle. VESTVALI, Sig. CERESIO, the new tenor, Sig. BERNARDI, baritone, Herr SCHREIBER, cornet-player, and Mr. WILLIAM DRESSLER, pianist. The programme is miscellaneous, including the overture to "Castle of Lichtenstein" by Lindpaintner, and another, by Mendelssohn, to "The Wanderer", which we never heard of before, at least by that title; a Scherzo by Beethoven, and arias, duets, &c., from Verdi, Donizetti, Rossini, &c. The most of a musical event in Philadelphia for the week past would seem to be the dedication of the splendid new Masonic Temple, where there were very lengthy and imposing ceremonies, including various original songs and odes set to music, as well as marches by grand orchestra and choruses from the "Creation" and "Messiah", such as "Achieved is the glorious work," the "Hallelujah" and others.

Boston is made the richer musically by the return recently from Germany of our young townsman, G. W. PRATT, who has established himself as a teacher of Singing, Harmony and Counterpoint. Mr. Pratt comes from earnest studies in the best school,—the Conservatory at Leipzig,—where the true tone of musicianship prevails. He has distinguished himself there as a singer, where he has devoted himself particularly to the great vocal music of Handel, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Schubert and the like. As to method he has studied in the Garcia school, even while in Leipzig, and has since received some lessons while in London from Garcia himself. We take peculiar pleasure in welcoming a singer and a teacher of singing who has been formed in Germany; for the true old Italian school is not found necessarily in Italy (in these Verdi days) more than elsewhere, and Germany is now par excellence the land of music, where one learns to know good music, and not merely to sing; and we have heard as high an authority as Madame GOLDSCHMIDT say, that one with any true genius for song may learn as much by listening to the Symphonies of the Conservatoire, as by living in Italy, and that a singer may take useful lessons even from the violoncello. To cultivate good music is the main thing, even more than cultivating the voice. We shall have more to say on this point.

In a number of the old London Harmonicon for 1833, we chanced upon the following bit of history:

On Thursday the 20th of June, a new opera was actually produced—the first attempt of the kind this season! The occasion was Mme. PASTA's benefit: the name of the piece, Norma, a tragic opera in two acts, composed by Signor BELLINI, and got up under his personal direction.

After a sketch of the plot, the following pretty just criticism is given; only we with the experience of 1855 could inform the critic that musical din was a thing comparatively unknown in those times:

That this is an imitation of Medea is evident, and, as in that opera, Mme. PASTA is the life and soul of this. Her acting alone saves it here, as it did in Milan, where it was first produced last year.

Considered as a whole, the music, though not censurable in regard to the rules of composition, possesses the most fatal of all faults—it is deplorably uninteresting; except the motive of the duet, Deh! con te li prendi, an aria, Norma! che fu? and the finale, not a piece has the slightest pretence to originality, or produces the least effect. The overture and introduction stun one with all kinds of noisy instruments, and half or more, of the first act is accompanied by the same intolerable din. The music of the last scene, and the acting of PASTA, but especially the latter, will keep the opera on the stage while she remains to fill the part; without her, or her equal, if such should ever be found, it has no chance of being listened to in London; and even with her, it is with a half reluctance permitted.

NEW COURSE OF HARMONY, BY L. H. SOUTHARD.

The Publishers call the attention of the musical profession to this work, as one eminently calculated to lighten the labors of the teacher, and rapidly advance the pupil. It is emphatically a PRACTICAL work, serving both as a Manual of instruction on the one hand, and a Text-book on the other; and it is believed that the peculiar arrangement of the work, together with the very large number of exercises and examples, presents great advantages, to both scholar and teacher, over any similar work of the kind. Teachers highly commend the work. Mr. WILLIAM MASON says it is a work unsurpassed in the language. Mr. GEORGE J. WEBB says that it is a work perspicuous in diction, methodical in arrangement, and sufficiently copious to embrace all the essentials of the general doctrine of accord. It can be ordered through any respectable Music-seller, and will be sent through the mail on the receipt of the price, ($1.75), postage prepaid.

The Very Best now Manufactured.

J. S. D. & H. W. SMITH respectfully call the attention of the public to their IMPROVED MELODEONS, constantly on exhibition at their Warerooms,

No. 417 Washington Street,

By means of a new method of voicing, known only to themselves, they have succeeded in removing the harsh and buzzing sound which formerly characterized the instrument, rendering the tones full, clear and organ-like. The action is prompt and reliable, enabling the performer to execute the most rapid music without obscuring the tones. The swell is arranged to give great expression.

The manufacturers received the First Premium, over all competitors, at the Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association; also at the Metropolitan Mechanics' Fair, held at Washington, D. C.

For the Parlor, instruments are furnished at prices varying from $45 to $150.

Larger instruments, with two banks of keys, for chapels and small churches, from $150 to $300.

This last instrument, known as the ORGAN HARMONIUM, has been essentially improved by Messrs. Smith, and they have secured a patent therefor.

Persons who wish to hire Melodeons with a view of purchasing at the end of the year, can have the rents credited as part payment of the purchase money.

Reminiscences of a Summer Tour.

DOWN THE NECKAR TO HEIDELBERG—VIEW FROM THE KÖNIGSTUHL—STUDENTS' KNEIPES AND DUELS—OPERA OF DER FREYSCHUTZ AT MUNICH—ROYAL BRONZE FOUNDRY—THE DANUBE—BEETHOVEN'S GRAVE.

I had been stopping a day at Ludwigsburg to examine the famous Organ establishment of the Messrs. Walker, some account of which I have given in a previous chapter.

Some ten or twelve miles, by the post road, down the valley of the lovely Neckar, will bring you to Heilbronn, from which point the stream is navigable for small craft. And let no summer Rambler neglect this descent of the Neckar from Heilbronn. To traverse its entire length is not a long journey, and from its source amid the shadows of the Black Forest to where, below Heidelberg, it rushes into the joyous embrace of the Rhine, there is not a mile but is crowded with interest. Leaping upon the deck of the asthmatic little steamer that lies in waiting at Heilbronn, you are in a few moments buried in the depths of the forest. Farther down, the stream becomes narrower in its sinuous course, struggling now angrily with the hill-sides which encroach on its channel, now creeping through the silent meadows and among vineyards whose ripe grapes are reflected in its waters. Every crag and promontory here, as on the Rhine, is crowned with its castle. Midway in its course it skirts the base of a rugged mountain range.—Ruined fortifications run along the edge of its steep wooded banks. Here is seen the crumbling castle of Hornegg, in the olden time a stronghold of the Teutonic knights. Here, too, is the castle of Dauchstein and the red ruin of Minneburg. Yonder the towers of Hornberg are pictured against the sky, once the residence of Götz of the Iron Hand. At intervals along the banks the peasantry may be seen, decked out in the peculiar costume of the country, vine-dressing,—and singing the while some fragment of a harvest song. At Heidelberg you come out suddenly upon the broad, warm level of the Rhine, which at this point is so remarkable, and, in its effect on the tourist, not unlike the sensation one feels as he descends the mountain road of the Simplon into the summer fields of Italy.

Heidelberg lies stretched out a mile or more along the banks of the Neckar, under the shadow of the mountains, and, with its ancient castle and dilapidated public and private architecture and the lazy aspect of its one interminable street, reminds you of an old stager who has passed through the battle and turmoil of life, and is now resting in pensioned retirement till its close. It has the air of a city that, long ages ago, in the midst of a sturdy life, became suddenly paralyzed. And well, indeed, it may, for does not History inform us it was "five times bombarded, twice laid in ashes and thrice taken by assault and delivered over to pillage"? I took lodgings at the Prince Charles Hotel in the market place, close under the walls of the castle. Just opposite rises the steeple of the great church, which, in times past, has been witness to so many scenes of slaughter and sacrilege. Late in the night, as I lay awake in my chamber, I could hear the organ wailing forth its melancholy music.

Toiling up to the castle one evening, I encountered, among the trees in the garden, some half dozen young men wearing the garb and the aspect of students, smoking diligently, withal, and singing songs and drinking lager beer. It chanced they were recent graduates of our own Harvard University, who had come to spend a year in Heidelberg by way of finish of their collegiate course. They told me they kneiped with the Prussians, which was equivalent to saying they were at feud with all others.

This system of Kneipes is carried out to its fullest extent in Heidelberg. The students from each state or section of the country clan together and fraternize, after a manner peculiar to themselves. Under the auspices of my courier Joseph, who had himself been a student at Bonn, I visited several of these clubs. The routine of the performances is much the same in them all. It appeared mainly to consist of smoking and beer-drinking, and the singing of rollicking songs. There is, in truth, but little of music in these songs of the German students. Some one, at random, takes up the burden of a tune, and all hands roar out the chorus, in unison, with harsh unsympathetic voices, thoroughly out of tune.

By "particular request", of Joseph, I was favored with the celebrated Fox song, in which all joined and made up in lively gesticulation and stentorian shouts what was wanting in harmony. One marvels at the quantity of beer which vanishes in these sessions. Six or eight quarts to a man is no inordinate allowance. Here most of the duels originate. Harmless beer-duels the majority of them are, to be sure, but not unfrequently a savage challenge is given that must be fought out with swords. Several of these last I took occasion to witness, as representing, no less than the Kneipe, one of the peculiar institutions of the German Universities. They are fought in a hall fitted up for the purpose, on the opposite bank of the river, out of the jurisdiction of the Heidelberg authorities. With a show of mystery I was conducted to this apartment, at an early hour in the morning. On arriving at the place, my first greeting was the noise of the grinding of swords, in the court yard connected with the establishment. There was, at least, a semblance of reality about this. The hall is grimly decorated around its walls with broadswords, foils, masks and all the accoutrements of its special vocation. Much ceremony is observed in the details of the duel. Each combatant has two seconds, the duty of one of whom is to support the sword arm of his principal in the intervals of rest, and administer comfort and encouragement to his flagging spirit,—the other to defend him from some uncommonly sturdy thwack or illegal thrust of his adversary. A quarter of an hour is allowed to each pair of combatants, unless, in the meantime, one of the parties has, in the opinion of the officiating surgeon, received a sufficiently severe cut to justify the cessation of hostilities. The assailants, as also their seconds, are carefully protected at every point except the face and upper part of the chest. Against these exposed parts blows, of a prescribed form and nature, are aimed. An umpire is chosen to see fair play on both sides. I have said the theatre of these broils is in a remote and retired position. Every precaution is taken to prevent a surprise, nevertheless. Half a dozen or more sentinels are posted along the route leading to the hall. This is a permanent and standing force, and consists of a score of superannuated old women, who are detailed for duty, by squads, armed each with a red cotton umbrella, which is spread at the slightest indication of alarm. The signal given is speedily transmitted to the centre of the field of operations, and there is divesting and the removing, in hot haste, of all the forbidden paraphernalia of conflict. Three duels were "tallied off" on the morning I was present, resulting in the semi-amputation of a nose, and an ugly gash in the cheek of one of the combatants, from the blows of a vigorous adversary. Judging from my limited observations, these young Hotspurs are proud of their wounds received. I saw half a dozen of them at the railway station next morning, exhibiting, with some parade, their patched and sutured faces to the passing train.

One should not bid adieu to Heidelberg till he has climbed the steep Königstuhl, behind the town, and watched the sunset from its summit. This point of view, for grand and picturesque scenery, is unsurpassed. The silver Neckar is at your feet. Westward, extending beyond the reach of the eye, are broad and fertile plains clothed with verdure and fields of waving grain. Far away to the South is the ridge of the Black Forest, and nearer the dark valleys of the Odenwald and the summits of the Hartz mountains appear. In the distant valley gleams the Rhine, like a river of gold. The summer sun softens all and lends to the landscape a dreamy beauty.

At Munich I heard the music of Der Freyschütz with an orchestra of sixty instruments, led by Lachner. The opera was well represented in all its parts, although no rôle was prominent. Throughout the masterly instrumentation was given with accuracy and verve, and with such effect as to make one more than ever regret the reigning fashion, that would substitute the labors of Donizetti and Verdi for legitimate harmony. I doubt if this work is ever faithfully rendered out of Germany. Its goblin tale just suits the German fancy; and it is entered into with a zest that we constantly miss elsewhere. What particularly struck me was the intelligence displayed by all of the spirit and meaning of the music. The understanding between the conductor and his band was perfect. The movement of the orchestra was as that of a single instrument. Nor did this apparent unanimity and good feeling cease here. It pervaded the players and singers of every grade, as well. The first few bars satisfied me on this point; and I gave myself up unreservedly to the enjoyment of the music. And never was the beautiful overture more enjoyable. In the quartet of horns at the introduction, the tones, so rich and woody always, seemed now like the coloring of our autumnal forests.—As the composition went on to where the theme, after being wooed in turn by the several classes of instruments, is taken up con amore by all, what fellowship and fraternization of sounds were there! The audience were roused to an electric excitement, which was evinced by a universal shout of applause at the close. I can not say so much for the vocalization of that evening, but all faults of voice and of method were atoned for by the sensible attention of every one to his part, and the equable effect of all. There was no levity or indifference, or affected virtuosity and straining for a point, which, oftentimes, so mars our best operatic performances at home. The decorations and mechanism of the play were, of course, admirable, though partaking, towards the end of the piece, rather more of the infernal than is wholly congenial to our notions of taste.—In reviewing the performance, after its close, I hardly knew why it had pleased me so much. I could carry away no recollections of brilliant or striking points. I was told it was rather below the ordinary standard of the place. But it has impressed me ever since like the memory of a pleasant dream.

Next to the Opera and the Galleries of Art, with which Munich abounds, I was most eager to visit the celebrated Bronze Foundry, now under the direction of Herr Frederic Müller, the nephew of the founder of the establishment. It was here that the stupendous statue of Bavaria (sixty-one feet in height) was successfully cast. At the time of my visit the colossal statues of Jefferson and Patrick Henry, by Crawford, were being cast, fragments of which were lying about, at random, like the parts of a dissected giant. The order for the celebrated statue of Beethoven, by Crawford,—destined (by the munificence of Mr. CHARLES C. PERKINS) for the Boston Music Hall—had also just been received. All the details of the interesting process of casting in bronze, were pointed out and explained by the gentlemanly conductor of the establishment.

From Munich our route lay through an interesting country to Ratisbon, where we came upon the banks of the Danube—the “Rio Divino” of the Italian poet. It has become fashionable, of late, to compare the Danube with the Rhine, much to the detraction of the latter stream. I question, however, whether novelty is not the one feature in which the Austrian river will stand in the comparison. For the much-travelled Rhine familiarity may, in the minds of some, have bred a contempt; but to one who looks on them both with the freshness of a first acquaintance, the “Valley of Sweet Waters” must still carry off the palm. To me the Rhine-voyage is like the reading of a mellow romance of the olden time. The Danube, on the other hand, is the Carlyle of Rivers; all breaks and dashes, and abounding in rocks and whirlpools and rugged mountain defiles, which continually take your attention by storm and weary you by their constant repetition.—Grim old castles frown upon you from every crag and headland. The rapid rushing stream hurries you on at a fearful rate, giving no time for enjoyment. Grandeur—sublimity even, is its prominent characteristic, but it is a monotonous grandeur, unvaried, wild and dark. The features, most civilized in appearance and humanizing in their influence, upon its banks, are the convents or palace monasteries of the Benedictine monks, seen nowhere else in such beauty and perfection. I would fain have climbed up to them to taste the quality of the grand old organs, which are to be found, in rare excellence, in those secluded retreats.

At Vienna I made haste to inquire for the tomb of Beethoven. It was with feelings of surprise, but more of regret, that I learned neither my commissionaire, nor the driver of the fiacre, could tell in which of the three or four cemeteries, outside of the walls of the city, the remains of the great composer lay buried. Taking it at a venture, we drove at first to the wrong place, as a matter of course, where we learned that the object of our search was at Währing, a little village at the opposite side of the town. “To Währing let us go,” said I, in a mood ill befitting, I fear, the nature of my pilgrimage. The faces of both Jehu and the guide expressed, more plainly than words, their estimation of the folly of such an errand in the abstract, and at this time in particular, for it was now raining heavily and we had still some miles to compass. At the gate of the little cemetery in Währing sat a pleasant old lady, in a sort of porter’s lodge, reading. By her directions I soon found out the consecrated spot, where

I stood, I know not how long, uncovered beneath the dripping acacia trees which embower the tomb. A crowd of fancies rushed into my mind. Beneath the stone at my feet was all that remains of the great Beethoven. But a few weeks previously, I had visited the house in which he was born, in an obscure street at Bonn. Here, in equal obscurity, he rests in his last sleep. And what a life was his! From his cradle to his grave, how eventful: to the appreciation of many, how dark and unintelligible! The tomb itself, (grave it is rather) is utterly without pretension—too much so, I could not help feeling. A slab of light colored stone, without inscription, overlies the spot. There may be, and doubtless there is, a sarcophagus beneath, but it does not so appear. Placed against the wall opposite, is an obelisk or entablature of white marble, having a gilded lyre and a chrysalis for its only device. On the plane surface beneath, is this simple record:

BEETHOVEN.

There is in all this an exalted simplicity, it is true. But is it, in its plan of construction, sufficiently dignified and enduring, or in its design in keeping with the stern character of the man,—or is it altogether a worthy tribute of the proud city which is in possession of Beethoven’s grave.

I have been accustomed to regret that the ashes of the great composer were not claimed by his native city. But, after all, there is a certain fitness that, in this respect, it should be as it is. It may more accord with the last years of his sorrowful life and its gloomy close, that he should lie buried near the home of his adoption, by the dark, rushing Danube, rather than in the pleasant city of his birth, on the banks of the joyous Rhine. Much musing on these things, I was becoming oblivious of time and place, when I was roused by an interjection of wrathful impatience from the guide, following whom unresistingly I entered the carriage, and was soon rolling through the streets of Vienna to my hotel.

For Dwight’s Journal of Music.

An Evening in the Hartz.

FROM THE PRIVATE LETTERS OF MR. BROWN.

[Clearly a Fantasy Piece.]

Among the persons whom I met while making the usual foot journey through the Hartz, was a gentleman who joined our party, after leaving Blankenburg on our way through the valley of the Bode, and the villages Elend and Schirke, to the Brocken. On such journeys we easily make acquaintances, sympathy in tastes and in the objects of our travel leading to great freedom of intercourse, and making, at least for the time being, strangers quite intimate companions. I was sitting under the piazza of the little house for refreshment upon the top of the Ziegenkopf, a lofty height back of Blankenburg, looking down upon the remains of the old robber den of Reinsteins, and the beautiful open country spreading away far as vision could reach. Giving loose rein to the imagination, I was endeavoring to draw a picture of the time, when the people of Quedlinburg, no longer able to bear the insolence of the Lord of Reinsteins, came together, traders and mechanics as they were—and, donning the array of war, stormed the robber chief in his lofty den on that huge mass of sandstone and actually prevailed—right for once overcoming might. This was in 1336. The rascal was shut up in the large oaken cage, which you may still see in the town hall of Quedlinburg, and kept there nearly two years, till he purchased his freedom for 3000 thalers,—a large sum then.

It was there that the stranger joined me, and together we drew many a fantastic picture of those old times. In the course of the conversations we had during the two or three days which we employed in following the path of Faust to the Brocken, he learned that I was an American, and informed me that he had known several of my countrymen, and indeed esteemed them very highly. His acquaintance I marked, was confined mostly to our authors, though one or two painters and sculptors were not wholly unknown to him. He spoke of the author of "Arthur Mervyn," of Irving, and Cooper, of the author of "Evangeline," and especially of Hawthorne, whom he gave the highest place in the rank of our imaginative writers. Drake, author of the "Culprit Fay," he had well known, and he mentioned several American authors who had done him the honor to seek his acquaintance, but with whom he could form no intimacy. I was not a little surprised to hear him speak of men who seem to me to have lived a whole age since—such as Joel Barlow of the "Columbiad" and Dwight, who tried so hard to make an Epic of the Conquest of Canaan. He expressed no great friendship for these gentlemen, though he did them all due justice, the one as a diplomat, the other as the head of a learned institution. I must confess that I felt a little suspicious that all was not right with him, gentlemanly as he seemed, and at length ventured to ask him who he was. He smiled, and replied, as he gave me his card, "I think I am not unknown to you by reputation, though you do not recognize my person. Your remarkable countryman, Hawthorne, has done me the honor to immortalize me in one of his sketches."

His card was this:

The Man of Fancy.

It must be confessed that a more agreeable companion for a journey through the scenes of so much poetry and legend as the Hartz, could not be found, and during my intercourse with him my imagination was kept upon the stretch. We parted at the Brocken, where he had proved an invaluable acquaintance, pointing out demons and witches and all sorts of fantastic creations in the clouds, among the boulders and granite blocks about the Brocken house, in the valleys below, and in the woods of the neighboring lesser heights. My course from the celebrated scene of the Walpurgis night orgies was to the unromantic region of the mines, Goslar, Clausthal, and that section of the country; but some days later, on reaching Ilsenburg, at the opening of the romantic and legendary valley of the Ilse, I found a note left for me inviting me to be present at a meeting, where I should see many celebrated characters—a meeting in which he had a part to perform, and to which he would willingly take me, if I would call for him at such an inn on such an evening.

One of the pleasant routes for a day's ramble in the Hartz is from Ilsenburg over the mountains to Harzburg, a way not much travelled, since most pleasure-seekers go from the Brocken down through the valley of the Ilse, and thence by way of the fine post-road to the above-named place. Fortunately I reached Ilsenburg at the right time, and after rest and refreshment I called upon The Man of Fancy. It was a warm August evening, but the heat was tempered by a cool breeze from the Brocken, while the lustre of the full moon lent magic to the evening view of the little town, which lies wedged in among the low, forest-covered mountains, to borrow a figure from Longfellow, as in the mouth of a trumpet.

"Will you give this night to me?" asked the Man of Fancy.

"Willingly."

"Then we will at once start for the place of meeting, and on the way I can explain what you need to know."

I can never forget that walk! All that I had ever read of the Hartz seemed to become real as history. The bright moonbeams piercing the forest, and lying here and there upon our road in broad patches of white light; the lofty tower-like cliffs of the Ilsenstein with its iron cross, whence the witches in Faust came to the Brocken, illumined against the dark background of firs; the Ilse rushing merrily down its rocky bed, and telling queer tales of the doings up on the mountains, to all such as understand the language of running waters; the mysterious mountains themselves, in their dark robes—almost funereal in the night; the mills with their silent wheels, which stand along the little river after you leave the town; and finally the solemn silence which brooded over all as we wended our way up the valley:—all these things are a living picture to me yet. By and by we turned away from the valley of the Ilse and followed the little brook, which comes brawling down from the Scharfenstein, and which led us into the dense woods and to the top of a high ridge. Here we emerged into a broad open space, which the charcoal burners, those real as well as legendary characters of the Hartz, had laid bare of its leafy dress.

A valley falls away to the right—deep, and in the moonlight, obscure; but we avoided this, following the track of the coal waggons to the forest, which crowned the next ridge, through whose glades we passed and descended into the valley of the Ecker.

Those who go this route by day to Harzburg, or come up from that place to drink milk at the Wolken house, a mile beyond, and thence make the little excursion hither, see indeed a most lovely nook in the mountains, which a thick overshadowing wood, and a broad singing brook tumbling over the rocks in mimic cataracts, render a delicious spot for rest, after the heat of the walk. Still it is but a recess in the mountains; the very place for the melancholy Jacques to lie by the water and ruminate upon the sorrows of the wounded stag; all apart and separate from the great world without.

But I have not yet stated the object of our walk as explained by The Man of Fancy.

We were speaking of literature and literary men, especially of imaginative writers, when we emerged from the forest into the open space above mentioned. Above us, high up the slope, in the edge of the woods the fires of the charcoal burners were gleaming, and the wreaths of smoke sailed slowly away, half illumined by the moon, like the spectres of Ossian.

"Did we not know by experience," said my companion, "how light and fragile are those smoke wreaths, the eye could certainly never distinguish them from solid and tangible bodies, as they glide away from us into the recesses of the woods. And indeed, did we not know that the brilliant clouds piled up behind the mountains of a summer afternoon are but masses of mist and fog glorified by the sun's transforming touch, how could the eye learn to distinguish them from the snow-crowned peaks of the Alps, glowing or blushing in their eternal solitudes, as the day-god pours his midday splendor upon them, or just kisses them by way of morning greeting or evening good night? One is just as real to the eye, is as much a feature in the landscape, as the other. So in that world which is opened to us in books. History gives us scenes, incidents, characters in ponderous tomes, and we exhaust all the resources of the intellect and imagination in our efforts to feel them as real and tangible existences. Yet scenes, incidents, characters, which are created and illumined by genius, like mist wreaths by the sun,—which are offspring of the fancy alone,—have in our memories and hearts, and that too without effort of ours, as distinct a recognition, and a place as clearly defined.

"Is Henry the Fourth a more real character to you, Brown, than Falstaff? Bayard, the knight without fear and without reproach, more real than Don Quixote? Dr. Johnson than the Vicar of Wakefield? Alexander Selkirk, chasing goats on an island in the Pacific, than Crusoe talking with his parrot on one of the Southern West India islands 'over against the mouth of the great river Orinoco?'

I could not deny this.

"Such creations, when once genius has breathed into them the breath of life, are immortal—certainly undying so long as letters remain and human nature is unchanged. The realms of the imagination are peopled with them, their maxims are quoted in everyday life and their wisdom becomes a part of the common stock of our knowledge. They form a Republic free to all nations, and tongues, and confessions,—a republic, however, to which not every pretender can be admitted, and now-a-days the enormous increase of candidates for admission has forced upon them the necessity of caution in receiving new members to the privilege of their immortality. And this brings us to the object before us. At proper intervals, after the lapse of some half a century, or thereabouts, a proclamation goes forth for all, who have sought the distinctions of genius, to bring the offspring of their imaginations and present them for admission into the Society of the Immortals. On these occasions a sort of mass meeting of the citizens of the republic is held, a tribunal is erected, and such as pass the examination of Truth and Nature are admitted to all the rights and privileges of the community. The best you will soon see for yourself, for we are drawing near the place of our meeting."

We passed rapidly down the winding way, which led abruptly through the forest into the Ecker valley. At the base of the steep descent an impenetrable veil of gloom, like a curtain, shut us out from the mountain nook, the scene of the coming ceremonies. At a touch from the Man of Fancy, the veil opened, and the most enchanting sight met my astonished vision. Whole armies of the subjects of Oberon and Titania, with Ariel, the Genies of Eastern romance, and the Elves of Tieck, had been employed in preparing for the meeting. The Ecker, as it flowed over its rocky barriers, was hardly recognizable as the stream I had formerly seen by day, so transparent were its waters, so bright and sparkling, and so lovingly kissing mossy banks, adorned with all the flowers and sweet-scented herbs of fairy land. The valley was spread out with a delicate carpet of soft grass, from which all disagreeable intruders, spotted snakes, thorny hedgehogs, newts and blindworms and the like, had been excluded by the Fairies as from the bowers of Titania in "Midsummer Night's Dream." The trees seemed grander and more stately. The roughnesses of the soil had become thymy banks of earth and seats of moss and turf; the shrubs and tangling briars were now bowers of roses and eglantine, or formed canopies for such as would repose upon beds of roses—canopies of all that is beautiful or fragrant. The moonbeams as they penetrated the recesses of the valley were changed, so that over the whole space, that delicious light which illumines the lands of the imagination, soft, mellow, golden, roseate, rendered every object distinct to the vision as in the bright beams of mid-day.

These things I noted at a glance, for my attention was immediately absorbed by the multitude there assembled, and by a beautiful temple—a sort of Walhalla, upon a gentle rise of ground in the centre of the valley. In this edifice, a temporary structure for the occasion, were many statues of such men of lofty genius as have peopled the realms of the imagination with living and enduring inhabitants. I saw there the thin face of Cervantes, the oriental features of the Author of the "Arabian Nights," the serene features of Dante, Goethe and Schiller, Ben Johnson, Lope, Moliere, and the like. Honest tinker Bunyan had his place, Goldsmith, Mackenzie, and even Macpherson theirs. Macpherson for, think as we will of his poetic powers—in some moment of the inspiration of genius he added to the creations of fancy. I saw also with some surprise the delicate features of the little man, Mozart. I cast a look of inquiry upon the Man of Fancy. He understood my doubt, and remarked in substance, that though Da Ponte, or Beaumarchais, or whoever he was, who first gave the world the heroes whom Mozart now claims, had long been forgotten, had he not given them life and being; But the high place in the temple was filled by the statue of him, who so surpassed all that have lived and wrought in the lands of fancy, as to have no second. Above all, crowned with ever-living laurel, peerless in dignity and calm majesty of visage, with brow serene, the very throne of intellect, stood SHAKESPEARE. The great men of Greece and Rome of all antiquity, like those of modern ages, stood below him—the greatest creative genius that has done honor to mankind. Of all the creatures of the imagination here in such numbers collected, no one could claim so many as his children as the immortal Englishman. There stood Prospero with his magic wand and garment, and by his side the sweet innocence of Miranda. In a little group by themselves were the noble Merchant of Venice and his friend, Portia, and Nerissa, Lorenzo and his Jessica. Shylock stood a little apart and eyed them evilly askance. Sir Toby Belch had taken Falstaff aside, and was challenging him in a glass of something better than a good sherry sack with its twofold virtue. In every quarter I saw the children of Shakespeare.

There were many present whom I did not know, but needed not the assistance of the Man of Fancy to recognize Parson Primrose, as he conversed upon his favorite topic with his clerical brother Parson Adams. Hardly any group afforded me more satisfaction than one which occupied an arbor a little aside, consisting of Uncle Toby, who was busy explaining some operations in modern warfare to Don Quixote, who listened with evident wonder, while Dr. Slop slept in a corner. Sir Roger de Coverly was attentively listening, but I cannot say that he exhibited much interest in the topic, his eyes often wandering to a group of servants outside, among whom I recognized Corporal Trim and Sancho Panza.

The Man of Fancy directed my attention to a gentleman in a Spanish dress, rich and splendid in the extreme. This gentleman was distinguished by a beauty and nobility of mien almost above those of earth. All that one can conceive of fascination of manner and elegance of address was his. He was formed by nature to be the joy and delight of woman, and had his moral nature equalled his intellectual and physical in its perfection, the most perfect of the daughters of Eve had not been above him in worth. I needed not to be told his name. Don Juan stood before me. I knew Sinbad and Robinson Crusoe telling tales of the sea to each other. Gil Blas was recounting his visit to the archbishop to some merry Frenchmen—and so on every side I met forms and faces, the sight of which recalled in an instant and renewed the delight of years.

Weber's "Derniere Pensée."

[From the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung.]

The waltz known under the title of "Dernière Pensée de C. M. Weber," was composed by me at Vienna in 1822 (it may have been as early as 1821), and, having come into the possession, in the same year, of the firm of C. F. Peters, music-publishers at Leipzig, was, with my first trio (Op. 25) in 1824, (or at the end of 1823), printed in the collection "Valses brillantes en As," Op. 26. It is to be found in this collection of twelve waltzes in A flat. Some of these "Valses brillantes" created a sensation at the time, and I often played them at Leipzig in 1823. When Weber produced my Italian opera, Dido, in 1824, I was most hospitably received by him at his residence in Dresden, and I remember with pleasure that the great master sang me some very comic songs, and that I was called upon in the small family circle (composed only of his dear wife, Madame Caroline), to give some trifles, and among others, the waltz in question, in my turn. The waltz pleased Weber so much that I was obliged to repeat it several times. He even observed to his wife that words might be adapted to it, and sung himself the commencement thus:

"Net wahr? Du bist mein Schatzerl?"

Subsequently to this, Weber, as I afterwards heard from his wife, frequently played the waltz, to which he was very partial. It is possible that he performed it also in Paris, during his stay there in 1826, on his road to London. The rest is an affair of the music-publishers. To sum up the matter in a few words, there was in Paris a musician who wrote down the waltz, after having heard it played by Weber, and thus it appeared after his unfortunate death in London as his "Dernière Pensée." There is one point which is unintelligible to me, and that is how my old friend Pixis, who often heard the waltz played by me in Paris in 1824, could publish variations on it, and thus confirm the erroneous notion prevalent in France. I never attached any value to the trifle, and believe that, but for Weber's authority, it would never have created any sensation.

You have now a circumstantial statement of the whole matter. It was not until 1830, or later, that the firm of C. F. Peters in Leipzig gave a very short explanation, indeed, of it. Hereupon, a musical dilettante, M. Parmentier, (the same who afterwards translated into French and brought into notice several of my songs), wrote to me from Paris, and begged for a confirmation of the reports connected with the waltz. It was thus the details of the whole affair and my letter were published in the French papers.

Diary Abroad.—No. 20.

BERLIN, Sept. 5.—The man, who has undoubtedly a greater knowledge of BACH's works, than any other living, is Prof. DEHN, Musical Librarian at the Royal Library here. And this, first, because he is a Bachist from taste, and a most profound harmonist, and secondly, because he has charge of the largest existing collection of Bach's works, manuscript and printed, that exists, and it is a constant aim with him to render it complete. More than 1200 dollars worth of such works have just been added to the Bach collection, (works of Bach and his sons) from the Library of the Sing Akademie. Will it be believed that of the vocal writers of this century, he admires most highly—ROSSINI? This is so. And one day, when the conversation at the Library turned upon vocal music, I had the delight of listening to quite a lecture to some of his pupils who were there, upon the genius and extraordinary beauty of many favorite passages from the works of that fertile composer.

I say delight, for of all operatic music, which I have heard, Rossini is one of the four authors whose works have afforded the world unalloyed delight. There is a garden in the next street where I have been in the habit of going this summer, to hear light music, pot pourris, polkas, overtures and the like. The brilliancy, freshness and melodic beauty of anything which happens to come up on these occasions from Rossini, in comparison with extracts with other popular composers, is surprising. Hardly less notable is the difference in his works—those before and those after, his residence in Vienna—in the employment and development of the rich ideas which his native genius gave him so lavishly.

His feelings of respect towards the great Germans, has been shown in various ways. Prof. Dehn says that some ten years since he called upon him in Florence, and in the course of conversation asked him which of his works he himself prized most highly? The veteran counted off a number by their titles upon his fingers, and said smilingly, "Don Giovanni, by MOZART!" He seems during his stay in Vienna—and during that time I find upon examination, that he had opportunity to hear very many of the works which we call classic, from MOZART, BEETHOVEN, CHERUBINI, HAYDN, VON WEBER—to have been a diligent and attentive hearer of the German music.

In the Beethoven conversation books the talk often turns upon him, and Johann van BEETHOVEN, in one instance in particular, mentions Rossini's desire to pay the great master his respects. Schindler says that Beethoven, however, would never receive him, and adds, "I wish he had not acted thus." So do we all. Still we know that the great German, though he could hear none of the great Italian's music, and saw only two representations of one of his operas, felt and acknowledged his genius—the acknowledgement being rather in his own peculiar style—"Rossini would have been a great composer if his master had whipped him enough."

"Tell" is announced as on the operatic programme this winter here, and I look forward with no small delight, to making acquaintance with another of the great works of his later period, produced as it should be, with no little curiosity, because, just as one feels the influence of Haydn and Mozart upon each other in symphony, and the influence of them both in Beethoven's first—(possibly the second also) so the more I hear Mozart the more clearly do I feel his influence upon Rossini. The other day at the "Requiem" how many things reminded me Rossini's "Stabat Mater;" and each repetition of "Figaro" or "Don Juan," brings up vague recollections of "Moses in Egypt" and "the Barber of Seville." Had CHERUBINI had Rossini's brilliant genius or Rossini Cherubini's immense science, why may we not have had another Mozart? There is nothing at all surprising in the fact, that Mozart's works should not give as much pleasure as "The Barber," or "The Daughter of the Regiment," when so given that one has neither the author's orchestral, choral, nor scenic effects, and the work is so cut down as to render the plot—the hanging together (Zusammenhang)—unintelligible. This by the way.

Those who are familiar with Cherubini's operas say they feel the influence of these works upon Beethoven in his Fidelio, and I believe Cherubini himself admitted his indebtedness to Mozart. I know only his "Les deux journées" or "Watercarrier." This is exquisite, and one can easily conceive the impression such music would make upon the young Beethoven. It seems then the most natural thing in the world that one, who had at a very early age thrown study to the dogs, and knew that a brilliant melody or concerted piece would make all good again with an audience angry with him for serving up some piece of patchwork written in a fortnight, should have been most powerfully acted upon by the masterly instrumental music, which a Vienna residence in 1822-3 afforded him opportunity to hear.

To such as go to hear music because it amuses them alone, to such as go only to hear a beautiful song sung by some beautiful or celebrated singer, the really best music of Rossini must be of no more account than much of his poorest—and the works of his youth—setting aside all question of opera as mere drama—must be of equal excellence with the works of his manhood. Many of the most popular operas are to all intents and purposes just as good with a piano-forte to set the pitch and keep the singers right, as with an orchestra, for they are written with only the voice on the stage in view, the instrumentation being—sound, empty sound. Rossini's masterpieces are of a different order. There is nothing in them, though, of Beethoven's grandeur and majesty of conception in the expression of the deepest of emotions, for the very good reason, that Rossini had no such emotions. His path through life has been a flowery one, and he could not express what he never felt. There is no such religious feeling in his "Moses" music, or his Stabat Mater, as we find in Handel's "Israel in Egypt," or in Mozart's Requiem, for the good reason, that Handel had true deep German religious feeling of the old Lutheran order, and Mozart of the Catholic, while Rossini is thorough Italian in this respect. Now, let no admirer of Rossini cry before he is hurt—for what I say of his want of power to express dark depths of emotion, like Mozart and Beethoven, is equally true of Haydn, for as said above, one cannot express what he cannot feel. Haydn's childlike joy and happiness is always seen in his music; Rossini's brilliancy, wit, humor, cheerfulness, free and easy disposition, and high animal spirits, ever shine out in his music, as, formerly at least, in his daily walk and conversation. I believe both he and CHARLES DICKENS would have been much greater men had they both been carefully and thoroughly trained. Yet I hear the music of the one with the extreme delight with which I read the works of the other. Dickens is not SHAKESPEARE, though!

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, OCT. 6, 1855.

NEW VOLUME.—With our present number we commence the EIGHTH half-yearly VOLUME of our Journal of Music. The opening at the same time of the Musical Season of 1855-6 makes it a good time for new subscribers to commence. We trust our friends who have kept us company so far, will use a little effort to increase the company, and send us in the names of not a few new readers.

Orchestral Concerts.

The movement, of which we have once or twice hinted, is at length fairly on its feet before the public. It starts with many excellent omens of success. It is too true that we have lost BERGMANN, who, in spite of previously announced intentions and of an engagement to conduct the concerts of our Mendelssohn Choral Society, has been prevailed upon to become conductor of the Philharmonic and other concerts in the city of New York. This robs Boston of his presence during the coming season. But this was no reason for despair, as those who have taken the matter of orchestral concerts here in hand, have practically shown to be their opinion in this day's announcement. We have an excellent conductor in Mr. CARL ZERRAIN, whose exercise of that function in the concerts of the Handel and Haydn Society, and the Orchestral Union, last year, won him extensive and deserved favor.

The concerts will be commenced with every possible guaranty that they will go on and that all that is or shall be promised will be fulfilled to the letter. The names of the Managing Committee (and there are more as good who stand behind them) should satisfy all doubt of that. The orchestra will embrace all the best instrumental talent in Boston, to the number of at least fifty, who, as well as the conductor, will have every motive to do their best and work together in a true artistic spirit. The musicians are to risk nothing in a pecuniary way. They are to be secured their ordinary pay for every concert, and any profits that may at length result from a successful season are to be divided among them. Of course their interest and duty will be one.

It is to be hoped and trusted that the music-loving public also will see its interest and duty to be one toward this enterprise. For the cause of good music, that the glorious evenings of Symphony and Overture and Song, which have been hitherto the winter's joy and pride of Boston, may not fail; for the sake of remembering Beethoven and Mozart, and of encouraging our resident musicians to keep up their tone as artists by allowing them to serve us in an occupation so inspiring to themselves; for the sake of giving the rising generation as good chances as we had of knowing what the really great music is, before a false and frivolous taste shall get possession of them, as it always does where better models stand not in the way; as well as for the sake of our own musical gratification, it becomes us to sustain these concerts. It is hoped that they will be made really and widely attractive, without catering to any low standards, and without being pedantically severe. There will be some of the grand old Symphonies, by a more efficient band than we have yet known, save exceptionally. There will be the best overtures, perhaps concertos; there will be singers who are artists and who will sing good music, both solo and in quartet or chorus; and there will not be wanting bright bits of a light and graceful character by way of contrast and relief. There will be the attraction of that noble Hall, and possibly of a Beethoven and a Mozart birth-day celebration. The price of tickets, it will be seen, is low, two or three times lower than those of the Philharmonic Concerts in New York, which last year crowded Niblo's theatre from floor to ceiling.

Let all true music-lovers, then, take hold and swell the subscription lists so fast, that we may see our way not only for six, but even eight or more delightful concerts. On the public of course any solid ultimate success depends, whatever other security a concert enterprise may rest upon. Make this succeed and it may ripen into a permanent institution, the elements of which shall not have to be sought for every year anew with much pains and uncertainty.

Voice Teaching in Italy—Italian Song and German Music—Jenny Lind.

It has been considered a matter of course that every young American aspirant to the profession of a vocal artist should go to Italy. The venerable "traditions" of Italian song are allowed to outweigh and put out of sight all other artistic considerations. The career (as scholar and as debutante) in Italy, the "land of song,"—that is the thing! and that means practically the renouncing of all other kinds of music and living altogether in the practice, in the hearing and the atmosphere of the popular Italian opera of to-day. In a word it means now, more than any thing, entering the new school of VERDI, and in the end (which cometh quickly) wearing oneself out, voice and artistic conscience, in his service. We intimated in our last, in welcoming a young townsman back from the schools of Germany, where good music is thought something of, as well as singing and as what is called effect, that, because there was once a true school of song in Italy, because the one only genuine vocal school is the Italian, it by no means follows that the truest school is found there now. And really it affects us with a certain sadness, when our young singers come back "finished artists" from that Italy, to think that all that precious time and talent has been spent in simply acquiring a power to enact a few hacknied rôles in a very limited, monotonous and hacknied round of the most modern Italian operas. Acquaintance with good music, with the Shakespeares and Miltons of the Art, they have forgotten to esteem of consequence, and it is well known that to be a popular Italian prima donna or tenore it is not thought at all indispensable to be in any deep sense a musician.

We need not stop to qualify, to renew our expressions of indebtedness to Italian Art and artists. It is impossible to say every thing, and from all sides of such a subject, at once. Look for the offsets to any seeming exclusiveness in the above statements to all our articles in times past, in which we have not disguised our sincere admiration of the BOSIOS, the GRISIS, the BADIALIS, and so many more. Our purpose now is to point out the evil of the Italian one-sidedness, exclusiveness, and to complain, as we justly may, that our occasions for hearing the greatest kinds of music, our oratorios and classical concerts, suffer from the fact that our best-trained singers, those who go abroad to study, are at once monopolized by the Italian opera, become nothing but so many more Lucias and Edgardos, and lend no loyal voice to the interpretation of much higher and more satisfying, more enduring, if less fashionable kinds of music. We now wish to adduce two valuable testimonies. The first we find in the last number of the Musical Review, which translates from a German paper extracts from a private letter of MARIE WIECK, sister of the celebrated CLARA SCHUMANN, who like her sister is already an admirable pianist, and has been spending some time in Italy developing her voice. She writes from Milan:

It is surprising how many young songstresses, and often those who possess excellent voices and highly cultivated musical talents, are assembled in Milan, to pursue their studies under the tuition of Professor LAMPERTI, (one of the seven singing-masters of the Conservatoire, and agent for the Opera.) with the view of preparing themselves for the theatre, and through his influence to obtain engagements in Italy. Of course, however, to sing elegantly according to the old style, with a correct formation of the tone and voice, is now out of the question. The sole object seems to be sharp, pointed, passionate, and vehement declamation; which, to produce the most thrilling and charming effect, must be sung with a full voice, and, above all, with the most powerful muscular efforts, with wide open mouth and swelling breast, and all this at the cost of the delicate throats of the females, and at total variance with all rules of art. The natural blending of the head-voice with the register; the equality and beauty of voice; the soft and full tone; the correct delivery; the perfect piano and fine portamento, and other attributes to noble singing, as practised by Lind, Sontag, Persiani, Foder, Tadolini, and many others, are not taken into consideration. This style of singing is now seldom heard, and then by old singers, who speak only of Bellini, Donizetti, and Rossini. The youthful, vigorous singers of modern days have only one name upon their lips, and that is "Verdi." Upon his operas rests the whole art of music as well for the present time as for the future, and for this reason many, under certain circumstances, sacrifice the remains of their voices, sometimes even their health and constitution. All are ambitious only to be called "Verdi-singers," and they claim this name with vain-glorious pride.

At my arrival in Milan, the voices of the singers were in their prime; and these produced, in several pieces from the Troratore, Traviata, etc., a momentary and generally an outward effect only. Occasionally, however, they made a very deep impression. But, in a few months, I saw them fade away, and become stiff and sharp, and void of all softness. And it is for this reason, I believe, that all voices in the theatre sound fatigued, and sung out, or rather screamed out. But I must here add, that Italian female voices generally have naturally a freer, more flexible, and fuller sound than those of other countries, especially of Northern Germany.

The German elements of singing have found hitherto but little sympathy in Lombardy. They will not recognize German music, even good piano music; and German songs and operas they will not hear. The professors and their pupils call them tedious and not worth the sacrifice of voice and time upon them, without effect, as they express it. The second and third-rate singers, of whom I heard many in the theatres in Lombardy, are truly horrible, and even a bearable ensemble is entirely out of the question. They have no attraction for the public, which consents to listen to them only when the prima donna endeavors to conquer the measures of Signor Verdi.

I have attended many singing-lessons; but never have heard a professor reprove the pupil for the most severe over-exertion of the voice, or the continual gasping for breath. On the contrary, I have frequently heard them encourage it; and custom also causes them to believe it a correct method. However, the opinion we in Germany have, that the operas of Verdi are not adapted to vocalization, does not rest on a sure foundation. Well-trained and perfect singers may be able to conquer them, and produce imposing and beautiful effects, which these operas, with a discreet orchestral accompaniment, frequently afford; and I think that the Italian public, in spite of the present abominable state of musical matters, could appreciate them.

To the above we have the testimony of still higher authority to add, which is no less than

Mme. JENNY LIND GOLDSCHMIDT. The following are extracts from a private letter, which we have had for three years in our possession, and which we have hitherto refrained from making public, out of regard to the feelings of the writer, who, at that time professionally before the world, naturally wished to avoid all chance of exposing herself to misunderstanding and unpleasant feeling on the part of amateurs and artists of a school different from her own. But we are sure that no such ground for silence now exists, and at all events the good that must be done by such most timely words from such a source, is enough to plead here in extenuation of a possible breaking of the seal of confidence. We risk the sin, for it is of the letter only, not the spirit. The remarks were written, at our own suggestion, in fuller explanation of advice given to a talented young vocalist who went to Europe for improvement in her Art. We copy word for word from her own autograph, which as a piece of clear, vigorous and not ungraceful English composition, is creditable to a woman of fine intellect. The Italics are her own:

"If I might be permitted to offer a suggestion in regard to Miss —, it would be a recommendation to her not to go to Italy, as she has been advised by some friends to do. My humble opinion is, that the recently adopted method of Italian singing is not the most natural and healthy. The proof thereof is, that we see only a few singers in our days that know how to preserve their voice, having once been in Italy and there acquired the habit of forcing more sound out of their lungs than nature intended they should.

"I never went to Italy myself from that very reason. After having heard all the modern Italian singers, I was well convinced that my voice never would have been able to preserve its natural elasticity and its character of high soprano, had I undertaken to adopt the same forced style of singing as is now-a-days almost unavoidable in Italy by the frequent performances of Signor Verdi's operas. . . . His music is the most dangerous for all singing artists, and will continue so to be until the artists themselves will better understand their own interests, as well as that of the beauty of the art of singing, and refuse to sacrifice themselves to a composer, who by no means understands the exquisite beauty of the real Italian singing, that cannot be surpassed by any other nation.

"Miss — will find both in London and in Paris masters fully qualified to instruct her in all that is deemed requisite; and in the former city now lives the most distinguished singing master, Mr. Emanuel Garcia, who is in my opinion eminently qualified to understand and to develop her voice and talent.

"A year's residence in London or Paris will enable her to judge of the progress which she has made, and also the propriety of afterwards spending six months or one year in Germany, the land of real music, in which the true artist only can acquire the genuine stamp of Art. Germany offers perhaps less excellence for the singer, as a singer; for the German language is very hard to pronounce and often changes the character of the sound; for instance: the quality of tone in singing out the Italian word, Dolore, and the identic German word, Schmerz, will be found quite different in its result, and infinitely in favor of the former. But—to wish to become a good artist, with a good artistical conscience, and not know Germany and its musical masters, would indeed be as great a loss for the artist, as it would to the public, before whom he ought to wish to give a right impression.

"I know what Germany is to an artist, and, with all my veneration for the true Italian singing school,

I really believe that, unless I had taken the German music as the ground-work, my whole knowledge of Italian singing would never have satisfied me, and my musical faculties would have been undeveloped and unfruitful.

"What I therefore wish most earnestly to impress upon Miss —'s mind is, that she would try to combine Italian song and German music, the one being as necessary as the other;—that she would try to avoid false pathos, as the same law exists, to its fullest extent, in Art as in life;—that she be true to herself, try to find out the beauty of truth, as well in the simplest song as in the most difficult aria;—and the great secret will be her's,—the most powerful protector against envy and malice will be on her side."

These are words to be pondered. They are not one-sided, they are not unkind or prejudiced. Observe, the writer fully admits the paramount claims of the true Italian school, but doubts if the Italy of to-day be necessarily the right place to find it. "Italian song and German music"—there is the whole story in a nutshell. Form the voice, acquire the method, learn the pure, the natural cantabile, from the good old Italian traditions; but at the same time remember that, in this century at all events, Germany is the "land of real music," and seek to become baptized into the spirit of the great composers, the immortal HANDELS, MOZARTS and BEETHOVENS, as well as of the ROSSINIS and BELLINIS, or in these days the still more questionably exclusive spirit of the DONIZETTIS and the VERDIS.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, SEPT. 28.—Last evening Mr. BRISTOW's "Original, American Grand Opera, Rip Van Winkle," was produced for the first time by the Pyne and Harrison troupe, under his direction. In the first and third acts the libretto follows Mr. Irving's legend with but little variation; the second act is a piece of invention, in which a continental officer (Mr. HARRISON), "made up" quite like the pictures of Washington, falls in love with Alice, Rip Van Winkle's daughter (Miss LOUISA PYNE); and the usual military manoeuvres are introduced for stage effect. The opera was very well put upon the stage; the scenery and costumes were uncommonly good; and if the public verdict is worth anything, the opera was decidedly successful.

Of the libretto not much can be said, only that it is by no means as senseless and ridiculous as are most of the Italian school. Probably Longfellow or Willis would have done better, but then no one expects poets to write librettos; such drudgery is left to verse-makers. The work is not, properly speaking, a grand opera, for much of the dialogue is spoken; a shabby practice, which I hope may go out of fashion. The charm is at once broken when the actor descends to the prosaic level of talking; and the opera in fact becomes merely a play, with music interspersed. The composer evidently aimed at producing a popular, and not a classical work. The melodies are light, resembling those of Auber, sometimes reminding one of the better class of native compositions, by some miscalled Ethiopian. Simple and graceful themes, set in stirring, strongly marked rhythms, keep the public feet in motion, and the public heart bounding with delight.

However the sincere devotee to Art may regard this popular success, still, as a believer in the English opera yet to come, I rejoice even at the production of works like this, because the public will learn in time that all inspiration was not given to the Italian and Teutonic races. If we are ever to have any national operas, they must be based upon our own language; the union of intelligible, vigorous and attractive plays with kindred music.

As to the manner of performance of "Rip Van Winkle," not much can be said to Boston readers, who have heard this troupe so often. Miss Louisa Pyne was as charming as ever; her sister filled her position creditably; Mr. Harrison was execrably out of tune as usual; but the new basso, Mr. STRETTON, was if possible, worse in every respect than his illustrious chief. The sweet voice and really brilliant execution of the prima donna seemed with the audience to atone for all the sins of her associates.

Musical Chat-Chat.

Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS, after three and a half years absence from her Boston home, spent in the earnest and successful cultivation of her rich voice and artistic talent in the Old World, announces a Concert at the Music Hall this evening. We cannot doubt that she will receive the warmest welcome. Her antecedents are well known and such as to insure a deep interest in her. Her various talent, shown at an early age in the Museum theatre and elsewhere, her cheerful industry, intelligence and frank, generous nature; her remarkably rich contralto voice, self-taught at first to do good service, and afterwards, under the faithful and judicious training of Madame ARNOULT, cultivated to a point that made her a very acceptable concert-singer, all showed the capacity, under right conditions, of an artist. The warm interest of JENNY LIND, too, was enlisted, and following her advice, she studied for a year with GARCIA, who was more than satisfied with her progress. Of her subsequent successes in Italy, in the contralto rôles of Rossini's and other operas, we have all read. Miss Phillips's only regret is that circumstances did not enable her to spend also some time in Germany; but her musical studies have not been limited to one style or school of music; Garcia has taught her to know Gluck as well as Mercadante and Rossini, and her own taste is large and catholic. Should she be able to remain in her old home this winter, our higher kinds of concerts may be much enriched by her. At all events all musical Boston must be eager to listen to her voice to-night. She will have the assistance of Mr. HARRISON MILLARD and an orchestra under the direction of Mr. CARL ZERRAHN. She will sing a Rondo with variations from Meyerbeer's "Margaret of Anjon," a Barcarole by Paer (in the Venetian dialect), Rossini's Una voce, and duets from Tancredi and Il Trovatore, with Mr. Millard. The orchestra will play two overtures and other selections.

The forty nights of Italian Opera at the Academy of Music in New York, commenced on Monday with Il Trovatore, with Mme. LAGRANGE as Leonora, and Mlle. ALDIER, a new and apparently much admired mezzo-soprano, as the gipsy Azucena; the other characters were cast as last year. On Wednesday Linda was performed, with Mme. LAGRANGE, Signorina MARTINI d'ORMY and Signori BRIGNOLI, MORELLI, ROVERE and GASPARONI in the principal parts. Trovatore again last night. Meyerbeer's Huguenots and Prophète are in preparation, to be brought out with great splendor; in these Miss ELISE HENSLOR is to take part. Mr. HARRISON MILLARD will not appear at the Academy before December, and then in La Favorita. Meanwhile we are glad that Boston still retains him as a concert-singer and a teacher, and we ask attention to his card in another column.

To the foreign engagements already mentioned, (CASTELLAN, SALVIANI, and CASPIANI), the Academy has now added (if report be true) that of ROGER, who is so great in Meyerbeer's operas, at a salary of $5,000 per month. Speaking of salaries the Courier and Enquirer gives us the following authentic statement of the necessary expenses of an Italian Opera in New York, based on the arrangements of last season:

Prima Donna, per month.....	$1200 00
Do. Do. ".....	800 00
Second Do. ".....	100 00

Sweeper, Cleaners and Fireman.....	21 00

Total per week.....$1932 50

This table of expenses, it will be seen, shows a monthly outlay of $19,330; but it is still deficient in several important items, namely: the salaries of a contralto, ($800,) another tenor, ($1000,) another baritone, ($800,) a second contralto, another second tenor, and a second baritone, ($200 each,) all of which are necessary for the proper conduct of a season of Italian Opera, and which raise the expenditure to $16,530 per month, exclusive of rent, interest and insurance.

The salaries of the Prima Donna and First Tenor it will be seen are rated at $1,200 each per month; but Madame DE LAGRANGE and Signor MIRATE received last season three times that, or $3,600 each per month, raising the monthly expenditure to $21,330 per month, exclusive of rent, interest and insurance.

This statement is made the basis of an argument, and a pretty weighty one, against the demand for opera at low prices. It presents one side of the question exceedingly well, and we hope to find room for it all another time. We shall be glad also to hear the best that can be said upon the other side.

MR. BRISTOW's new American opera, "Rip Van Winkle", has had a nightly run now of a week or more, and is really a popular success. A letter from a correspondent above will be read with interest. It agrees with the general tone of criticism in the New York papers, all of which pronounce it music of a light character, but of a good deal of merit in its way. FRY, of the Tribune, goes into a five column celebration of the event, with analysis of the work, seemingly fair, and interesting, much of which we would gladly have had room to copy this week. Meanwhile we clip the following testimony from a private letter from one of the first German artists, a leading man in classical music matters in New York, whose word could not be idle flattery. He writes us: "Bristow's new opera is in point of instrumentation excellent, and there are otherwise many good things in it. The work really does an American composer credit; it is the first one of the kind which has inspired me with respect. The plot is poorly arranged and some cuts and changes in the programme of the different pieces would be desirable." We are happy, by the way, to learn that Mr. Bristow has made his peace with the Philharmonic Society and returned into the arms of the "good old mother". So should it be; let true musicians meet upon the ground of Art, and cease the foolish quarrel about native and foreign!

MR. HERMANN ECKHARDT, who announces his services in another column as a teacher in the higher branches of music, is one of our most able, thorough and intelligent musicians; familiar with all the best German Music, one of the best conductors and arrangers for orchestras that we have ever had, a composer too, in all the classical forms, and really one of the masters of his art. We trust he will find many pupils and remuneration for his services to the cause of good music in our city.

CHURCH ORGANS.

COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

WM. B. D. SIMMONS, Organ Builder,

(Heretofore doing business in the style of Wm. B. D. SIMMONS & Co.) and

GEORGE FISHER,

Of Cambridge, have this day formed a Copartnership for continuing the manufacture of Church Organs.

We design to keep in our Warehouses New Instruments for sale at prices from $400 to $1,500 each, and are prepared to build by contract at the shortest notice, Organs, worth from $600 to $12,000. And by prompt and faithful execution of orders hope to merit a like encouragement to that heretofore extended to Wm. B. D. SIMMONS, and which has indicated the necessity of this business connection, that his entire attention may be devoted to the more difficult and artistic parts of the business, so that an increase thereof may cause no diminution of the personal attention which is requisite for the maintenance of the CHARACTER of our instruments, upon which we rely for success.

While it will be our aim and ambition to furnish Organs of a PERFECTION OF TONE and MECHANISM, and OF AN ELEGANCE OF EXTERIOR UNSURPASSED, we are confident of ability to offer terms MORE FAVORABLE THAN CAN BE OBTAINED ELSEWHERE, for the following reasons: Having ample means, we can purchase in large quantities at first cost, for cash; can always command the most talented assistants, and also do sufficient business to practise division of labor, which, by assigning parts to workmen skilled in their particular branch, necessarily insures better work at less expense. Our Manufactory, by its proximity to Charles river, enables us to receive lumber direct from the vessel at first cost, and having been erected expressly for the business, is in arrangement, size, convenience and its facilities unequalled, being furnished with steam engine, steam-heated drying-house, planing, grooving, matching, moulding, tenoning, boring, and other machines, together with lathes, scroll, circular and other saws, &c., all operated by steam power.

These facilities are such as are possessed by no other manufacturer of Organs in this country, and of themselves would enable us to furnish instruments, with a fair profit, at a price which those of like quality must cost builders who have work done by hand that can be better executed at half the cost by steam machinery.

Second hand Organs at all times for sale.

Orders for tuning church organs promptly attended to, and contracts taken for tuning by the year.
Orders respectfully solicited.

FIRST PREMIUM MELODEONS, The Very Best now Manufactured.

S. D. & H. W. SMITH respectfully call the attention of the public to their IMPROVED MELODEONS, constantly on exhibition at their Warerooms,
No. 417 Washington Street.

By means of a new method of voicing, known only to themselves, they have succeeded in removing the harsh and buzzing sound which formerly characterized the instrument, rendering the tones full, clear and organ-like. The action is prompt and reliable, enabling the performer to execute the most rapid music without obscuring the tones. The swell is arranged to give great expression.

The manufacturers received the First Premium, over all competitors, at the Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association; also at the Metropolitan Mechanics' Fair, held at Washington, D. C.

For the Parlor, instruments are furnished at prices varying from $45 to $150.

Larger instruments, with two banks of keys, for chapels and small churches, from $150 to $300.

This last instrument, known as the ORGAN HARMONIUM, has been essentially improved by Messrs. Smith, and they have secured a patent therefor.

Persons who wish to hire Melodeons with a view of purchasing at the end of the year, can have the rents credited as part payment of the purchase money.

VIENNA CONTINUED—PRAGUE—THE RIVER ELBE—
HIGH MASS IN THE COURT CHURCH AT DRESDEN—CONGREGATIONAL SINGING—THE SILBERMANN OR-GANS—COLOGNE CATHEDRAL REVISITED.

Vienna holds no longer its proud preëminence as the musical metropolis of Europe. Once the chosen residence of HAYDN, GLUCK and BEETHOVEN, in this our day it is rather shunned than sought out by the masters of Music. The memory of STRAUSS is greener there than that of MOZART. At the Kärnther Thor I heard only the Lucrezia of DONIZETTI, while BALFE was, at this time, about to inaugurate his new opera in the theatre that resounded with the first strains of the Zauberflöte. But the public and private collections of Art, easily accessible at all times, are alone well worth a pilgrimage to the Austrian capital. And in the beautiful galleries of the Prince Esterházy, (that munificent patron of Art) one can, at least, recall in imagination some strains of the choice chamber music of Beethoven, to which their walls echoed in the presence of the great master, and in his palmiest days.

I was much impressed by the fine monument of the Archduchess Christina, by CANOVA, which stands in the Church of the Augustines. It is of purest white marble. A funeral train is descending into the tomb, bearing in an urn the ashes of the deceased. Following after, is an old man bowed with age and infirmity, and by his side a little child goes weeping. Sorrow, deep, earnest, almost audible, seems to pervade their very forms. As you look upon the mourning group, an irresistible melancholy comes over you like a shadow, and you grieve in sympathy.

I left Vienna by the railway at dusk. In a state between sleeping and waking, in which the music of the fifth symphony was strangely mixed up with the hideous realities of the rattling train, I passed the night, and arrived late in the morning, unrefreshed, at Prague. It was a fête day. All the Bohemian capital was in motion. The twenty-four statues on the bridge seemed the only objects bearing the semblance of life, which were at rest. Sleep was not to be thought of in the midst of such general activity, and straightway I mingled with the moving crowd. In the great church I heard the hoarse, but not unmusical, chaunting of the collected thousands of the peasant pilgrims of Bohemia. Towards evening, I strolled into the old Jewish burial-ground, on the banks of the Moldau, and found there, in the fellowship of graves of six centuries existence, that congeniality of repose I had elsewhere sought in vain.

From Prague to Dresden there is a choice of routes. That by the railway is the most direct and convenient. But the lover of rare and beautiful scenery will leave the train at Aussig, midway in his course, to make the descent of the Elbe. Here the glories of the Saxon Switzerland commence. For many miles the river runs, as in a trough, between walls of perpendicular rock and high mountains, rivalling those of the Rhine in picturesque beauty. The stream changes continually as you proceed; is serpentine and straight, by turns; now narrowed in its pent-up channel through some rocky mountain pass, now widening into a broad, placid lake like the Hudson at the Highlands. Below Schandau you pass the bold promontory of Schramstein, close under the fortified heights of Pfaffenstein, and Königstein with its impregnable fortress—against whose walls Napoleon battered in vain—thence on, through a wild country of tale-telling tradition, "the cradle of gnomes and kobolds," till, at length, near Dresden you emerge among thriving villages and cultivated fields, like the exit, on the Neckar, from the vallies of Odenwald upon the plains of the Rhine at Heidelberg. This was the fourth of the German rivers whose acquaintance I had sought; and it is worthy to take its place in that grand quartet of streams which the Rhine with the Danube and Neckar complete.

The music at High Mass in the Court church in Dresden has long been considered the finest of its kind in Germany. Nor am I disposed to dissent, in my humble judgment, from the universally accorded opinion; although, I confess, I was far more impressed by the mass in the Cathedral of Cologne. The latter performance, it is true, had all the collateral advantages of a fitting and imposing architecture, so that it is difficult, perhaps, to separate wholly what belongs to the music and what to associations and the place. And aside from the utterly tasteless architecture and tawdry decoration of its interior, there is a positive physical defect in the Dresden church, as an acoustic room; its reverberatory properties being such as to render all distinctness in articulation impossible. Hence the delicacy and artistic shading that belongs to the touching music of the mass, and in the absence of which its full effect can never be realized, is here, in a great measure, lost. Regarded as a mere musical performance, I allow the Mass in the Court church is mechanically a miracle of success. But I could not fail to notice, in the light operatic manner of the performance, a total disregard of that religious element, which the great masters have so conscientiously infused into all this class of their compositions; without which to call it sacred music is a misnomer. There was something, moreover, in the barbarian custom of disposing the male and female parts of the congregation on opposite sides of the church, like the Shakers, during the service, and the mongrel mixture of the Catholic and Lutheran form of worship, that ill disposed one to be satisfied at best.

From the Dom I went direct to the Evangelical church, the antipode of the former in every respect. Here, for the first time in my life, I heard the true Congregational Singing of Germany; the mingling of three thousand voices, led by a powerful organ, in a choral hymn. I am no Puritan in music. But the simple, solemn grandeur of that occasion, I shall not soon forget. It was like the music of the sea—all-pervading, overpowering in effect. I could, at once, appreciate the reason why we can have no Congregational Singing in America. It is, as Lowell Mason once remarked of a church in this city, where the experiment had been tried and failed, for two reasons; and the first is, there is no Congregation. He would have added, as a second reason, had it not been superfluous, that the congregation cannot sing. Hence the lamentable failure at St. Paul's, and other churches where it has been attempted here. How different in the old Lutheran temples in Germany, where the assembled people number, not unfrequently, four and five thousand, and of these all have some appreciation of music.

There are in Dresden and its vicinity some of the mellow-voiced organs of GOTTFRIED SILBERMANN,—famous builder of the last century; whose instruments, for opulence of tone and rare excellence and beauty of expression, are unsurpassed. One of these is in the Dom or Court church. The organ, from its position, and the acoustic defects (above named) of the building in which it is placed, by no means shows for what it is worth. It is not of the largest calibre or extent, but is of such intrinsic worth that, were it almost any where else, it would draw as many pilgrims to its shrine as does the rare instrument of Herr Kocher at Stuttgart, or the colossal organ at Freyburg,—and this is not the only instance where an ill-devised architecture has blurred the fair fame of a most noble instrument. It numbers 47 registers, arranged with three manuals and one pedal, as below:

I went to the opera, one evening, to hear the music of the "Midsummer Night's Dream." I was somewhat surprised to see the same orchestra, in the same force, that on the preceding day had occupied the organ loft of the church. The performances of the evening were not remarkable. As a whole, it was far below what I had heard at Munich and Frankfort. Indeed I must confess to a feeling of disappointment in the music of the Saxon capital, which I would fain attribute to the unseasonable time of my visit, and, quite likely, to my unfitness of mood, or non-appreciation, perhaps, of such as was given. It was, nevertheless, with unfeigned regret that I bade adieu to the beautiful city, and its treasures of Art, and turned my face westward once more. I left on the morning of a fine day by railway, and passing, without stopping, through the interesting cities which lay upon my route, came, at evening, to the banks of the Rhine at Cologne.

Far off, I saw again the gigantic crane on the Cathedral top, with upraised arm, as though waving a welcome for the weary pilgrim to the shrine below. I made haste to obey the summons, as soon as I could alight from the train. The majestic pile seemed to rise toward heaven as I approached. I had looked upon it for the first time a few months previously, in the opening of early day. Now, again, after many wanderings, I found myself within the charmed circle of its presence, at the coming in of night. Nor had its grandeur and the majesty of its architecture a whit diminished, after comparison with its rivals in the various cities of the continent. The old feeling of wonder and awe came over me, strengthening and confirming my convictions of its matchless power. I passed through its gloomy portals, and stood in the vastness of the space within. In the gathering darkness, the eye could not compass its bounds by roof or wall. From a dimly-lighted chapel in the distance, came the music of Vespers, in unintelligible accents, dying and swelling upon the ear, at intervals, like the summer wind. Soon it ceased altogether. The priests and the choristers passed out and left me quite alone. The whole vast building seemed in a repose the most profound. Silence reigned supreme. A sense of utter loneliness oppressed me. It was as the solitude of an Alpine mountain pass, than which there is nothing in nature more impressive. An emotion akin to fear crept over me—a spell, as of some undefined presence, warping and controlling my faculties, till I secretly gave credence to the weird influences of the place, and the legend of its supernatural origin. With an effort, at length, I threw off the incubus, and passed out into the open air. The sky was partially overcast, obscuring the stars. At the distance of a few feet, I paused to look back. The limits of the gigantic structure seemed now more ample, and, while I yet looked, to grow visibly in the uncertain light. A little further on I turned again, and saw nothing. It had wrapped itself up in the mystery of the night.

An Evening in the Hartz.

FROM THE PRIVATE LETTERS OF MR. BROWN.

But now I heard the voice of the herald, and the Man of Fancy led me back to the entrance of the charmed valley. The herald's proclamation was to the effect that half a century had passed away since the last general meeting for the naturalization of citizens in the Republic of Fancy, and this present meeting was for the purpose of receiving and deciding on applications by men of genius for the reception of their creations into the Republic, there to have and to hold, to receive and to enjoy, all and several, the rights and honors and privileges of the Immortals. "And now," ended he, "let all such as during the past half century claim to have created beings worthy to live and have their being in the enduring realm of the Imagination appear, and present their offspring at the tribunal. The Representative of Posterity sits there as judge, and Truth and Nature as his assistants."

The Tribunal was just outside the barrier and had escaped my notice as I entered—probably owing to the effect first of the gloom I had encountered, and then of the absorbing character of the view which met my eyes upon entering the enchanted circle.

To tell of the crowd of beings which suddenly seemed to fill the whole valley, as if raised by magic, would be utterly impossible. Representatives of all nations and tongues were there, bringing up to the Judge such as they hoped would pass the ordeal and keep their names alive in the field of literary fame. A crowd of bustling Frenchmen came first. There were Sue, and Paul de Kock, and George Sand, and nobody knows how many more. At most of the creatures presented by them, the Representative of Posterity smiled or frowned, and at the touch of the wands of Truth and Nature they fell into ashes or disappeared entirely. Corinne and Consuelo stood the test, and a few others of both sexes, but the number was small in comparison with the crowd who vanished like a morning mist. I was amused at a plea made to the judge by the Man of Fancy in behalf of two or three personages, whom that functionary seemed inclined to condemn as untrue to nature.

"They are true, your honor, to Frenchmen's nature," said he, "and it takes all sorts of people to make a world." The judge smiled, and it was found that they did pass the ordeal.

When Fouqué appeared with Undine, a curious question arose, whether she was to be considered as human or still a nymph of the waters. It was left to her to decide, and the beautiful creature chose the former. As human, though she had suffered beyond the power of humanity to bear, still as human had she tasted of love and happiness. Both Truth and Nature dropped a tear as she passed through the portal, where she was greeted with all a sister's affection by Ophelia and Desdemona.

Hoffmann came with Kapellmeister Kreisler, and Master Martin, and a sweet German girl with deep, loving blue eyes—they passed in at once.

It was very remarkable that from Italy, Austria, and other countries, cursed with the censorship of bigoted priestcraft and despotism, very few came to present their creations. There are many men of Genius there, said the Man of Fancy, but all traits and sentiments, which give life and reality to their creations are crushed out, and the noblest souls are allowed to present the world little more than the outward forms and masks of humanity. Had Zschokke lived South of the Alps his Alamontade would never have passed the Tribunal as he now does.

A complete report of all that took place on this remarkable occasion is of course out of the question, by any force less than a full corps of Tribune reporters. I can give a few incidents only.

Picciola, in innocent and child-like beauty, passed in, the touch of the wand of Truth but adding to the charm of her ingenuous countenance.

The most successful of all who appeared at the Tribunal in the number of his creations which stood the tests, was Scott. Yet many of his finest conceptions were excluded as being historical figures, clothed indeed, but not created by him. Waverly, Ivanhoe, Baillie Jarvie, and several others, whom I did not happen to know—not being much of a reader of Scott, with Die Vernon and Rebecca, passed in. I saw, too, old Isaac, of York, and thought to myself, a companion for Shylock at last, but Isaac would have no intercourse with him. The Judge had hardly finished the creations of Scott, when two horsemen were seen in the distance coming leisurely along the ridge from Harzburg, followed by an immense multitude of all ages and sexes.

"Heavens!" said I, "if all that crowd find admittance, there will not be room enough in the whole valley for a man to turn himself."

"Never fear," said my friend, "they all have to pass the wands of Truth and Nature."

With immense parade and ceremony, the motley crew were brought before the judge. The most casual observer could not fail to note the close family resemblance, somewhat disguised by paint, costume, and theatrical secrets. They paled and vanished one by one, until but a type or two of them all were left, and these the wand of Nature reduced by a touch to a few pieces of buckram and a small quantity of shreds, patches, paint and spangles. The originator of the "two horsemen" seemed at first a little surprised and indignant at his reception by the Representative of Posterity, but soon recovered his good humor, and collected the remains of the crowd in his handkerchief, with the remark to Cooper, who stood near, that here was material enough for as many more, who would do well enough for the present generation—and as to Posterity, what has it done for me that I should care for it?

Cooper came forward with a very confident air and intimated to the Judge and his assistants, that if they destroyed his creations in this wise, he should sue for damages. The Judge said that the extraordinary power of description and the marvellous talent for incident, which all the world gave him credit, for would be sufficient to keep his men and women long in remembrance, but only on condition of their passing the ordeal, could they hope to join the band of the Immortals.

It was indeed curious to see how creatures on which he had labored with all the powers God had given him—beings whom he seemed to cherish with more than parental fondness, fell away and crumbled into dust at the touch of the wand. One old hunter, who cast wistful glances at the forest around us, stood the test, as did also a creation in a red skin. In relation to the latter, a singular question arose, as to whether it belonged to humanity, or should go with the supernatural beings, which dwell in another part of the realm of the imagination. The Man of Fancy argued that it was a splendid creation and had found its place already in the admiration and love of the whole literary world; he admitted that it was as purely a being of the fantasy as the water and air spirits, but it had human affections and feelings, which could only find play in the company of the old hunter who had just passed in.

This view of the case prevailed, and the Indian and Leatherstocking were soon in deep converse upon some topic of natural religion.

Byron was another who brought forward a large number of candidates of both sexes, and seemed not a little enraged, when a touch of the wands showed them to be but canvass-covered frames on which he had painted himself more or less black, or daubed the features of his lascivious companions. I have always hated that man's writings, and rejoice exceedingly at the fate of his puppet Byrons and mistresses.

What a contrast! for a mild, modest, New England country clergyman appeared with a little wild creature, which he had picked up in an out-of-the-way huckleberry pasture—the most exquisite representative of a certain class of American children that imagination ever conceived. Judd's little Margaret, you may be certain, was not excluded.

Diedrich Knickerbocker begged the Judge to pass him in at once, if at all, as he thought he should be able to gather some valuable information from the old hunter, who had spent his early years in the neighborhood of Albany. As may be supposed, no difficulty or hindrance met the little old man in his passage to the Immortals.

One or two curious legal questions of possession occurred. A Spanish or gipsy dancing girl was presented by half a dozen different persons. I think Longfellow, Victor Hugo, and even Carl Maria Von Weber all claimed her.

"If," said the Judge, "it was a matter of importance to the people within, or to those whom I represent, that this question should be decided, I should certainly not give my decision but in the presence of Cervantes, for if I do not err, Preciosa must look as much to him as her creator as to any other of whatever genius. She has become a living reality, and as such passes in, and whatever claims you have to urge must be brought before some other tribunal than mine."

Another of these cases was still more curious, and of special interest to me. Some one, I do not know who, had brought forward a barber—a prattling, cunning, noisy knave, who was at once claimed by Beaumarchais as his property. It would have made little difference as to the proprietorship in the end, for the form was without life, and was rapidly fading away before the wand of Truth, when Rossini stepped up, and by a stroke of genius filled it with vigorous life. With a leer at the sober virgin, Truth, and a comical glance at the Judge, Figaro, for it was he, began in stentorian voice: Largo al factotum. He had sung but a few notes, when from within was heard the glorious: Non piu audrai from another Figaro.

"Stop, stop," cried the Judge, "this is no opera house, nor Yankee singing school," but as the two Figaros refused to stop, they were put into the custody of the herald, for contempt of court. They made him no little trouble, each contended that he was the veritable Figaro, and that he alone was the living representative of Beaumarchais' original Barber. To save time and trouble, and also as being in fact the most just course to pursue, the Man of Fancy argued that they both should be admitted among the Immor-als, as they both stood the tests of Nature and Truth; and that their reception might be considered as an application of the principle in the case of the two Dromios. The two Figaros embraced very lovingly, and I had the satisfaction of hearing them soon after entertaining Sancho Panza, the Dromios, Launce, Speed, Falstaff's boy, Corporal Trim, and several other servants and footmen who are still in the service of their masters among the Immortals.

Another case similar in principle, was that of a noble woman—one of the grandest and loveliest of creations. A Frenchman, and two or three Vienna men of literary attainments, if hardly to be called poets, claimed her. She would however, have never passed the barrier, had not Beethoven come to the rescue and endowed her with a soul so lofty, a spiritual fire so heavenly, as to render her worthy the society of Hermione, and Isabella, and Viola, those masterpieces of Shakspeare's all-creative genius. As Leonora or Fidelio, she will—she must live as long as human hearts are "touched with the concord of sweet sounds."

As to the more recent creations of genius, not much was at this time decided. Several, who had brought a troop of candidates, were advised by the Judge to wait until another assembly. A whole crowd of fashionable novelists, who persisted in presenting their heroes and heroines, had the mortification of seeing the last shred and patch disappear at a single wave of the wand of Nature. Some of them were severely reproved by the judge for their presumption in bringing such hollow works into his presence, and Lady Blessington, I recollect in particular, was told that she could gain little favor at that tribunal, for stealing an entire work from Henry Mackenzie, and tricking out his finely drawn characters in the paint and tinsel of her fashionable life.

Dickens was told that it would be a dangerous experiment for him to present many of his heroes and heroines, as the touch of Truth and Nature might not be too well borne by many of his exaggerated caricatures. He was wise enough to take advice from the Man of Fancy, and only brought forward some half a dozen personages, of whom Mr. Pickwick and Sam Weller of course were admitted as well as little Nell. Mr. Pickwick went bowing and smiling in, and a natural attraction brought him at once into the company of Uncle Toby, the Vicar of Wakefield, and their club, while Sam, as in duty bound, joined the soiree of footmen. I overheard him remark, as he cast his eye upon the stolid face of Sancho Panza—"Well you are a rum 'un!" Little Eva coming up at that moment under the care of Uncle Tom, the touches of Truth and Nature only adding to life and reality, she passed in with Nell. I do not think I ever saw anything more perfect, more angelic, than the little group soon after formed upon a bank, shaded with orange trees, where they found Mignon—Eva, Nelly and Mignon, with the dark face of Uncle Tom turned toward them, radiant with satisfaction, and Nelly's old grandfather sitting, the picture of aged happiness, by her side.

Most of Bulwer's characters await a future assembly. Pelham, the fop, entered, but seemed ill at ease in the company of the fops of the last century whom he found there.

One sweet creature I must not forget. She was one of those to whom life had been a weary waste, a time of sighing and tears, of hopes defeated and expectations cut off, of affections blighted and longings unutterable never satisfied, yet she had borne all so meekly, had borne her sad lot so heroically, that Truth held not out her wand, but kissed her and dropped a tear upon her pale cheek. Need I say that this was Evangeline? Need I speak of her reception by Helena and Hermione?

A dark looking man approached, who might have ventured to have offered several candidates for admission, but modestly presented but two—a woman of haughty, noble beauty, clouded with the weight of some awful and secret sin, and her child, than whom no elf nor mischievous fairy could have presented a more wonderful and significant face. That scarlet letter upon the breast! Hester and little Pearl. They passed in among the immortals. Little Pearl found no companion at first, but something in Eva won her confidence, and a look of extreme wonder overspread her face as she felt the strange, sweet, new influence to which she was subjected. Hester sought no one, but there was one there, who knew what the burden of sin is; and he could sympathize with her in her sorrow and abasement. He sought her out, and she soon found the blessedness of sincere sympathy in the sin-beladen Christian, the Pilgrim. She will find another friend there, for Harley, the Man of Feeling, is one of the Immortals. Hester's lot is better now than in the old Puritan days of Boston. Becky Sharp passed without difficulty, but I cannot say that her reception by the ladies was very gratifying; she soon, however, found friends enough among the gentlemen. I do not, at this moment, recollect any others of general interest who were admitted to the Republic, nor does it seem advisable to dwell upon the fate of those who were unsuccessful.

The rapidity with which the business of the occasion was transacted was a marked feature, and hardly so much time was employed in deciding the cases of hundreds as I have spent in recording these few—but then the Judge had indeed a pair of able assistants.

Thus, long before I had thought it possible, the applications ceased, and the court took a recess. For an hour the Man of Fancy and I wandered among the various groups, who were making the acquaintance of the new comers, and exhibiting a good deal of curiosity to learn the character of modern society as exhibited in their persons—for are they not the embodiment of the spirit of the age in which they live?

It may, perhaps, be of interest, if I record my observations upon a few well-known personages. Don Juan seemed not entirely at his ease in the new society in which he found himself, and indeed for characters of his type, the Republic of the Immortals must be little better than a purgatory. The curious bond between him and Leporello seemed in some degree loosed, for with the change in his circumstances, the excitement of his dare-devil life had passed away and the servant seemed glad to escape from an existence now of tedious monotony, into the society of others of his class. Donna Anna, happily, spite of Oulibicheff, did not die, but having outlived the excitement of the dark scenes in which she had been involved, became a sedate and noble dame, a worthy wife to the very respectable Spanish grandee, Don Ottavio, and a devoted mother to his children. Rather an exclusive group, the members of which did not seek any general acquaintance in the society of the Immortals, took its social tone from the courtly Sir Charles Grandison—there seemed indeed a positive unwillingness on their part to indulge in any intercourse with the children of the genius of Henry Fielding, Esq. We now visited also a more distant part of the grounds fitted up in quite another style. Here were a host of characters, the children of Eastern imagination. Truly children, for they are simple-minded, and intellectually undeveloped. Singularly uniform are they in character—humanity in its sensuous aspect. They live rather as the necessary inhabitants of a certain realm of the imagination, than as single and individual children of genius. Here I saw Ali Baba and Morgiana, Aladdin and the princess—the barber, the fisherman, and all those wondrous personages who were the delight of my childhood—and (must the truth be told?) are not unfrequently, still. Praised be the Howadj, that one no longer fears to acknowledge it. Yes, on that memorable evening I saw them! I need not specify whom I saw,—open the enchanted book—their names are all there. Better had I not seen them, for it gave me such a longing for the East, with its floods of sun, its richness of verdure, its cafés, its bearded and turbaned people, its mosques, minarets, palaces, gardens—its orientality and its romance. It almost unfitted me for the Western society in the other part of the valley—the sensuous man had really achieved the victory over the intellectual.

Of all those who properly belonged in this part of the valley, I saw only Sinbad, who sought the West; as I passed out, I found him still with Crusoe, and a third who had joined them—no less a personage than the world-renowned Gulliver—a gentleman to whom I was very heartily glad to pay my respects. He informed me that the stock, which he brought with him from Lilliput, had all died out, owing to the want of proper care and food during his subsequent long absences from home, and remarked with a sigh, that he had some difficulty in persuading people of the truth of his relations, though his statements were hardly less probable than those of the worthy gentleman with whom he was conversing. Mr. Justice Shallow passing at the moment with Cousin Slender, I could not resist the temptation to ask him if he ever received his money from Sir John Falstaff?

"By Cock and Pye, sweet Sir, not a farthing. That thousand pound was the breaking of me. One old sword and one hose and doublet were all I ever received—but the hose and doublet were cut up into clothes for a dozen of my servants."

The Man of Fancy now called me again to the tribunal, where the supernatural cases were to be decided. Fouqué brought forward a new water-spirit; Chamisso, the devil, who stole Schlemihl's shadow; Hoffman, the maidens who bewitched and bewildered the student Anselmus. Frederick Kind brought the "Wild Hunter," whom Weber endowed with life. Drake brought his "Culprit Fay," and Hawthorne, a specimen of the real old New England puritan Witch.

All these passed the proper examinations, and were declared to be real inhabitants of the realm of fantasy. There may have been two or three others, but their names have escaped me. The place of meeting for these creatures was of course the Brocken, and thither I was taken by the Man of Fancy. Here also Shakspeare was still the great creator, though Mephistopheles and the Erl King played parts by no means of very secondary consequence. I was amused to see Mephistopheles introduce the New England Witch to the witches of Macbeth, it was done with so consummate an air of impudence. This reminds me that I had seen Gretchen below, restored to her early innocence.

The company upon the Brocken was truly a strange collection, representatives of all the wild fantastic creations which have in all ages been made to people air, earth and sea, were to be seen—a pair of gorgons and chimeras dire, with cold, stony eyes; Genii from the East, goblins, cobolds, and treasure guarding dwarfs; the headless horseman; the giant of the Brocken, of course to-night at home; witches, and all those kinds of odd devils of whom David Teniers, senior and junior, have preserved the portraits. Asmodeus, no longer shut up in a bottle, hopped livelily about on his two sticks. Caliban was raging against Prospero—and would not be soothed by that d—ned witch, Sycorax. But there was a more pleasing picture. Ariel, asleep in a cowslip; the whole court of Oberon and Titania; a thousand merry elves, and fairies of every kind and degree, Naiads, Nymphs, dwellers in trees, whose lives end with the life of their dwelling place; all the sweet creatures that are invisible but real to our fancies—who are neither human, nor partakers of humanity, were there. The few moments I spent here have left but a confused impression upon my memory, nor could I enter into details without perhaps offending some.

On returning to the valley, we found the tribunal removed, and the thick veil of gloom dropped against mere mortals like myself. The Man of Fancy informed me that he had no power to conduct me further into the mysteries of the place, and indeed it must be confessed that nothing but my wish to furnish a correct report would have induced a longer stay on my part, as I was becoming well nigh exhausted by the excitement caused by the singular scenes to which I had been admitted. After catching one more glance at the beauty and splendor within, as the Man of Fancy entered, I returned to Ilsenburg, as may be supposed, very weary. Perhaps, but for this very weariness, I might the next day have viewed the whole as a mere creation of the MAN OF FANCY.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Why shall we not have an American National Song?

MR. EDITOR:—The paragraphs on the "Marseillaise," and "God save the king", in recent numbers of your Journal, prompt me to offer a few words about the Dutch national song, although there is nothing romantic or antique about it. My object in mentioning it is the hope that it may suggest a way to get at an American national song,—a song worthy of a great nation.

The old Wilhelmus van Nassau, (a kind of "Yankee Doodle," was all but forgotten and discarded; no one sang or played it, and no one cared to hear it. It is this:

Some forty years ago, an individual (General KRAAJENHOFF) offered a handsome premium for the best poem, and for the best music for a national song. The prize song (composed by WILLMS) was adopted in all the schools, and became rooted as the national song of Holland, and is as popular in Batavia as in Amsterdam. The words: Wien Neerland's bloed door d'ader'n vloeit, &c.* are inspiring, and the air is noble

* "Whosoever has Netherland's blood flowing in his veins", &c. A friend has given me the following English version of the whole poem, which is by Tollens:

If true Dutch blood flows through your veins,
Unstain'd and genuine;
If you love king and fatherland,
Then join your voice to mine.
With voices strong and glowing hearts,
We'll hallow, hand in hand,
The noble song that pleases God;
For king and fatherland.
God listens on his holy throne,
When angels sing His praise,
But also listens to the tune
Which from our lips we raise.
For, after Heaven's perfect choir,
He most likes what we sing;
A noble song from glowing hearts,
For fatherland and king.
Protect, O God! and guard the soil,
Our land so dear, so free;
The spot where once our cradle stood,
Where once our grave will be.
We beg it, Father, from Thy hand,
With moistened eye we sing—
O save! O save, our fatherland,
Our fatherland and king.

and effective, sung by masses,† yet simple and easy for children to learn. Here it is:

Why could not something of the kind be done here? Let the words be such as will inspire love for country and union, as well as a feeling of the blessings of freedom. The adoption of a national air is no such trifle as to be unworthy of the attention of the true poet or the exalted musician. The love of country,—one of the noblest feelings of our nature,—if not created, is stimulated and invigorated by an exciting air associated from infancy to manhood with all that is grand or tender in our youth and age, all that is elevating or generous in the soul, all that is warm and noble in the heart. This country is so vast that its population need every tie that can bind them together more firmly as one great people; and he will achieve no slight labor, and reap the reward of patriotism, who will prepare either song or music that will warm, purify and strengthen that lofty sentiment of patriotism which makes men heroic and women divine.

Who will undertake the words or the melody? We have had great prizes offered us for fat cattle and fine peaches; for pigs and poultry; flowers and children. Here is certainly a nobler theme for competition. Let the poets and the musicians strive for the immortality that awaits success in such an effort, and let a competent assembly of poets and musicians select the best composition of either kind and recommend it to their countrymen, and something will be achieved which, it cannot be doubted, will elevate the tone of public spirit, and give new life to that national feeling, without which national independence is a body without a soul.

Rachel in the Marseillaise.

The great tragedienne has at length yielded to the pressure of New York curiosity, and sung the hymn of the French Revolution. The Courier and Enquirer says of the event:

La Marseillaise crowned the evening. What was it? Singing? It was nothing less than it was that. A hoarse voice, broken, incapable of sustaining the melody of the simplest romance, and utter want of skill in vocalism,—such are RACHEL's gifts as a songstress. But what could melody have added to that inspired chant of Liberty? Melody would have made it a different thing; but how far from being a better! It seemed as if centuries of wrong had turned Liberty from an angel to a demon, and that she was possessed of it. She quivered and cried out as the spirit worked its will with her and made her utter its fierce hatred and fiercer hopes. Death flamed from her eye, and the frantic wave of her hand was like a call to vengeance which millions must rise and answer. The house was alternately hushed and in an uproar. Well may Frenchmen take proud delight in her delivery of this, the most, perhaps the only, purely French creation which is destined to immortality in spite of Emperors and Academies.

The New York Tribune thus describes the effect produced by her declamation of the hymn:

The fire of enthusiasm had scarcely subsided, when the curtain rose and Rachel slowly advanced to the footlights. The tricolor stood on the stage. Silence pervaded the house. In Rachel's simple white classic dress and modesty of attitude there was a touching solemnity. She gazed silently on the audience for some minutes, during which her countenance changed gradually from an expression of melancholy to one of withering scorn. Then suddenly the face was lit up with a look of terrific wrath. A glowing fire of revenge burned fiercely in her dark eyes. From the modest maiden she had sprung into the inspired goddess of liberty, inciting enslaved men to noble deeds. The opening words "Allons enfants de la patrie," she sang with deep intensity of passion, and beautiful was the touching change in the expression of her countenance from scorn to compassion, as with one hand pointing to the far distance, she chanted in slow, measured tone—"Ils viennent jusque dans vos bras égorger vos fils, &c." But her stature seemed to grow, her veins to swell with blood, as she addressed the imaginary tyrants loudly and boldly in the words—

"Tremblez, vos projets parricides Vont enfin recevoir leur prix."

She reached still higher degrees of confidence as she went on, until she expressed the most unlimited scorn of the enemy both in word and look, and as she again summed up her fiery invectives the soul-stirring appeal:

"Aux armes citoyens, Formez vos bataillons," the enthusiasm reached its height. She then walked to and fro for a moment as if overcome with a terrible sorrow, but turning round she seized the tricolor flag, and holding it high in the air, she fell on her knees addressing it with veneration in the words:

"Amour sacré de la patrie,
Conduis, soutiens nos bras vengeurs;
Liberté, liberté chérie,
Combats avec tes défenseurs."

No power of language can do justice to the enraptured adoration with which she pronounced: Liberté, liberté chérie.

We can fancy the madness of passion which such an ode chanted by such a woman must have roused in the hearts of the Paris population in the days of revolution. Here it lacked the occasion to give it effect, and did not create so high an enthusiasm as the closing scenes of Horace. It can scarcely be called a song. It is a scene of musical declamation, in which the meaning is conveyed less by power of voice than by intensity of feeling and eloquence of gesture. But whether we call it song or declamation, it is Rachel's sculptural grace and concentrated power of utterance which keeps us spell-bound.

BERLIN, SEPT. 9.—Again to the Dom. The choir is now much larger than it has been, and the little boys' voices ring out finely. The opening psalm, though, was only a chant, and one which I am tired of hearing. It would have been better to have staid away, for the emptiness of this boy music has set me to longing for the service in Antwerp or Cologne, or even in little Bonn. Just as at times I must read a play of Shakespeare, when I feel an intellectual void which nothing else can fill, so there comes a craving for the tones of a mixed choir; and although Antwerp and Cologne stand written a line or two above, any other town would do nearly as well, provided the little choir in the church would sing a good psalm tune respectably. Setting aside all religious principle, the merely religious emotional something within us, whether the result of nature or of education, craves at times to hear the expression of that something in music. In some moods the cold, stately cathedral services of the English church appeal to the feelings, as does the cold, stately Elizabethan Gothic architecture. But generally speaking, one wants more warmth, more genial feeling thrown in. This I find oftentimes in the Catholic churches—not always. Colder music I do not wish to hear than a mass by Marschner, which I heard several weeks in succession in Bonn, some years since; more frivolous music than I heard in a Vienna church in 1851—it was opera music—poor opera at that—sung by the operatic singers. Music is the expression of emotion, say we now-a-days, looking at it in its highest aspect—that, then, was not music, for it expressed nothing.—People crowded to hear it, and the alms-collector pocketed a round sum every Sunday—the singers drew remarkably well.

Hear Haydn, or Mozart, or Beethoven, or Bach, or Hummel,—indeed there is a host of writers unknown to fame, who might be named—hear their masses. Take Mozart. He who has read his life—that by Holmes is the best—will know how deeply and sincerely religious his father and mother were in all their feelings, the religious sentiment being especially developed because they were Catholics. They educated the little Wolfgang accordingly, and grown up Wolfgang, a few months before his death, spoke of the effect of all his early religious training and associations upon him as a writer of music for the church. I forget who tells the story, but it is in Nissen, and I read it with ever new pleasure. After the famous droll scene at Leipzig, where Mozart had written some nonsense texts to a mass which had no religious feeling in the music, to show old Doles that this was the case—for the Kyrie Eleison, which had a brilliant allegro: "Hol's der Geyer das geht flink", and to the close of the fugue: cum Sancto Spiritu, &c., "Das ist gestohlen Gut, Ihr Herren, nehmt's nicht uebel") the conversation turned upon church music generally. Some one remarked that it was in the highest degree unfortunate that so many musicians, especially of former times, had been like the old painters, obliged to employ their immense strength upon, for the most part, not only unfruitful, but soul-killing subjects for the church!

Quite changed in his tone of feeling and sad, Mozart here turned to the rest of the company and said, in substance, though not exactly in this manner: This seems to me just like another specimen of your Art-prating. Perhaps with you enlightened Protestants, as you call yourselves, if you have your religion in your heads—there may be some truth in it; I do not know. But it is different with us. You do not at all feel, what this is: Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi, Dona nobis pacem, and the like. But when one from his earliest childhood, like myself, has been introduced into the mystic holy of holies of our religion; when one then, who does not yet know whither he shall go with his dark but tumultuous feelings, in the full fervency of his heart joins in divine service, without really knowing what he wants; and lightened and cheered goes away again not really knowing what he has received; when one feels that they are blessed, who during the moving Agnus Dei knelt at the altar and received the sacrament of the supper, and while receiving it the music spake in joy and peace from the hearts of the kneeling ones, Benedictus qui venit, &c.,—that is another thing. Yes, indeed, this gets lost as we go out into the world; but, at least, it is so with me—when one takes these words, heard a thousand times, to set to music, all that comes back again, stands before him and moves his very soul.

He went on to describe some scenes of the kind out of his earliest childhood at Salzburg, then during his first journey into Italy, and lingered with special interest upon the anecdote, that Maria Theresa, when he was fourteen years old had commissioned him to compose the Te Deum for the dedication—I forget whether of a large hospital or another similar foundation—and to produce it himself at the head of the imperial orchestra. "How I felt then! How I felt then!" [Wie mir da war!] cried he several times, "all that comes not again! One drives about here and there in empty daily routine"—then overcome by his recollections, he grew bitter, drank much strong wine and uttered not another rational word.

Now it is sacred music composed under the influence of feelings like those described by Mozart, that I at times have such a craving to hear. There is the story of Beethoven, too, and his first mass. Some of those who heard it thought it strange music, and Prince Esterhazy said, "But my dear Beethoven, what have you been doing again?" in a way that touched the author severely. But thirteen years after, the German text to this mass, containing the expression of the music, as Scholz, the writer of that text felt it, called up the feelings, under the influence of which Beethoven had wrought, in so lively a manner, that he wept.

He that preaches in earnest reaches the heart. And whether the religious emotion be uttered by Catholic or Protestant, by Brahmin or Moslem—the emotion is the same. The very argument, which stands so conspicuous in Paley and all his followers, that the universal spread of religious feeling proves that it has some real foundation, may be applied to prove that religious music cannot be sectarian.

The greatest works of Mozart, Haydn, Handel, Bach, Beethoven, Cherubini, Mendelssohn, to say nothing of many men of less note; the greatest Italian works which I know or have heard,—are all church music. I know of no very recent works of the kind which one can rank very high, for the modern Italian, French, and more recent German composers, have, very few of them, at all events, that religious training, that development of the religious sentiment, which was so remarkable in the composers named above, and in the old Italians.

But I have rambled a long distance from the Dom choir! Splendid as it is, neither that nor any choir without female voices can touch the feelings like even an ordinary mixed chorus. But as there is no mass to be heard by such a chorus here, I must satisfy the craving for it by "diarizing" over it.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, OCT. 8.—We have fine musical prospects for this winter. The Philharmonic rehearsals commence this week, (rather earlier than usual,) for the first concert on the 24th of November. I am sorry that the Society have been obliged to renew their lease of Niblo's Garden and Saloon, for the concerts and rehearsals. Both were too small last winter for their respective purposes, and I had hoped that some other arrangement might have been made. Several new features have been introduced in the management of affairs. One is the plan of extra admissions to the rehearsals being obtainable, at fifty cents apiece. Why not twenty-five? That seems sufficient for such an object, and has been established as the regular rehearsal price in Boston, and here in other cases. Another innovation that I heartily approve of, is the introduction of ushers, to prevent the incessant talking which has so long annoyed all the music-loving frequenters of the rehearsals, particularly. I fervently hope that the measure will be effectual, and heartily thank the originator of the plan. Mr. BERGMANN has been engaged as leader for the season. I regret this for the sake of Mr. EISFELD, to whom it must be a disappointment;—but if Mr. Bergmann prove more than a new broom that swept clean with our unruly orchestra, we shall have no reason to regret the change.

In the intervals between the four Philharmonic concerts, we are to have three by the Musical Fund Society, of which I subjoin the prospectus:

The want of an additional Series of Philharmonic Concerts in this city, has been felt already for some time, and has suggested to the American Musical Fund Society the idea of supplying the deficiency, to the advantage of the Fund now accumulating in their hands, for the benefit of the sick and otherwise incapacitated members of the profession.

They would therefore respectfully announce that they have positively decided on giving during the ensuing season, and at as early a day as a sufficient number of subscribers shall have been obtained, the Three Classical Concerts called for by their Constitution. These Concerts, which are to be in no way inferior to the best efforts hitherto brought forth here, will comprise an efficient and powerful Orchestra, aided by the most distinguished Star Talent available at the time, and the Music is to be of the highest order, without, however, excluding the better works occasionally composed in this country.

But in presenting this plan to the American Public, they deem it well to disclaim from the first any attempt at opposition against the old Philharmonic, whose principal members and officers form also a part of the A. M. F. S. Their intention is simply to improve the opportunity now offered to increase the efficiency of the latter society as an assistant to the former—the improvement of the welfare of musicians being of necessity subservient to the better discharge of their duties;—and in view of this, the undertaking is earnestly recommended to the favorable consideration of all interested in the advancement of the Art.

By order of the Concert Committee.

U. C. HILL, Chairman. LOUIS ERNST, Sec.

This will supply a want that has long been felt by the truly musical part of our public, and offers a prospect that will be hailed with rejoicing. And if Mr. Einfeld favors us with another series of his delightful Quartet Soirées, there will not be many European cities that can offer more advantages for hearing good music, than our young, crude New York.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, OCT. 13, 1855.

THE CONCERT OF MISS ADELAIDE PHILLIPS. The sight of the Music Hall nearly filled with people, in spite of the drenching storm of Saturday, showed how warm and general was the welcome to our young cantatrice on her return from Europe. Her reception was indeed most hearty and enthusiastic; and her graceful, lady-like acknowledgement of it, as by an artist at home upon the stage, as well as the unaffected naturalness and frankness of her whole appearance, predisposed all in her favor. Her singing did not in the least disappoint us. If she is not all that we have heard in ALBONI and LAGRANGE combined, if she is not the wonder of wonders (for fond and thoughtless people will expect all that), she is at least an admirable artist, one whose voice, execution, taste, expression, talent and evidence of reserved force afford rare satisfaction and still rarer hope.

Her voice is a pure contralto of the most rich and musical quality; perhaps not quite so powerful as formerly (or was it owing to the larger hall?), but powerful enough, refined and equalized by culture to that degree that each tone is a luxury to the ear, and the spell is never broken by the sense of mere crude physical body of sound. It is the voice of an expressive artist. The low tones are remarkably fine. She seemed to touch some of the highest tones rather lightly, and we fancy there is yet more strength to come from them. Her execution, as displayed in such florid pieces as the variations by Meyerbeer, and Una voce, is very smooth and even, and all is done in a good, honest, natural style, with nothing overstrained, and with the right expression always, without any of that manneristic Italian pathos which grows so offensive and so feeble. It was questionable taste, to be sure, to commence a piece with embellishments and even variations at the very outset; but Una voce is familiar enough to every body, and used by common consent as a stalking-horse for the display of brilliant vocalization. Besides, the embellishments were singularly graceful and clever (by Garcia, her teacher, we are told) and were exquisitely sung.

In the duet from Il Trovatore with Mr. Millard (rather a feeble, sing-song sort of melody, to be sure) she showed a beautiful cantabile, and any one who remembered VESTALI in the part could measure the wide difference between such a singer and an artist like Miss Phillips. The Venetian Barcarolle was charmingly sung, and here she took occasion to respond to the emphatic encores that followed every piece, by seating herself at the piano and giving utterance, most sincerely and fervently, to her joy in once more seeing "Home", in a simple little melody, which she sang with the truest feeling. It warmed the audience to an irrepressible ecstasy of delight; she was compelled to sing it again, although it was by no means good taste to call for it. Her unaffected happiness in getting home added a charm to all her singing. In the duet from Tancredi, which closed the concert, we found her one of the best Rossini singers we have ever heard. But what pleased us most was the simplicity, naturalness, and good sense that pervaded all her efforts. We had the assurance, by a thousand little unmistakable and indescribable signs, of real talent. We felt that there is much more yet to come of her, and we trust that she is destined to be to us a true interpreter of the greatest masters of song.

Mr. MILLARD was in fine voice and sang with taste and elegance, only once or twice essaying too much in a very high passage. Mr. ZERRAHN's little extempore orchestra played the overtures to Felsenmühle and Martha, and some curious "selections" quite acceptably, so that the entertainment as a whole was a success, and the reception thereof promised well for the musical appetite of the public for the coming winter.

The subscription lists for the ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS are filling up quite rapidly. It is particularly gratifying to see that so many members of the musical profession testify their sense of the importance of such concerts by subscribing for tickets. This is as it should be. Such concerts it is for the interest of musicians as musicians to support. Such concerts tend directly to the elevation of the musical profession, to the keeping up of the true tone and dignity of Art amid so much that chills the best aspirations of the artist. They are no mere money-making speculations, virtuoso affairs, to which if a musician gives his time he gives more than he can afford. But they are opportunities for the want of which Art and artists languish. Every true artist feels it a good investment to pay a little, to the end that Beethoven's symphonies may not be forgotten in our community. Every musician, not impoverished, can afford to put in his mite with others for the upraising of the character of his profession. And then his example, as a voluntary supporter, instead of an idle honorary listener and critic, tells upon the public most encouragingly.

One word to our readers. It is important that the subscription list should be filled up soon. People are in the habit of leaving such things to the last moment, to the great discouragement of the enterprise. Why will not every one who reads this, and who has been longing for good orchestral music, resolve that not another day shall pass before he shall visit some music store and record his (or her) name for as many tickets as he shall wish to use or give away?

Musical Chit-Chat.

Our friend KEYZER suggests a good thing in another column. Of course he knows that we can no more vote a song into national adoption than we can vote the sun into shining. But something good may come of it. At all events it is high time we were relieved from the disgrace of "Yankee Doodle", which, after the Marseillaise, sounds like littleness and meanness and sauciness personified, and which keeps its foothold because it is too true a type alas! of the vile, vulgar, filibustering pseudo-Americanism so rife in our broad land. Perhaps when we have a nobler spirit, we shall have a nobler song.

It will be seen that Mlle. PARODI gives a concert at the Music Hall on Tuesday evening, assisted by Mme. STRAKOSCH, the contralto. Mr. STRAKOSCH, the Pianist, and Sig. LEONARDI, baritone. PARODI has been having remarkable success as a concert singer in New York, Philadelphia and elsewhere, and by all accounts must have greatly improved since she was last in this country, immediately after JENNY LIND, when she created considerable enthusiasm in New York by her vigorous dramatic style, after the PASTA model. . . . A new candidate for favor in the concert room is announced for next week in the person of Miss JESSIE HAMMOND, who it would seem gives musical entertainments of a like nature to those formerly introduced here by that at once classical and comical genius, HATTON. All we know of the lady is contained in the following paragraph from the European Times:

Amongst the passengers per America, Miss Jessie Hammond, a young vocalist and pianist, whose talent lacks nothing but time to secure her a reputation as eminent as peculiar, brings a cargo from England, as per invoice, which, when we say that it has been not only approved of, but contributed to, by some of the first artists of the day, cannot but command the attention of all interested in the articles. Miss Jessie Hammond is peculiarly felicitous in that happy vein of vocalism which John Parry may be said to have created; and we are personally aware of his cordial acceptance of her drafts upon his credit. We confidently anticipate a rapid sale of the articles, and are happy to learn that the supply is unlimited. Perhaps a word on the variety of the goods imported by the fair adventurer may not be amiss; and, as the lady's fame in Liverpool, &c., is A 1, we are happy to bear testimony to her very superior execution on the piano-forte, concertina, and guitar. Miss Jessie Hammond's remarkable tact in vocal expression and delineation of character, from the deepest pathos to the happiest flights of the comic muse, have repeatedly called forth expressions of wonder, no less than regret, at her withholding from the opera stage qualifications which unquestionably would place her among the most brilliant of its ornaments.

Dr. S. PARKMAN TUCKERMAN, who received the musical degree at Cambridge, England, has given his native Boston the preference over New York, and has taken charge of the organ and musical service at St. Paul's church. His residence among us will do much to draw attention to the true worth of the English Church music. . . . Mr. SATTER, the Pianist has returned to Boston. . . . Mr. ZERRAHN has been made conductor of the Cambridge Musical Association.

The Italian opera at the Academy in New York is not very successful thus far, in spite of the attractions of LAGRANGE, MORELLI, &c. For this there would seem to be at least two reasons: first the high prices, two dollars being charged for mere admission to the house,—that vast house,—and more for choice seats; and second, the selection of hacknied and indifferent pieces for the opening performances, indeed now for two weeks. Linda and Il Trovatore, now grown so familiar, could hardly be great cards. Perhaps the public appetite is saving itself for MEYERBEER. —Last night, however, the bill was felicitously varied, Miss HENSLEY appearing in Masanello. By the way, speaking of Il Trovatore, the Home Journal denies that it can be popular from the want of melodies that go to the heart, and develops the thought into the following extraordinary statement: "Few men have scientific musical knowledge—all have a heart, or something that answers for one. It is this truth which still enables Puritani, Norma, Sonnambula, and some few of Donizetti's and Mozart's to hold their place against all comers. Bellini will live when Beethoven ceases to be remembered!" As if it required scientific knowledge to feel the greater greatness of the latter! As if Beethoven did not speak more from the heart and to the heart than any modern composer! That "or something that answers for a heart" was well put in. It is all that many people seem to have, who decry great music as cold and classical, while they clamor for the Ethiopian minstrelsy, the Balfie nambly-pamby ballads, which touch what they call the heart.

Advertisements.

The New York Philharmonic comes out in noble proportions this winter:—sixteen first violins, sixteen second, eight double basses, and all on the same scale. No wonder that Herr BERGMANN could not resist the temptation. For their first concert they are rehearsing Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia" and Wagner's to Tannhäuser. Bergmann is also conductor of the American Musical Fund Society and of several German singing societies, and plays the violoncello every night at the Italian Opera. . . . THEODORE EISFELD, the popular conductor of the Philharmonic and Quartet Concerts, has returned from Europe with health much improved. Messrs. TIMM, RACKEMANN, WOLLENHAUPT, and Mr. LUIS, of the firm of Scharfenberg & Luis, are expected by the end of the month.

We have already noticed the list of singers engaged at the Théâtre Italien in Paris for the coming season. The following are the principal operas which compose the repertoire: Semiramide, Otello, Mosé, Assedio di Corinto, Barbiere di Siviglia, Cenerentola, Matilde di Shabran—a large share of Rossini: Don Giovanni, of Mozart; I Puritani, Sonnambula, Norma, Capuleti e Montecchi, of Bellini; Lucrezia Borgia, Lucia, of Donizetti; Il Trovatore, Ernani, of Verdi. Three new operas will be played, viz. Leonora, by Mercadante; Fiordina, by Pedrotti; Assedio di Firenze, expressly composed for this theatre by Bottesini. The manager furthermore promises two of Rossini's works, never yet heard in Paris.

Music-Director JULIUS STERN in Berlin has formed an orchestral union for the giving of six concerts this winter, after the pattern of the Leipzig Gewandhaus Concerts. The Programme of the whole is announced and may afford some hints for our six concerts. First Concert: "Fingal's Cave" overture, Mendelssohn; Violin Concerto, Beethoven, performed by concert-master Laub; choruses and marches from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens"; B flat major Symphony of R. Schumann. Second Concert: A minor Symphony of Gade; Concert in G minor for piano, by Moscheles (played by Von Bülow); Chorus: Meesstille und glückliche Fahrt, Beethoven; overture to Tannhäuser, Wagner. Third Concert: "Hafiz" overture, by Ehler; Concerto for three Pianos, J. S. Bach; the "Flight into Egypt," by Berlioz; A major Symphony, Beethoven. Fourth Concert: Overture, by Berlioz: Die Behnricher; violin concerto, by R. Schumann, (played by Laub); Procession of Ladies and bridal song from Wagner's Lohengrin; C major Symphony of F. Schubert. The Fifth Concert is to be distinguished in its character from the rest by a programme selected and conducted by Liszt. Sixth Concert: Symphony by Ferd. Hiller; Chorus: "The Storm," Haydn; Fantasia for Piano, orchestra and voices, Beethoven; overture to Faust, Wagner.

Such a series of concerts, while it keeps alive the love of the old standard masterworks of genius, also acquaints the public with the notable new things in music; it ministers to a real love and curiosity about good music, and does not go upon the plan so clamored for by our young concert-goers of keeping all the good and great things on the shelf unknown, while all is sacrificed to mere amusement of the moment.

THE AGE OF BRASS DECLINING.—One of the most agreeable associations connected with the revivification of the Whig party, is the revival of the Boston Brigade Clarionet Band, which has been so long obscured under the overpowering influence of brass. It broke the bonds of its oppression this morning, and burst forth in rich and grateful ancient martial music. It carried us back to days when street music was a combination of agreeable sounds, and not one continued grating noise of sounding brass. We trust that, whatever becomes of the Whig party, the age of brass is passed.

The above is from the Traveller of Tuesday. We echo the sentiment with all our heart. All honor to the "Old Brigade" which has taken the initiative in this movement of reform! May it not stop till it has purged away all the faulty elements of modern military band music. To have added reeds is a grand step. Let it go on to modify the nature of its existing brass, supplanting by the use of the older melodic instruments, the soulless cornets and noisy sax-horn tribe, which at present so abound. X.

NEW COURSE OF HARMONY, BY L. H. SOUTHARD.

The Publishers call the attention of the musical profession to this work, as one eminently calculated to lighten the labors of the teacher, and rapidly advance the pupil. It is emphatically a PRACTICAL work, serving both as a Manual of instruction on the one hand, and a Text-book on the other; and it is believed that the peculiar arrangement of the work, together with the very large number of exercises and examples, presents great advantages, to both scholar and teacher, over any similar work of the kind. Teachers highly commend the work. Mr. WILLIAM MASON says it is a work unsurpassed in the language. Mr. GEORGE J. WEBB says that it is a work perspicuous in diction, methodical in arrangement, and sufficiently copious to embrace all the essentials of the general doctrine of accord. It can be ordered through any respectable Music-seller, and will be sent through the mail on the receipt of the price, ($1.75,) postage prepaid.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

CHURCH ORGANS.
COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.
WM. B. D. SIMMONS, Organ Builder,
(Heretofore doing business in the style of WM. B. D. SIMMONS & Co.) and
GEORGE FISHER,

Of Cambridge, have this day formed a Copartnership for continuing the manufacture of Church Organs.

We design to keep in our Warerooms New Instruments for sale at prices from $400 to $1,500 each, and are prepared to build by contract at the shortest notice, Organs, worth from $800 to $12,000. And by prompt and faithful execution of orders hope to merit a like encouragement to that heretofore extended to WM. B. D. SIMMONS, and which has indicated the necessity of this business connection, that his entire attention may be devoted to the more difficult and artistic parts of the business, so that an increase thereof may cause no diminution of the personal attention which is requisite for the maintenance of the CHARACTER of our instruments, upon which we rely for success.

While it will be our aim and ambition to furnish ORGANS OF A PERFECTION OF TONE AND MECHANISM, AND OF AN ELEGANCE OF EXTERIOR UNSURPASSED, we are confident of ability to offer terms MORE FAVORABLE THAN CAN BE OBTAINED ELSEWHERE, for the following reasons: Having ample means, we can purchase in large quantities at first cost, for cash; can always command the most talented assistants, and also do sufficient business to practise division of labor, which, by assigning parts to workmen skilled in their particular branch, necessarily insures better work at less expense. Our Manufactory, by its proximity to Charles river, enables us to receive lumber direct from the vessel at first cost, and having been erected expressly for the business, is in arrangement, size, convenience and its facilities unequalled, being furnished with steam engine, steam-heated drying-house, planing, grooving, matching, moulding, tenoning, boring, and other machines, together with lathes, scroll, circular and other saws, &c., all operated by steam power.

These facilities are such as are possessed by no other manufacturer of Organs in this country, and of themselves would enable us to furnish instruments, with a fair profit, at a price which those of like quality must cost builders who have work done by hand that can be better executed at half the cost by steam machinery.

Second hand Organs at all times for sale.
Orders for tuning church organs promptly attended to, and contracts taken for tuning by the year.
Orders respectfully solicited.

FIRST PREMIUM MELODEONS,
The Very Best now Manufactured.
S. D. & H. W. SMITH respectfully call the attention of the public to their IMPROVED MELODEONS, constantly on exhibition at their Warerooms,
No. 417 Washington Street.

By means of a new method of voicing, known only to themselves, they have succeeded in removing the harsh and buzzing sound which formerly characterized the instrument, rendering the tones full, clear and organ-like. The action is prompt and reliable, enabling the performer to execute the most rapid music without obscuring the tones. The swell is arranged to give great expression.

The manufacturers received the First Premium, over all competitors, at the Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association; also at the Metropolitan Mechanics' Fair, held at Washington, D. C.

For the Parlor, instruments are furnished at prices varying from $45 to $150.

Robert and Clara Schumann. A MUSICAL SKETCH.

Translated from the Weimarer Sonntagsblatt.

A dull, heavy sultriness was brooding in the Art-atmosphere of Germany; it weighed all timid minds to the ground, and prevented the bold flight of any new artistic spirit. Death had summoned from the earth, in rapid succession, the three greatest masters of German Tone-Art. CARL MARIA VON WEBER was the first to depart from us, and now slept, far away from his home, in foreign soil. He was followed only too soon by his new eternal home, by LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN; he who, long since estranged from the world and its pleasures, had lived and labored in another world of his own! And hardly had the bell ceased to toll for him, when FRANZ SCHUBERT, too, was taken from us, and by his new-made grave stood German Art, desolate and helpless, and none knew what the Future could bring to replace that which we had lost! The name of BERLIOZ, indeed, had come to us from time to time from Paris, but it sounded so dark and mysterious, like an oracle, and none yet knew the heaven-attacking power that was in the young Titan. Of his friends, CHOPIN and LISZT, too, wonderful things were recounted,—but they all dwelt beyond the Rhine, in the great world-city, strangers as yet to our Art-life and our country.

It seemed almost as if the legacy which the three illustrious dead had left to their country, were too great and too weighty for posterity. A general lassitude had succeeded the bold flight to distant zones which these creative spirits had undertaken, and thus it happened that foreign powers, detrimental to German Art, found no difficulty in taking possession of the deserted ground. Italian and French composers supplied the German stage;

ROSSINI, AUBER and HALEVY established themselves in the realm which Carl Maria von Weber had hardly founded. HUENTEN and HERZ reigned over the piano, German song was cultivated with ineffectual activity by numberless small spirits, and to the great heritage of Beethoven, to Symphony, none dared lay claim.

It was during this dark time that a number of artists, mostly younger ones, met every evening in Kühne's Wine-Cellar in Leipzig, more particularly, perhaps, for social enjoyment, but no less, also, for the interchange of ideas upon that Art which was the meat and drink of their life—the Art of Music. The head of the table was occupied by a lively, flexible man of middle age, intellectual in conversation, and overflowing with sharp and witty remarks. He was the instructor of more than one of the young musicians around him, who all listened to his observations with profound attention. He was very fond of monopolizing the conversation and suffering himself to be admired. For he called many a young, highly promising musician his pupil, and had, besides, the certain consciousness of having moulded his daughter Clara, at that time a girl of fourteen, into a prodigy, whose first appearance delighted the whole world, and whose subsequent artist activity became the pride of her native city, Leipzig.

By his side sat a quiet, thoughtful young man of twenty-three, with melancholy eyes. But lately a student in Heidelberg, he had now devoted himself entirely to music, had removed to Leipzig and was now a pupil of the "old schoolmaster," as the father of CLARA WIECK liked to be called. Young ROBERT SCHUMANN had good reason to be melancholy. After long struggles, he had only been able to devote himself entirely to music comparatively late in life, and had been obliged to pass a part of his precious youth in studies which were as uncongenial as possible to his artist spirit. He had finally decided for the career of a virtuoso, and was pursuing the study of the piano with an almost morbid zeal, when the disabling of one of his fingers, a consequence of his over-exertions, obliged him to give up this career forever. He did not yet suspect that this accident would prove fortunate for him in the end, by directing him to his true vocation, Composition. Perhaps, too, it was the first germ of love, in the garb of admiration for the wondrous talent of Clara, which made young Robert so quiet and dreamy. His companions were all the more lively. There sat the eccentric LOUIS BOEHNER, who long ago had served as a model for E. T. A. HOFFMANN's fantastic pictures. Here J. P. LYSER, a painter by profession, but a poet as well, and a musician besides. Here CARL BAUCK, the indefatigable yet unsuccessful composer of songs, now, in his capacity of critic, the paper bugbear of the Dresden artists. He had just returned from Italy, and believed himself in possession of the true secret of the art of singing, the monopoly of which every singing-master is wont to claim for himself. C. F. BECKER, too, the eminent organist and industrious collector, belonged to this circle, as well as many more young and old artists of more or less merit and talent.

The younger ones were all still without a name. They had as yet no Past, rich in achievements, but all the more aspiring plans and bold hopes for the Future. They were all active-minded and clear-sighted enough to recognize that musical matters would not long continue in the state in which they had been since the revolution of July.

"Young Germany" had already commenced its reformation in literature. With BOERNE and HEINE at their head, the sharp and spirited pens of a GUTZKOW, LAUBE, KUEHNE, MUNDT and others were preparing a revolution on intellectual ground, which kept even the noble diet of Frankfurt more on the alert than was right. In Munich and Dresden new artist-schools were forming, which promised to have an important influence on the plastic arts. Only in music there was still a death-like calm. But it was the calm before a thunder-storm, and distant lightning flashes were already illumining the horizon. Here there was no "young Germany" yet: at least no one knew of it. But its first elements were already assembled in Kühne's cellar in Leipzig, and talked of CALLOT, HOFFMANN and JEAN PAUL, of BEETHOVEN and FRANZ SCHUBERT, and of the three young foreign Romanticists beyond the Rhine, the friends of the new phenomenon in French poetry, VICTOR HUGO.

This was the "Davidsbund", or league of David.* * * * *

Among several other Art-devoted houses, that of the "old schoolmaster" offered the friends at all times a cordial welcome, the highest encouragement for their efforts and achievements, and a most agreeable intellectual centre around which to meet. Nevertheless, for various reasons, it would perhaps have been visited less frequently, and in a more frivolous spirit by these young fiery artists, who were yet rushing boldly forth into life in youthful recklessness,—had not Clara shed a quiet charm over the whole place, and, by her indwelling Art-genius, as well as the pure, true womanliness, which was strangely blended with her still child-like manner, bound the friends to her in united admiration and inspiration.

"She early lifted the veil of Isis. The child looks calmly up—the man would perhaps be dazzled by the brilliancy:—thus wrote Robert one evening in the “thought-and-poem-book” of the Davidsbund, as, still intoxicated by the impression of her charming manner, he sought to be alone with his glowing heart, and confided in passionate outpouring the emotions that were agitating it to his faithful and silent friend, his piano. Did he perhaps not yet know that he loved? Who can solve the problem, if not he himself?

Clara, however, suspected nothing. Her manner to him, as to all, had that ingenuousness, that child-like calm and serenity, which is peculiar to such noble natures, and which made the happy man whom she would one day love, all the happier.

During this time of longing and struggle, of wavering between admiration and growing love, Robert created his first master-pieces, and, before all others, the glorious Sonata: “Florestan and Eusebius,” which, himself rendered worthy of the laurel thereby, he placed upon his Clara’s youthful brow, as the fairest of laurel-wreaths.

And at that time, too, those fantastically-inspired piano compositions came to light, which, as much poetically as musically conceived, and passionately and rapidly changing in their moods, entwine the hearer in chains of strange thoughts and ever-varying images: the “Intermezzi,” with their up-starting “Alternatives,” where so suddenly the song: “My peace is o’er,” speaks to the heart; the “Impromptus,” to which Clara not only gave, at Robert’s request, the first theme, but, unconsciously, all the motifs; the “Davidsbund-dances,” so full of character, of “Florestan and Eusebius,” and the “Carnival,” which we shall yet visit ourselves; finally the “Fantasy-pieces” of a richly and highly endowed spirit, with their deeply fervent “Evening Thoughts,” their inspired ecstasy, their tender, imploring, and yet unsolved question, “Why?”

Thus the true love of the real artist expresses itself in works, which, in their undying worth, their never-changing capability of inspiring, will yet, at a time far distant, speak to posterity of the noble, joy-exalted or grief-stricken heart, even when it has long ceased to beat.

But if Robert and Clara were not yet fully conscious of that which was passing within them, and on which their happiness for life was to depend—the old schoolmaster was shrewd enough to anticipate all results. He was, however, by no means, rejoiced, but rather annoyed at the love that was springing up between the aspiring, richly-endowed artist-man and the young, tender artist-maiden.

What was it to him if every one that was unprejudiced recognized, at the first glance, that these two were born for each other—an artist pair, sent into the world by their mutual genius for the revival and refreshment of our age, so poor in poetry and pure Art? What was this to him? He had developed and educated Clara, she was his, and should remain so. Clara was his property, his capital, and he considered every one who attempted to rob him of this, as no better than a thief. With jealous eyes he watched over his treasure; but not with those of a mother, who carefully guards her only child in the world’s ever-changing tumult, but with those of the miser, who carries the key to his riches upon his heart, and the money itself within it.

The old schoolmaster knew how to calculate.

He counted upon his Clara’s talent for a good income, not only of money but also of fame. He was ambitious of the fame of his pale, delicate child, who looked out from her deep, clear eyes, upon the restless crowd, and could not understand the world! But sometimes a silent tear would glisten in Clara’s eyes, and her lips, like those of Robert, tremblingly whisper: “Why?”—

The old man found it very natural that nearly the whole town worshipped his child—it was tolerably indifferent to him too, that more than one loved her. He feared none but this Robert, and indeed, he was the only dangerous one.

It was unfortunate that in addition to this, Robert’s eccentric and imaginative nature and the independent soaring of his genius became, with every new work, more distasteful to the old man. It was particularly since Robert had been obliged to give up the piano, and had emancipated himself completely from the instructions and precepts of the old master, that the latter would have nothing more to do with him. He had remained a musician of the old school, who hated all innovations from the bottom of his heart, and was secretly vexed at every young musician who would not compose in the manner which his grandfather had considered right and proper. For a time he had gone with the younger composers, because they were his pupils, and because he hoped subsequently to gain some influence over them. But when they grew above him, and he saw that one after the other refused to follow his pedantic rules, a silent wrath came over him, and he believed himself an unappreciated benefactor of mankind.

Most particularly he warned his Clara against this Robert, “this Faust in a modern garb, against whom she must guard her heart as she would her fingers against a Lisztian composition—for he was none other than Mephisto in propria persona; and as soon as he had gained only one finger, he would soon have the whole hand, and finally the poor soul into the bargain!” But when all his warnings and sermons had no effect, the old man peremptorily forbade all intercourse with Robert, and finally would not allow his daughter to speak to or even look at him. And if she ever did so out of the house, at concerts, or elsewhere, he took care that each timid look of love should be richly paid for with a stream of tears.

But tears will not drown love; they only serve to steel the glowing heart. And by all these obstacles and struggles the two artist hearts became only the more firmly united.

But the old man concluded to put a speedy end to all this. It needed but little reflection to do this, for Clara’s destination to the career of a virtuoso held out to him the simplest and most natural pretext, and separated the lovers without any clat.

He took Clara on a concert-tour, first to Vienna, then farther and farther away. And Clara reaped laurels and poems, and the old man fame and money in plenty. The former he had printed, the latter he pocketed, and now thought himself safe and Clara forever delivered from the meshes of this “romantic love.” But Clara’s heart had remained at home!

And Robert?—He was forbidden to write to her. But he did, nevertheless, and she received his letters. They were the “Schwärmbriefe of Eusebius to Chiara.” They were printed; every one might read them, yet none has understood them but she for whom they were written.

In them Eusebius wrote to Chiara, after the first concert which he attended without her: “Amid all our musical soul-feasts there always peeps out an angel-face, which more than resembles a certain Clara. Why art thou not with us? And how thou wilt have thought of us last night, from the “Meeresstille” to the flaming close of the A major symphony!—I also thought of thee then, Chiara, pure one, bright one, whose hands are stretched towards Italy, whither thy longing draws thee, but thy dreamy eye still turned to us!”

And Chiara’s voice answered back from Milan: “Often, at night, the chords resound, as if touched by a spirit-hand. At such times think that I am thinking of thee!”—

Would you know what an end this love came to, a sad one or a happy one?—You need only search in Robert’s works again. There the answer is plainly written.

Several years passed away. It was already 1840, when the “Myrtles” appeared, in a rich garland of songs, and gave to a happy “Bride,” as “Dedication” the unsurpassed song: “Thou my soul, oh thou my heart?”†

Soon after we behold a closely and blissfully united artist-couple approaching us, who present us with a mutual gift, as a lasting remembrance of the happiest hours of their life—they are the first songs of Robert and Clara Schumann.

And then comes the joyous sound of Robert Schumann’s first Symphony for grand orchestra, and sings to us, in the full marriage jubilee, of the bliss of the lovers. And a roguish triangle which has crept into the orchestra already in the first movement, laughingly betrays to us that all sorrow is now at an end.

But all that preceded—the bitter grief of a long, joyless separation; the violent conflict of a loving filial heart, which had to choose between father and lover; the old man’s cruel threats, which he knew how to carry out only too carefully and conscientiously—around all this we will cast a concealing veil and pass it over in silence. But of this too, Robert’s “Nouvelettes,” will tell you with the mysterious “Voice from afar,” and the “Night pieces,” if you penetrate their darkness. And also the “Kreiseriana” and the “Humoreske,” with their smile upon the lip and their tears in the eye, and their “Inner voice,” trembling with sadness.

But to him who cannot read in the works of the young master, written with his heart’s blood, the pangs of his soul must remain unknown.—He himself has willed it so. For, in sad presentiment of future suffering, he once said to his friends: I do not like those whose life is not in unison with their works. The artist should always, like a Greek God, have kindly intercourse with life and man. Only if they dare to touch him, he may disappear, and leave naught but clouds behind him.”

Letter from a Country Singing Teacher.

M——, SEPT.—, 1865.

JOHN S. DWIGHT, Esq.,

Dear Sir:—I am one of those unlucky individuals—unlucky at times in your references to us as a class—who depend upon psalmody, much abused psalmody, for a living. Singing schools in country villages, and the charge of a choir in this place, are my means of earning bread for my wife and little ones. It is true that this is my trade; I hope it is also my vocation. At all events, I was led into it originally more from the desire to do good and help in elevating the taste of the small public in which I lived, than with any view to money-making; and though now I work at the business, yet this form of expression is no more applicable to me, I contend, by way of reproach, than it is to a teacher in a public school; even in your boasted Boston high schools. If I have seen fit to "manufacture a psalm-book," and try to get my winter pupils to use it, I have the consciousness that this arose from no unworthy motive; unless the desire to collect in a small volume such tunes and a few anthems and set pieces as I thought specially adapted to the end of cultivating the tastes and exciting the attention of my schools, be unworthy. For my own part I like my own tools best in my own work.

If I were a practised writer, I should be glad to go somewhat extensively into this matter of psalmody, for I think much might be said in favor of the "psalm-book manufacture," as it is called. I can only talk plain and straight forward, and as you are in the habit of doing so yourself, I hope you will give me the same privilege and not annihilate me in ten words, as the ——— does its opponents.

You live in the region of the higher music, and it is as familiar to you as the beauties of the ocean to the rich, who spend their summers at Nahant and Newport. Now we, who live back in the country, are shut out from this, and the remembrance of a great Handel chorus or the full-voiced Orchestra is like that of the single afternoon which we have spent at Nahant in gazing out upon that water Eternity which dashes its spray upon us.

Do not think that we have no longing aspirations to climb into that higher region. Perhaps the time may come. If it does, with all due deference to the opinions of the Journal of Music and its correspondents at home and abroad, we shall have found when we get there that the psalm-book manufacture helped us in no small degree to the ladder by which we climbed.

Now, Sir, please allow me to give you some of my own experience, to show you how this thing is.

As I said, I got into the business of teaching singing schools—no matter how. I became interested in it and felt it to be a profession for which I was in some degree fitted. Concluding to try my fortune in it, I felt it necessary to improve myself as much as possible.

So about ten years ago, when summer came and my vacation came with it, I took a portion of my small earnings and went to Boston to attend the Convention at that time held by Mr BAKER and associates at the Melodeon. I was moved to join that convention mostly by the announcement that Haydn's "Creation" would be practised. This was done, and though old frequenters of your famous Handel and Haydn Society found a great deal to laugh at in our rude execution of those noble choruses, and perhaps in the solo singing in some cases, I can assure you that that was an epoch in my life. I know also that others felt it be the same to them. One of the choruses—"The Heavens are telling"—I was familiar with in an arrangement by Mr. MASON in "The Choir," as an anthem. But how much grander and more sublime was it as we then sang it! How, too, can I describe the feelings with which that passage—"A new created world" filled me; and the solo and chorus, "The Marvellous Work"!

Then, Sir, the discussions upon questions of teaching, the hints and lectures upon our particular branch of the profession, were of great importance and interest to me, and I felt at the end of my ten days in Boston, that I had more than my money and time's worth in pleasure, and instruction, and returned to my fall and winter's work with new zeal. And now, sir, to the point in question, that of the "psalm-book manufacture."

Allowing that the grand object of the leaders in that Musical Convention, was to advertise and sell their collections of psalmody and secular music, that does not detract at all from the substantial benefits I derived from attending. Nor am I sorry that I was the means afterwards of selling many copies of their books, and thus adding to the "inundation of psalm tunes." I will explain this farther pretty soon. But first let me state that it was shown by our committee on expenses, that the cost of the hall, lighting and the like, far exceeded what was taken at concerts and by the admission of members, and that, unless the new psalm books or glee books had been manufactured, and had found sale, the originators of the Convention would have been too much out of pocket to have tried the thing again. As it was, we had a great gain, and not entirely to their loss. We made acquaintance with other singing masters from all parts of the country, and a feeling, which I think you call esprit de corps, grew up among us, and the sincere wish to give our future pupils some idea of the new delight we had experienced in the grand work of Haydn.

Now to the other point.

Had you, sir, lived in the country and known what singing schools are, you would view the multiplication of psalm books differently.

I shall teach again in W——, this winter. I have taught there already two winters, and we have used the same book. This winter I shall introduce a new one. Because we need new tunes? Not at all. But for various reasons. Let me tell just how the thing goes on.

W——, is rather a small town, and the school will consist of two sorts of people—the old singers, and the new beginners. We shall probably have twenty-four evenings. Now for the new beginners it makes no odds whether we use the old book or the new. In either case I must begin with forcing them to commit certain things to memory, the place of Do for instance according as the signature of the tune may be, the different kinds of time, the singing both by note and by letters. I must get them in about ten nights to be able to read the notes of simple tunes; and I may say the many simple tunes which we have now, being pleasing mainly from their rhythm, and having simple harmonies, are just the thing for the purpose.

This, with all who have any real talent for singing, I shall easily effect. The rest will mostly drop off. Now come in those who already can read the music pretty well—some of them without difficulty. To these people the singing-school is what your concerts are to you, only they have to make their own music. Now in the two last winters they have sung the book which we used through, and the favorite pieces over and over again. The whole town cannot furnish the means of singing a mass, a sort of music I see much praised in the Journal, nor an oratorio; nor if it could, would it be willing to spend the necessary time in practising it. The schools are got up and sustained partly for the sake of the church service, and partly by the singers themselves for their own pleasure. Now the old singers demand a new book. I have practised in one at the Convention and am pleased with it, and I think they will like it. I therefore recommend it, and it is procured. If, on the whole, I do not like it as well as my own little collection of favorite pieces, many of them such as are praised in your Journal, still I cannot blame my pupils for wanting something new, if it be not quite so good. I do not think, sir, that you would be satisfied with being confined at your concerts to the productions of even your classics.

I know this is a very imperfect statement of the matter on my part, but I feel as if we teachers were in some degree responsible for the multiplication of new books, and I wish honorably to bear my share of that responsibility.

If you ask me whether I am satisfied with the new books as well as with the multiplication of new books, I must candidly confess that in one respect I am not.

I think it would be a great improvement to have in every new book two or three choruses from great works, not arranged and adapted, as the saying is, but given with the organ or pianoforte arrangement as in the originals. At the close of each school it is my practise to give a little concert or sort of exhibition in the church, and a few of the last evenings, sometimes an extra evening or two, are given to preparation. If we had a chorus or two from Handel's "Messiah," or Haydn's "Creation," perhaps even from "Elijah," we should have time to learn them, and I should have the satisfaction of doing my little towards making them known, at all events have the enjoyment of hearing and leading them myself. In most of my schools I have no difficulty in getting a pianoforte for such occasions, and of finding some one to play it.

Please excuse my mistakes in manner or matter in this, and believe me respectfully, a gratified reader of your Journal.

P. E. G.,

Singing Teacher.

May I venture to suggest that a little more in your paper about music in our meeting-houses would add to its interest with us in the country.

CHEAP PRICES FOR OPERA.—We copied the other day from the Courier and Enquirer an estimate of the expenses of Italian opera in New York, and promised the whole of that paper's argument, based on New York experience, against the practicability of the large audience at low prices system. Here it is:

There could not be more erroneous notions upon this subject than those which are generally entertained by the public, and which we regret to see, are encouraged by a part of the Press which knows, or ought to know, better. First-rate performances, at low prices, are called for, that the support of "the mass of the people" may be obtained, and the establishment of the Italian Opera in New York be thus secured. Those who make this demand and this promise, must be deplorably ignorant or wilfully perverse. They generally point to what they are pleased to call successful seasons at Castle Garden in support of their vague clamor; but they ought to know, and, if they do not know, we will tell them upon authentic information, that there never was a pecuniarily successful season at Castle Garden, at any price,—and more, that, with one exception, there never was a successful season of Italian Opera in this city,—and more, that there never was a successful season of Italian Opera anywhere else and we add that the season at the Academy last year was eminently unsuccessful, in spite of "crowded houses," and that the only season which forms the exception to which we have alluded was one at Astor Place, when, according to the impresario's own confession, the company was the weakest we have had for many a year,—the large receipts having been entirely owing to the fact that the season happened to be one when there were few or no parties and balls among those who are attendants at the Opera, when there was no other entertainment of any kind, suited to their tastes, and when, therefore, the Opera House became a place of tri-weekly reunion, and more fashionable than it ever was before or has been since,—the price of tickets being $1.50 to all parts of the house except the Amphitheatre. By a successful season we of course mean in one which the actual receipts from the sale of tickets covered all expenses and left a fair surplus for the services of the Manager after paying interest on the amount of money invested.

Italian Opera is a luxury which "the mass of the people" do not want to buy, and for which those who do wish to enjoy it must pay accordingly. Such it has ever been and is, and, for a long time at least, such it will be. It is needless to increase the size of Opera Houses and diminish the price of tickets: the Astor Place Opera House was large enough to hold all the people who want to pay even a dollar a ticket to hear Italian Opera thrice a week through a season of fifty nights.

It is usually supposed that the salaries of the principal artists are the only outlay of much moment in conducting an Opera; but there was never a greater mistake; and that our readers may form a just idea of this outlay, we lay before them the following authentic statement of the necessary expenses of an Italian Opera in New York; based upon the judicious arrangements of last season.

To the cry that the salaries of the principal artists are entirely too large, there is the unanswerable reply that these salaries are but a reasonable advance upon those which they command in Europe. People usually talk as if fine voices were to be had for the asking there; but they are very rare; and united to great vocal skill are much rarer still, of course; and when to the demand for that union we add (as we of New York do) another for dramatic power and a fine presence, the thing we ask is rarissimus,—less often to be met with than corresponding abilities in any of the Arts or Sciences or Learned Professions, and must be paid for accordingly,—with this occasion of increment, however,—that whereas the latter may be and generally are exercised during a life time and with increasing profit, as age brings experience, the former are in their prime for only about ten to fifteen years, though in some very rare instances they are tolerably preserved for twenty or twenty-five.

We will have artists of high rank and those who conduct the opera must therefore pay them high salaries. We will insist on a fine mise en scene, (and we do it in the most effectual way,—by staying away from a shabby performance,) and the managers must therefore be at great expense for properties, scenery, secondary artists and supernumeraries. It has been shown again and again, by actual experiment, that there are not enough of us who love Italian opera to support it, for the love of it, at fifty cents a ticket, or one dollar, or one dollar and a half,—the losses on "the Committee's" season last year having been thousands of dollars, in spite of "houses crowded to the roof" [with dead-heads]—and therefore the gentleman who has undertaken the perilous task of directing the opera at the Academy this season has but yielded to absolute necessity in raising the price of tickets to two dollars, leaving the Amphitheatre open, however, at fifty cents.

THE ANCIENT GONDOLIER.

FROM THE GERMAN OF GRAF VON FLATEN.

In explanation of the last stanzas the author has a note: "Angelo Erno was the last of the sea-heroes of Venice, and died a few years before the downfall of the Republic. His statue, which is said by those who knew him to be an excellent likeness, and executed by Canova's master, is at present preserved in St. Blagio. It was formerly in his tomb in the beautiful Gothic church (I. Servi) where his ancestors were buried, but was saved when that building was destroyed by the French. The Doge Paul Renier died in 1788."

I.

There in the sun reclining,
His hoar locks lightly flowing
Upon the breeze that's blowing
The spray above the pier;
And willing with the stranger
Who loiters by him slowly,
He talks in accents lowly—
That ancient Gondolier!

II.

He speaks. "I dared in youthtime
Lagoon and sea and weather,
But now for years together
I have not dipped an oar.

By yonder porch the gondel
In worm-decay is falling,
Since no one needs it, calling
As in the days of yore.

III.

"In foreign climes and distant,
Our house's ancient master
Is deaf to our disaster,
Knows not the victor's lust.
And Fortune ceased forever,
That day her favors shedding,
When Bonaparte was treading
Our standard in the dust!

IV.

"Our lord was full of vigor,
His farewell to us giving,
And if he still is living,
His hair is turned to grey;
And if, said he, it happens,
I serve in foreign borders,
No tyrant with his orders
My bosom shall array.

V.

"All stayed, alas! to witness
The sacrilege, the sunder,
The godless horde for plunder
Despise their broken oath;
We saw the puny villains
The weak Bucentaur tearing,
And inmost sorrow bearing,
We suffered long and loath.

VI.

"Saw from its sacred standard
Our winged Lion wrested,
How heartless victors jested
With oaths and human prey;
We saw destroyed by wantons
What might have stood for ages,
The 'scutcheons and the wages
Of Honor torn away.

VII.

"And yet I live; from story
A few still joys deriving,
My feeble limbs reviving
In morning's sunny glance;
The palace of my master
I shall not leave while living,
His careful hand still giving
A quiet sustenance!

VIII.

"I think on past adventures,
Again as sailor serving
I track the needle's swerving
In sun and storm and all;
And Tunis is blockaded,
And 'gainst the Turkish vessels,
With valiant squadron wrestles
Venetia's admiral!

IX.

"O happy day! when hastened
Our Doge to meet him, sailing
In triumph homeward, hailing
The victor,—and our last!
And when I think about it
My soul grows warm with passion,
And dreamy forms I fashion
That flit, as angels, past!"

Diary Abroad.—No. 22.

BERLIN, SEPT. 12.—A note or two for Oulibicheff, occasioned by a text-book to Don Juan, prepared by Da Ponte himself, some thirty years after Mozart's death, and when that work was already recognized as at the head of opera.

1st. Oulibicheff makes a long discussion of the point where the song of Elvira, added by Mozart for the Vienna stage, should come in; he decides to open the second act with it; Rochlitz made it follow the "Register air." Now Da Ponte himself has placed it after the La ci darem scene. Just as Zerlina finally gives way, Elvira comes in and saves her, declaring the true character of the Don. Eccola Zerlina to join Masetto in the chateau, and the Don, no one knows exactly where. Left alone, Elvira gives utterance to the song in question: Mi tradi quell' alma ingrata, in which she speaks of the struggle within her of love and desire of vengeance. Its connection with the rest seems better here—for now working herself up to the proper pitch of feeling, we are prepared to hear from Leporello afterward, how she followed Zerlina into the chateau and told the peasants and company there all sorts of unpleasant truths about the Don.

2nd. The same writer discusses at length the point of the locality of the scene in the second act, in which Leporello tries to get away from Elvira and is first prevented by Ottavio and Anna, and afterwards by Masetto and Zerlina, and afterwards, to save his life, throws off the Don's hat and cloak, which he still wore and shows the face of the servant where all, especially poor Elvira, expected to see the master. Oulibicheff builds a half-ruined chapel out of the grave yard for these scenes, as being the only means he can think of, of explaining Elvira's expression: Sola, sola in bujo loco. Da Ponte's text makes all clear—the scene is in a cortile interno—the inner court of the house where Elvira is staying. This makes the entire action in this part of the opera clear.

SEPT. 17.—"Tell" was announced but not given the other night. But "Tancredi" was given last night, and here is a letter about it and its author, written during the carnival at Milan, 1814, forty-one and a half years ago! I have found it very interesting.

"The Teatro Ré was opened on the 18th of Dec. (1813) with ROSSINI's opera seria, Tancredi. This work was given for the first time, during the last carnival, in Venice, and afterwards in several of the theatres of Italy, and always with much applause. Here in Milan it has had the same good fortune. The prima donna, Signora SPADA, and Signora BASSI (a native of Milan) who played Tancredi in man's clothes and has a good alto voice, were especially applauded. I wish I could hear this opera with a good chorus and full orchestra.

"Herr Rossini, a native of Pesaro in Romagna, pupil of Father MATTEI in Bologna, is hardly twenty-four years old, and has produced during the last six years, a number of right fine operas. He sang previously, with his mother, in the Bologna theatre. I have made the acquaintance of this artist, and have found him familiar with every species of counterpoint and with HAYDN's and MOZART's music. (In respect to an Italian this is certainly worthy of particular notice.) Haydn's transitions he has succeeded especially in making his own. His music has pleasant melody and is in fact somewhat more manly (generally speaking) than that of any of the present Italian composers, Simon Mayer excepted. Unfortunately this talented artist does not venture far out of the common Italian style; and this because he is afraid of his public. At least he has stated this to me. Still I am not satisfied with this; for Mozart's operas make furor in Italy, and if it be true that some of the masterly numbers in them are only wondered at and not applauded, this is only because they are neither noisy, nor ending with the common Italian cadences, which conditio sine qua non seems very queer to a German. WEIGL and MAYER, who write not always in Italian style, are here heard with enthusiasm. My four years residence in Italy has convinced me, that the Italians are by no means enemies to our robust music (as they are in the habit of calling it), and hear Haydn's "Creation" with just the same delight as many a beautiful feeble work. Why then shall a composer be so afraid of the public here? And where is the fault, that at present an opera so rarely pleases! It lies in this; that the public finds in every new opera and old one—that is—the same arpeggios, the same modulations, the same transitions, the same crescendos and fortes, the same cadenzas, and so on. How entirely different is this in Germany! However, I will pursue this topic no farther, and only remark, that a composer, who is at home in harmony and counterpoint, fully free from prejudice, but in other respects thoroughly Italian, may certainly take more pains in writing an opera, and need not fear to endeavor to lead an Italian public by degrees into better paths in the realm of Harmony."

Rossini's later works must have pleased the writer, whom I have been translating, for they contain no small portion of robust life—as well as animal spirits.

But to Tancred and the impressions made by it.

This old opera has been revived by JOHANNA WAGNER, as the part of the hero, Tancred, is contralto, and she has opportunity to show in perfection her noble voice, her grand dramatic power and her magnificent person in the scale armor of the middle ages. She is so very large that she does not make a small man, even in comparison with the largest members of the company. It is a show piece for her, and last night was her first appearance since her vacation; and from one of the highest seats in the synagogue, which I occupied with the cockloft family, the opera house presented a truly magnificent spectacle—filled full, from those highest seats, where I was, down to the people who had to sit close to the drummers and fiddlers!

But what is Tancred all about?

In those days when the Saracens were spreading their conquests towards the West, they came with good force to beleaguer Syracuse. Unfortunately for the Syracusans, there had been strife and quarreling between Arsir their prince, or the head man of their senate—just what he was does not appear, though he wears a sort of crown—and Orbassan, a powerful knight and one to whom all now look as their champion against the Turks. The opera opens with a chorus of knights expressing their joy that peace has been made between these characters, followed by a duet, with chorus, sung by them, in which in all sorts of roudades they swear to devote all to the cause of fatherland. Arsir presents Orbassan to the knights as their future leader. Orbassan exclaims that in the open field all will willingly stake life and fortune against the foe—but what security have they against treachery and secret perfidy? The old law, replies Arsir, which condemns every one, irrespective of age, sex and condition, who is found guilty of the crime of having an understanding with the Saracen. Then, says Orbassan, there is one whom he fears more than Solamir, the Saracen; and that is the banished Tancred, whom many of the Syracusans speak of with respect and love.

The dialogue then goes on so as to show the spectator that Tancred, at the age of five years, was banished from Syracuse, with his father, and has been reared at Byzantium, that the senate has endowed Orbassan with all the estates of the banished knight; that—how, when and where does not appear—Tancred, and Amenaide, the daughter of Arsir, have known each other only to love, and have loved, to be betrothed; that now Orbassan demands the hand of Amenaide, and the king is forced by the exigency of affairs to grant him his daughter.

Amenaide is called into the presence of her father and the knights, and there informed that she must give heart and hand to Orbassan. She has a bosom friend, Isaura, whose business is to sing in the duets, trios and other concerted pieces of the opera, and to talk with Amenaide so as to let the audience know how matters in general are getting on—so Isaura is a very valuable personage—operatically considered.

See the wondrous art of the poet.

Arsir.—For thy hand, thy troth

Sues, as husband, Orbassan.

Amenaide.—Orbassan! Dio! Isaura!

Isaura.—Be on your guard!

Amenaide.—My letter!

Isaura.—To Tancred? Your messenger is already on his way.

During this by-play, Orbassan grows impatient for the young lady's answer—etc., etc.: finally he gets the wedding put off until to-morrow.

Scene changes. Coast of Sicily, view out at sea. A boat comes to the landing-place filled with warriors, among whom is one young, tall, straight, slender, clothed in scale armor, who comes on shore and the whole audience begins to clap as if crazy at seeing Johanna Wagner—I mean Tancred—on his native shores again. Tancred comes forward with his hand on his breast, bowing, I suppose, to fatherland, whom he immediately addresses in a recitative full of roudades,—speaks of his joy at seeing it, and the like; then he passes to his delight at the prospect of seeing Amenaide again, whom, for all that appears, he saw for the last time when he was five years of age. But the critics tell us we must not judge of human passion in hot climates by our own experience, so I suppose it is all right to an Italian audience. Then follows an air—the first six lines nothing particular, but —halloo! there is our old acquaintance, dating from that ancient time when I had the measles, flute mania and other contagious diseases of boydom. I tooted it up stairs and down stairs, and in my mother's chamber, in the garret, in the woodshed,—and, for aught I know, its ghost may even now at times sing softly in the ears of the strangers who occupy the dear old dwelling.

Di tanti pal - pi - ti fra tan - te

This will never do. I shall diarize all day at this rate.

Well. Tancred sends his servant to invite Amenaide to meet a strange knight in the grove, and orders his followers to plant his standard in the square of the citadel and proclaim that a strange knight has come to offer his services in aid of Syracuse.

Tancred steps aside, hearing Arsir with his daughter, and followers approach. Arsir tells her there is no use in crying, and all that sort of thing—she must reward Orbassan for his aid, and that their dangers are now greater, as Tancred is said to have landed—but he is a traitor, who is condemned by the senate, and if he is caught, will “catch it.” She feels badly. Then every body goes away and leaves her out there in the woods. What if the Saracens come! She begins to pray that divine power will shield and save Tancred. Her prayer is interrupted by him, she expresses her fears for him, and all he thinks of is her love, his danger is nothing. She has to tell him that she cannot longer bestow that love upon him. So he feels badly too, and the first act ends with a duet, in which one must have the score to decide which has the most roudades and short corners to turn, and runs diatonic and chromatic, and cadenzas and all those various instruments for representing deep passion.

Act II. Tancred will, in spite of the arguments of Roderick, his servant, offer himself as a knight for the defence of the city and departs upon that errand. He finds Arsir in the midst of his knights just going to the marriage ceremony of his daughter and Orbassan. The young lady is in a fuster at seeing Tancred approach, and is so overcome by her love for him, that, when her father commands her to follow him (to church, I suppose) she exclaims, “O father, mercy! I the wife of Orbassan! Death rather!” Then Orbassan feels badly. He exclaims in a raging voice (he sings bass), “Yes, be yours the death of shame and disgrace!”

Then there is a tumult.

The upshot of the matter is that some of Orbassan's men saw a messenger hurrying to the Saracenic camp and shot him with arrows; upon his corpse was found a letter in Amenaide's hand and with her name signed to it, in which she invited some one—it is understood by all that this some body was Solamir—to come to Syracuse and reign. So she is condemned to death. There is a great deal of recitative and air in which she declares her innocence, and Tancred calls her traitor to love and duty and the like. It never occurs to her to tell Tancred that the letter was meant for him—a want of presence of mind upon her part, which gives an opportunity to the poet to make three acts of the play, and the composer to write two or three quartets and quintets with chorus.

Act III. Amenaide is in prison. Orbassan comes with soldiers and watchmen to conduct her to death. Arsir, overcome with his affection, comes to go with her and die. Tancred comes to throw down his gage to prove her innocence in single combat with Orbassan—though he believes her guilty. Orbassan, as accuser, cannot help himself; and we learn afterwards, by hearsay, that Tancred killed him, and, having delivered Amenaide, goes off into the mountains to hide himself, and like Don Quixote, reflect upon his unlucky love.

Now the people need a leader, and having found out, probably from Amenaide, that the strange knight is Tancred, they come out at night to seek him, with Arsir and Amenaide and others—Amenaide without ever throwing a shawl over her shoulders as a protection against the cold mountain air of night! Though Tancred will have nothing to do with his lady-love, he will go out and fight the Saracens. Then we have a scene in which some forty persons with straight swords and lances—Christians—run across the stage followed by about as many with crooked swords and turbans—Turks; and the Turks run back again, followed by the Christians, and swords are clashed against each other—and all the while the orchestra is playing what the text-book calls “battle music”—I am not going to say that this is inferior to the battle music in Beethoven's “Battle of Vittoria”—and Syracuse is delivered.

Then Tancred comes and makes love to Amenaide, and tells her that he killed Solamir with his own hand, and the dying Saracen assured him of her innocence,—and every body forgets that he, Tancred, is condemned as a banished traitor to death, and all ends happily!

As to the music, it is as pretty as one shall hear on a summer's day. Bostonians, who know “Moses in Egypt” by rote, have heard the whole of it—this is the bud, that is the flower. A thinner score one can hardly imagine. Everything is written for the voice, and for the voice to show itself off. Long passages occur entirely unaccompanied; others with a single instrument as in a quartet, where one clarinet plays the soprano note for note to keep all in tune; others still with the thinnest arpeggios. The contrasts with the high-sounding phrases of the poetry, which the light, jolly music is continually making, are funny enough.

No wonder that Tancred was so popular when it first appeared, for certainly, if the great object of music is to amuse the auditor and while away an evening pleasantly to the sound of sweet music, I do not know a piece better adapted to the end. I enjoyed it hugely. How much of this enjoyment arose from the interest I felt in it as a work notable in the history of music, how much from the fascinations of glorious Johanna Wagner, how much from the fun of comparing the music with the text and situations to which it is composed, how much from comparing Rossini, the youth, with Rossini, the man, and how much from the intrinsic excellence of the music—can only be determined after several hearings.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, OCT. 20, 1855.

Boston Public Library—Books on Music.

This new and excellent institution, already so useful to the thousands who seek knowledge “without money and without price,” and so rapidly growing, seems to be as wisely managed as it has been munificently endowed. The plan of its founders and conductors meets with universal sympathy, and new means flow in from generous sources so continually that it bids fair before long to rival, and in some important features surpass the finest libraries in the country, and become what a public library should be,—a collection, freely accessible to all, of all the printed sources of information in every department of human knowledge; where the young mind possessed by whatever genius or direction towards any branch of literature or art or science, may find the books pertaining to its speciality; where the materials of the broadest culture, of satisfaction or stimulus for every sort of healthy intellectual appetite may be had for the asking.

We are glad to know that the directors of the Library construe their duty in this large and liberal spirit. They mean that the young man, whose calling is in the direction of the mechanic arts, shall find the books he wants there, as well as the ordinary supplies of history, theology, metaphysics, and light reading.

Nor will the Fine Arts be neglected. Our purpose is at present only to congratulate those whom it may concern upon the steps already taken to supply one desideratum in all the libraries which we have hitherto known. We have many times spoken of the want of a good musical library in this country. It is a sign of the increasing regard for Music as a branch of social culture, that the directors of the Public Library have also taken this matter in hand. It has been our pleasant task, within a few weeks, to furnish, at their suggestion, a list of some three hundred volumes relating to Music, as a basis for purchases in that department. The list embraces most of the more important works of a scientific, historical, biographical, æsthetical, practical, or merely amusing character, which may tend to interest and instruct those who have any turn that way. Of course the most valuable of these are to be found outside of the English language, especially in the German and the French; but in all cases a good English translation, where it exists, will be preferred. There will be much which any one may read; but there will be also provision for the wants of the deeper and more enterprising student.

This is as it should be. This is a good beginning, if but a beginning. But it is contemplated to go still further, and as fast as practicable to embrace not only the literature and science of music, not only the books written about music, but also the most important printed or copied scores of music itself, from the earlier masters down, so that the history of the art may in course of time exhibit itself with some completeness upon the shelves of this general treasury of knowledge. Such a prospect must make glad the heart of our friend the "Diarist", who has written us in times past such glowing accounts of the royal library at Berlin, with its 50,000 works in the department of Music, and from that text has been urging upon us the importance of a musical library at home here in New England. Patience! the germ is started.

Mlle. Parodi's Concerts.

We have had two concerts this week, and are to have a third, by Mlle. Teresa PARODI, (whom some of our readers remember as a prima donna of the physical forcible tragedy school in Maretzek's opera some four years since), under the shrewd management and with the ear-tickling aid of the piano virtuoso, STRAKOSCH, and the additional attractions of Mme. AMELIA PATTI STRAKOSCH, Sig. LEONARDI, Mr. ARTHURSON, and M. APPY. As we remembered Parodi, she was far from being either the best or the worst of the many distinguished singers who have come over to us, and it was not without surprise that we read the very glowing accounts of these concerts in New York and Philadelphia, before they came to our turn. The wonder was soon accounted for, by the great increase in power, as well as richness, of the lady's voice, by the great physical and as it were passionate intensity which she throws into her strong passages, by her abundance of energetic, brilliant, rather than refined bravura execution, and by the popular kind of tact with which her programmes are made up.

The entertainments of Tuesday and Thursday evenings were ingenious and taking specimens of miscellaneous vocal virtuoso concerts. The programmes showed (rather rhetorically) a sparkling variety of pieces, of very various schools. Those of Tuesday, were, to be sure, rather hacknied, but perhaps none the less popular for that. At all events the Music Hall was more than half filled at the dollar price, and loud and long and frequent were the clappings of hands. There was something in every effort that touched just those who carry their hearts in their hands.

M. APPY opened the concert with the Andante of Mendelssohn's violin concerto;—an exquisite piece, and played with perfect finish, taste and purity of style; for this young Belgian is one of the best of the violinists, a modest, earnest artist. Next came the famous street-organ ditty: "I dreamt that I dwelt in marble halls", sung in a rich, strong, clarinet-like contralto by Mme. STRAKOSCH, who has mastered English quite well, and made herself quite popular by singing several English ballads in the course of the two evenings. There is a certain force and simplicity in her singing, but not much delicacy, and you miss the graceful archness of "If a body", &c. Her "Brindisi" from Lucrezia Borgia was better, though lacking the fine poetic frenzy. Then came "Ah, mon fils" (in Italian) from the Prophète, which we liked the best of any of PARODI's efforts. The richness and largeness of her voice told grandly in it, and there was a good deal of dramatic fervor and simplicity in her delivery. Her next piece was the everlasting Casta diva, which we had heard from three several hand-organs only the night before. But all the great singers sang it, therefore she must. There was lack of tenderness, of sentiment, and more of free and easy than of fine and graceful execution in the first part. But in the quick movement she carried her audience by storm, by the energy of her delivery and the ringing richness of her great voice. Mendelssohn's two-part song: "I would that my love", between her and Mme. Strakosch, rang richly also, but was greatly hurried. Sig. LEONARDI, with a strong, but rather dry quality of baritone, and apparently laboring under timidity, sang Gran Dio! from Ernani, quite acceptably. The tremendous bass song from 'Elijah': Is not his word like a fire? the next night, was too much for him, as for any but the greatest basses, yet he gave it with fair execution. Mr. STRAKOSCH, both nights, played several of his brilliant fantasia and variation pieces, mostly abounding in the same set patterns of rapid scales and arpeggios, upon a new Chickering Grand of very remarkable power and brilliancy, which seemed precisely suited to his touch and purpose. There is an exceeding purity, liquidity and brilliancy in his touch, and a happy study of euphony in his combinations; but he is more fond of glitter than of gold in his selections; (perhaps the gold comes after!) One of his pieces was fitly named 'Musical Rockets'. Of all we heard, his "Sylphide" had the most of grace and individuality about its sparkle. Mr. Strakosch was also accompanist general to all the other pieces, sometimes thumping rather ponderously in his basses. The second part we did not hear.

Thursday's programme was much richer in good things. One even fancied a reference to the LIND and SONTAG concerts, seeing the scena from Freyschütz, the romanza: Robert, toi que j'aime, Haydn's "With verdure clad," the trio from Don Juan, and duet from Norma, all set down for one prima donna. But however ambitious the undertaking, one could not but be thankful for the distribution of so many real gems, German as well as Italian, among the merely taking matters. The Freyschütz scena: Wie nahte mir der Schlummer, was sung in Italian, without the depth of pious, love-fraught feeling, that pervades the music, but with a certain superb abandon and largeness of voice in the joyful finale, which more than atoned to the many.—Robert was quite effective. "With verdure clad" did not even elicit great applause; it lacked all the tenderness and sweetness and subdued fervor which even our largest concert-going public has long known how to associate with the exquisite melody. It was rather a coarse kind of execution, and there was more force than beauty in that long wild Indian sort of a trill in which she at one time indulged. We cannot agree with those who say that Parodi sings with feeling, that she has true dramatic fire and pathos, that she beats the greater singers by singing more directly to the heart. We are afraid we must explain the testimony by referring again to the Home Journal's happy expression: "something" in all men "which answers for a heart." We fear it was to that mainly that the appeal was made, for verily the heart, the real inmost soul and spirit of a man is often moved more deeply, and set to vibrating far longer by a subdued and quiet, than by such an energetic and demonstrative rendering of what we call passion. To those who feel most, and who most crave feeling, it sounds physical and cold. We only speak of it because of the unjust issue continually raised by those who preach up "music of the heart" versus the music which is coldly "classical" and "scientific". We must protest the coldness lies more on the other side, clapping of hands to the contrary.

That evening Mr. ARTHURSON, who sang that truly beautiful and soul-ful tenor aria: Cara imagine, from Mozart's "Magic Flute," and sang it in his usual chaste style, with true feeling, was (it was encouraging to see) heard through with attention and respect, but not immensely applauded. Was it not intrinsically the best thing of the evening? In the Trio from Don Juan, too, he sustained his part finely, although at odds against the outward brilliancy of the two soprano voices. The piece was warmly encored. The duet-tino by Wallace: "Love's approach," was a very sparkling affair, and given effectively by the two ladies. Mme. STRAKOSCH also sang a ballad by Kücken very prettily. The concert, as before, was opened by M. APPY, who played De Beriot's sixth Concerto in his artistic manner. The "Ricci" waltz variations were volunteered by Parodi, after an encore, and given in her dazzling, dashing style, as doubtless were the Variations di bravura by Hummel, which we did not stop to hear.

Musical Chat-Chat.

THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB announce their series of classical Chamber Concerts, and we hope all the lovers of such, who should be many, good and true by this time, will promptly bear their testimony on the subscription lists.... The preparations for the ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS are progressing favorably.... Miss PHILLIPPS has been giving concerts in Providence and New Bedford.... Miss HENSLER won substantial honors in Masaniello last week, and still more in the part of Adalgisa to LAGRANGE's Norma. The critics say we have never had so good an Adalgisa.... The Prophète is soon coming on at the Academy, but we hear nothing further of the engagement of ROGER, nor has CASTELLAN yet arrived.... GOTTSCHALK has been entrancing the Philadelphia critics by his pianism; his fantasias on Lombardi and Lucia, his interweavings of "God save the Queen", "Yankee Doodle" and "Hail Columbia", his Bananier and Banjo, &c., are as much admired as ever.

Last Sunday evening the pious city of Providence for the first time broke the ice in the matter of Sacred Concerts. A vocal and instrumental concert, "exclusively of sacred music", was given for the benefit of the Norfolk and Portsmouth sufferers, under the direction of Mr. HENRY AHNER, ex-Germanian, now settled in that city. The programme for such a beginning, considering the necessity of various attraction, presented some fine features, and recalls the palmy days of the Germanians in Boston. An orchestra of twenty performed Mehul's overture to "Joseph", a couple of movements from Mendelssohn's Symphony: "Song of Praise", and concluded the concert with an arrangement of "Old Hundred". Those old German chorals, richly harmonized for orchestra, are among our most satisfactory reminiscences of the Germania Society. Miss BOTHAMLY, of our city, sang "Mighty Jehovah" from "David", and the song "Ruth and Naomi." Mr. MOZART sung Paesello's "Fall of Zion"; and these with resident amateurs gave the quartet, Quando Corpus, and the prayer from "Moses". There was also a prayer by Otto, arranged for four instruments by Mr. Ahner, an Adagio Religioso played by SCHULTZ on the violin, and a cornet solo: Cujus animam, by Ahner. Good for Providence! We are glad to hear that Mr. Ahner intends giving more sacred concerts. The worldly stumbling-block of ticket-selling was ingeniously got over by the following passage in the advertisement:—"There will be no tickets sold after Saturday night. Any one wishing to procure a ticket on the evening of the concert can do so by leaving their name at the door. The tickets paid for at Leland's music store on the following day."

Some idea of the enormous amount of music publishing carried on in Boston may be formed from Mr. OLIVER DITSON's catalogue. From this we learn that he publishes nearly 300 bound volumes. Of these, 69 are methods of instruction, studies and exercises for the piano, 11 for the organ, 27 for the voice, 8 for the guitar, 1 for the harp, 9 for the melodeon and seraphine, 8 for the accordion and satina, 13 for the violin, 10 for the flute, 2 for the clarinet, 1 for the fife, 2 for the banjo, 4 for the violoncello, 1 for the bassoon, 1 for the dulcimer, 5 for the bugle, 1 for the sax-horn, 1 for the post-horn, 1 for the cornopeon, 16 on harmony, thorough bass, &c., 24 collections of instrumental music, 36 operas, glee-books, &c., 5 juvenile introduction books, and collections of music, and 16 oratorios, masses and collections of church music. The Catalogue of Sheet Music is a large volume of 428 pages, filled with merely the names and prices of the pieces, each piece occupying but a single line. They are classified under their appropriate heads—songs, American and Foreign, duets, overtures, battles, sonatas, glees and choruses, rondos, airs, and opera music, variations, waltzes, polkas, quadrilles, gallopadas, marches, quicksteps, &c.

Our tasteful tenor, Mr. ARTHURSON, is to sing in Philadelphia next Tuesday evening, in the opening concert of the "Musical Union" of Profs. ROHR, THUNDER and CROUCH. He is to sustain the part of Joseph in Mehul's oratorio: "Joseph and his Brethren," which has been translated by Prof. CROUCH.... Musical movements seem to be vigorously commencing in the City of Brotherly Love. The Harmonia Sacred Music Society announce three Concerts under the direction of LEOPOLD MEIGNEN, and Mr. MICHAEL CROSS as pianist and organist. Haydn's "Creation" is to be the main feature. SIG. PERELLI has commenced his singing classes for ladies in the Musical Fund Hall, and M. THORBECK, the classical pianist, is preparing his annual series of Chamber Concerts.... Fitzgerald's City Item states that the Centennial anniversary of Mozart's birth will be celebrated in Philadelphia, on the 27th of January, by a grand choral and instrumental festival, in which the Twelfth Mass will be a leading feature.

JOHANNES BRAHMS, the wonderful young pianoforte composer, whom Schumann pronounced the "Messias" of a new era, is about to make a concert tour through Germany as a Pianist.... RUBINSTEIN is in Dresden.... MARIE WIECK has returned from her Italian tour to Dresden, where she is to give some concerts.... In the list of new music published in Germany, we observe an overture to Longfellow's Drama: "The Spanish Student," for orchestra, and Piano for four hands, by ARTHUR O'LEARY, op. 3.... The Signale speaks of a gigantic organ rapidly approaching its completion, for the cathedral at Ulm. It is built by WALKER, and is said to be larger than any organ in the world. It will have one hundred registers; 25 of them are already in a condition to be played upon. In quality of tone too it is magically fine.... A musical festival was to take place at Munich on the 4th and 5th of October under the direction of Herr LACHNER. The first Concert was to consist of Haydn's "Creation;" the second of Beethoven's C minor Symphony, a part of Gluck's Orfeo, a Psalm of Mendelssohn, Introduction from Jessonda, a Suite of Bach, &c., &c.; the performances to commence at noon each day.... A new History of the Greek Music, by C. F. WEITZMANN, has made its appearance in Berlin, and is highly spoken of, as containing all that is essentially known of the matter, without being pedantically minute. The subject is divided as follows: I. The obscure period, 1500 to 1000 B. C. The Hymns of the Priests. II. The Homeric Period. 1000.—700 B. C. The heroic songs of the rhapsodists. III. The Creative Period. 700—555 B. C. Lyric Poets and Musicians. IV. The Period of full bloom. 555—440 B. C. The Drama. V. The Period of decline. 440—300 B. C. and following. 'The Theorists.

LEONARD MAELZEL, inventor of the Metronome, Automaton chess-player, Panharmonicon, (composed of 42 automata, which executed all the great musical scores, especially Mozart's Don Giovanni, Gluck's Iphigenie en Aulide, and Spontini's Vestale, and which is said to be now in Boston,) and who made ear trumpets for Beethoven, died the 7th September in Vienna, aged 79. He was born in Regensburg in 1776.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

CHURCH ORGANS. COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

WM. B. D. SIMMONS, Organ Builder,
(Heretofore doing business in the style of Wm. B. D. SIMMONS & Co.) and

GEORGE FISHER,

Of Cambridge, have this day formed a Copartnership for continuing the manufacture of Church Organs.

We design to keep in our Warerooms New Instruments for sale at prices from $400 to $1,600 each, and are prepared to build by contract at the shortest notice, Organs, worth from $800 to $12,000. And by prompt and faithful execution of orders hope to merit a like encouragement to that heretofore extended to Wm. B. D. SIMMONS, and which has indicated the necessity of this business connection, that his entire attention may be devoted to the more difficult and artistic parts of the business, so that an increase thereof may cause no diminution of the personal attention which is requisite for the maintenance of the CHARACTER of our instruments, upon which we rely for success.

While it will be our aim and ambition to furnish ORGANS OF A PERFECTION OF TONE AND MECHANISM, AND OF AN ELEGANCE OF EXTERIOR UNRIVALLED, we are confident of ability to offer terms MORE FAVORABLE THAN CAN BE OBTAINED ELSEWHERE, for the following reasons: Having ample means, we can purchase in large quantities at first cost, for cash; can always command the most talented assistants, and also do sufficient business to practise division of labor, which, by assigning parts to workmen skilled in their particular branch, necessarily insures better work at less expense. Our Manufactory, by its proximity to Charles river, enables us to receive lumber direct from the vessel at first cost, and having been erected expressly for the business, is in arrangement, size, convenience and its facilities unequalled, being furnished with steam engine, steam-heated drying-house, planing, grooving, matching, moulding, tenoning, boring, and other machines, together with lath scroll, circular and other saws, &c., all operated by steam power.

These facilities are such as are possessed by no other manufacturer of Organs in this country, and of themselves would enable us to furnish instruments, with a fair profit, at a price which those of like quality must cost builders who have work done by hand that can be better executed at half the cost by steam machinery.

Second hand Organs at all times for sale.

Orders for tuning church organs promptly attended to, and contracts taken for tuning by the year.
Orders respectfully solicited.

FIRST PREMIUM MELODEONS,

The Very Best now Manufactured.

S. D. & H. W. SMITH respectfully call the attention of the public to their IMPROVED MELODEONS, constantly on exhibition at their Warerooms,

No. 417 Washington Street.

By means of a new method of voicing, known only to themselves, they have succeeded in removing the harsh and buzzing sound which formerly characterized the instrument, rendering the tones full, clear and organ-like. The action is prompt and reliable, enabling the performer to execute the most rapid music without obscuring the tones. The swell is arranged to give great expression.

The manufacturers received the First Premium, over all competitors, at the Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association; also at the Metropolitan Mechanics' Fair, held at Washington, D. C.

For the Parlor, instruments are furnished at prices varying from $45 to $150.

Larger instruments, with two banks of keys, for chapels and small churches, from $150 to $300.

This last instrument, known as the ORGAN HARMONIUM, has been essentially improved by Messrs. Smith, and they have secured a patent therefor.

Persons who wish to hire Melodeons with a view of purchasing at the end of the year, can have the rents credited as part payment of the purchase money.

Life of John Sebastian Bach;

WITH A CRITICAL VIEW OF HIS COMPOSITIONS, BY J. N. FOKKEL.

CHAPTER I.

If ever there was a family in which an extraordinary disposition for the same art seemed to be hereditary, it was certainly the family of Bach; through six successive generations there were scarcely two or three members of it who had not received from nature the gift of a very distinguished talent for music, and who did not make the practice of this art the main occupation of their lives.

The ancestor of this family, which has become so remarkable in the history of music, was Veit Bach. He was a baker at Presburg, in Hungary: but on the breaking out of the religious troubles in the 16th century, he was obliged to seek for another place of abode. He saved as much of his property as he could, and retired with it to Thuringia, where he hoped to find peace and security. The place in which he settled was called Wechmar, a village near Saxe Gotha. Here he soon recommenced his trade of a baker and miller; but in his leisure hours he amused himself with his guitar, which he even took with him into the mill, and played upon it amidst all the noise and clatter of the mill. He communicated this inclination for music to his two sons, they again to their children, till by degrees there arose a very numerous family, all of whom were not only musical, but made music their chief business, and soon had in their possession most of the offices of chanters, organists, and town musicians in Thuringia.

All these Bachs cannot possibly have been great masters; but some members at least, in every generation, particularly distinguished themselves. Thus already in the first quarter of the seventeenth century, three grandsons of their common ancestor were so eminent, that the then reigning Count of Schwarzburg Arnstadt thought it worth while to send them at his own expense to Italy, at that time the great school of music, to perfect themselves. We cannot say how far they may have answered the expectations of their patron, since none of their works have come down to our times. In the fourth generation there were some members of this family who were still more distinguished, and several pieces of whose composition have been preserved, by the care of John Sebastian Bach. The most remarkable of them were—

1st. John Christopher, court and town organist at Eisenach. He was particularly happy in the invention of beautiful melodies, and in the expression of his text. In the archives of the Bachs, as they were called, which C. Ph. Emanuel possessed, in Hamburg, there was among other pieces a motet of his composition, in which he had ventured to make use of the extreme sixth, which in his day was considered an extremely bold attempt. He was also an uncommon master of full harmony, as is proved by a piece of church music composed by him for Michaelmas-day, to the words "Es erhub sich ein Streit," &c. which has twenty-two obligato parts, and yet is perfectly pure in respect to the harmony. A second proof of his great skill in harmony is, that he is stated never to have played on the organ and clavichord with less than five necessary, or obligato parts. C. Ph. Emanuel had a particular esteem for him. It is still quite fresh in my remembrance how good-naturedly the old man smiled at me, at the most remarkable and hazardous passages, when he once gave me the pleasure, in Hamburg, of letting me hear some of those old pieces.

2nd. John Michael, organist and town-clerk, in the Bailliage of Gehren. He was a younger brother of the preceding, and, was, like him, a very excellent composer. In the archives just mentioned, there are some motets of his, among which is one with a double chorus for eight voices, and several single pieces of church music.

3rd. John Bernhard, musician to the Prince's Chapel, and organist at Eisenach. He is said to have composed remarkably fine overtures in the French style.

Not only the above-mentioned, but many other able composers of the earlier generations of the family, might undoubtedly have obtained much more important musical offices, as well as a more extensive reputation, and a more brilliant fortune, if they had been inclined to leave their native province, Thuringia, and to make themselves known in other countries, both in and out of Germany. But we do not find that any one of them ever had an inclination for such an emigration: temperate and frugal by nature and education, they required but little to live, and the intellectual enjoyment which their art procured them, enabled them to be content not only without the gold chains, which used at that time to be given by great men to esteemed artists, as especial marks of honor, but also, without the least envy to see them worn by others, who perhaps, without those chains would not have been happy.

Besides this happy contentedness, which is indispensable to the cheerful enjoyment of life, the different members of this family had a very great attachment to each other. As it was impossible for them all to live in one place, they resolved to see each other at least once a year, and fixed a certain day on which they were all to appear at an appointed place. Even after the family had become much more numerous, and many of the members had been obliged to settle out of Thuringia, in different places of Upper and Lower Saxony, and Franconia, they continued their annual meetings, which generally took place at Erfurt, Eisenach, or Arnstadt. Their amusements during the time of their meeting were entirely musical. As the company wholly consisted of chanters, organists, and town musicians, who had all to do with the church, and it was besides a general custom to begin everything with religion, the first thing they did when they were assembled, was to sing a hymn in chorus. From this pious commencement they proceeded to drolleries, which often made a very great contrast with it. They sang, for instance, popular songs, the contents of which were partly comic, and partly licentious, all together and extempore, but in such a manner, that the several songs thus extemporized, made a kind of harmony together, the words, however, in every part being different. They called this kind of extemporary chorus, "a Quodlibet," and not only laughed heartily at it themselves, but excited an equally hearty and irresistible laughter in everybody that heard them; some persons are inclined to consider these facetiae as the beginning of comic operettas in Germany; but such Quodlibets were usual in Germany at a much earlier period: I possess, myself, a printed collection of them, which was published in Vienna in 1542.

Yet the above-mentioned cheerful Thuringians, as well as some of their later descendants, who made a more serious and worthy use of their art, would not have escaped oblivion, had not, at length, a man arisen among them, whose genius and reputation beamed forth with such splendor, that a part of this light was reflected upon them; this man was John Sebastian Bach, the ornament of his family, the pride of his country, and the most highly-gifted favorite of the musical art.

CHAPTER II.

JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH was born March 21, 1685, at Eisenach, where his father, John Ambrosius, was musician to the court and to the town. This J. A. Bach had a twin-brother, John Christopher, who was musician to the court and town at Arnstadt, and was so very like him, that even their own wives could not distinguish them, except by their dress. These twins were perhaps singular in their kind, and the most remarkable ever known. They tenderly loved each other; their voice, disposition, the style of their music, and everything, in short, was alike in them. If one was ill, the other was so likewise: they died also within a short time of each other. They were a subject of astonishment to all who saw them.

In the year 1695, when John Sebastian was not quite ten years of age, his father died: he had lost his mother at an earlier period. Being left an orphan, he was obliged to have recourse to an elder brother, John Christopher, who was organist at Ordruff. From him he received the first instruction in playing on the clavichord. But his inclination and talent for music must have been very great at that time, since the pieces his brother gave him to learn were so soon in his power, that he began, with much eagerness, to look out for some that were more difficult. The most celebrated composers for the clavichord in those days were Froberger, Fischer, John Casp. Kerl, Pachelbel, Buxtehude, Bruhns, Böhm, &c. He had observed that his brother had a book in which there were several pieces of the above-mentioned authors, and earnestly begged him to give it to him; but it was constantly denied him. His desire to possess the book was increased by the refusal, so that he at length sought for means to get possession of it secretly. As it was kept in a cupboard which had only a lattice-door, and his hands were still small enough to pass through, so that he could roll up the book, which was merely stitched in paper, and draw it out, he did not long hesitate to make use of these favorable circumstances. But for want of a candle he could only copy it in moonlight nights; and it took six whole months before he could finish his laborious task. At length, when he thought himself safely possessed of the treasure, and intended to make good use of it in secret, his brother found it out, and took from him, without pity, the copy which had cost him so much pains; and he did not recover it till his brother's death, which took place soon after.

John Sebastian, being thus again left destitute, went, in company of one of his school-fellows, named Erdmann, afterwards Russian Resident in Dantzic, to Lüneburg, and engaged there in their choir of St. Michael's School as a treble or soprano singer. His fine treble voice procured him here a good livelihood; but he soon lost it, and did not immediately acquire another good voice in its room.

His inclination to play on the clavichord and organ was as ardent at this time as in his more early years, and impelled him to try to see and to hear everything which, according to the ideas he then entertained, would contribute to his improvement. With this view he not only went several times while he was a scholar, from Lüneburg to Hamburg, to hear the organist, John Adam Reinken, who was at that time very famous, but sometimes also to Zell, in order to get acquainted with the prince's band, which consisted chiefly of Frenchmen, and with the French taste, which was then a novelty in those parts.

It is not known on what occasion he removed from Lüneburg to Weimar; but it is certain that he became court musician there in 1703, when he was just eighteen years of age. He exchanged this place, in the following year, for that of organist to the new church at Arnstadt, probably to be able to follow his inclination for playing on the organ, better than he could do at Weimar, where he was engaged to play the violin. Here he began most zealously to make use of all the works of the organists at that time celebrated, which he could procure in his situation, to improve both in composition and the art of playing on the organ; and to gratify his desire of learning, even made a journey on foot to Lubeck, to hear Diederich Buxtehude, organist to St. Mary's church in that city, with whose compositions he was always acquainted. For almost a year he remained a secret hearer of this organist, who was really a man of talent, and much celebrated in his times, and then returned with an increased stock of knowledge to Arnstadt.

The efforts of his zeal and persevering diligence must have already excited great attention at this time, for he received, in quick succession, several offers of places as organist. Such a place was offered to him in the year 1707, in the church of St. Blasius at Mühlhausen, which he accepted. But a year after he had entered upon it, making a journey to Weimar to perform before the reigning duke, his performance on the organ was so highly approved of, that he was offered the place of court organist, which he accepted. The extended sphere of action for his art in which he here lived, impelled him to exert himself to the utmost; and it was probably during this period that he not only made himself so able a performer on the organ, but also laid the foundation of his great compositions for that instrument. He had still further occasion to improve in his art when his prince, in 1717, appointed him director of the concerts, in which office he had to compose and execute pieces of sacred music.

Handel's master, Zachau, organist at Halle, died about this time; and J. S. Bach, whose reputation was now already high, was invited to succeed him. He, in fact, went to Halle, to prove his qualifications, by performing a piece as a specimen of his skill. However, for what reason is not known, he did not enter upon the office, but left it to a noble scholar of Zachau's, of the name of Kirchhof.

The Band of George the Fourth.

From a Correspondent of the Brighton (Eng.) Gazette.

The Private Band of George IV. was, in its time, acknowledged to be one of the best in Europe. It was originally formed from the band of the 10th Hussars, of which regiment the king, when Prince of Wales, was the colonel. The prince, being a good amateur on the violoncello, and passionately fond of music, took the greatest interest in bringing this band to such perfection, that it was universally acknowledged "to have no equal," and became ultimately of European celebrity. No musician of any importance came to this country without visiting Brighton to hear the prince's band. Various methods were resorted to in order to obtain the most proficient talent. Christian Kramer, a Hanoverian and pupil of Winter, was placed at the head. He was a remarkable man. As an arranger for a large military band he was almost unequalled; the quantity that he did for this band was prodigious. Part of it consisted of the whole of Mozart's symphonies, all his overtures, the grand finales to his operas, besides all the choicest trios, duets, etc., all the symphonies of Haydn, several of Beethoven's, Rossini's and Paer's overtures, with the grand finales of their operas, Boieldieu's works, Cherubini's overtures, Anacreon, Lodoiska, and Les deux Journées, the whole of the opera of Mehul's Joseph, and the best of Händel's choruses. The books accumulated to such a degree that 800 were nightly given out in boxes placed beside the stands, which were made of solid mahogany, each lighted by two wax candles. No one knew the capabilities, capacities, and the good effects to be brought out of the various instruments better than Kramer; he played almost every one over which he presided, and could dictate the best mode of fingering any difficult passage that occurred. Like his royal master, Kramer was a great sufferer from the gout, and it was no unusual thing to hear the king, after a simultaneous attack, inquiring of Kramer what were the means adopted to rid himself of so troublesome a companion, and many were the jokes that passed between them on those occasions, for Kramer piqued himself upon being a wit, and was quite at ease with his royal master.

The ships bringing French prisoners from Spain were examined for the purpose of finding any musical talent that might be in them; and Eisert, a German, was transposed from a prison to a palace to become the first and most brilliant player of the clarionets. Kramer periodically visited Germany, and engaged the best talent he could find. The following was the strength of the band in its best days: 12 clarionets, 3 oboes, 3 flutes, 4 bassoons, 2 corni bassetti, 4 horns, 4 trumpets, 2 serpens, 4 trombones, bass, 2 trombones, alto and tenor, 2 drums; total, 42.

When it is considered that every individual of this number was of first-rate talent, some idea may be formed of the effect such an assemblage of wind instruments would produce. Most of the cleverest players had individually been masters of bands. Schmidt was allowed to be the first trumpet in Europe. His flourish was the most terrific and appalling thing ever heard from a musical instrument. The trumpets and kettle drums were of solid silver. The elder Distin was one of the trumpets. The horns, Messrs. Hardy, were very clever performers, whether as regards taste, tone, or execution. They are now the horns of her present Majesty's Private Band. The serpent, André, was one of the lions of the band. Kramer had taken great pains to render this hitherto difficult instrument more available. He invented an instrument that was played entirely with keys instead of holes for the fingers; and no musical visitor of any eminence came without hearing André's performance of one of Corelli's trios. Weitzig was the 1st Fagotto; he became afterwards master of the Guards (Blue's) Band.

Albrecht, Schroeder, and Berhns were the trombones, and most efficient ones they were.

When the band was in its infancy, two celebrated horn players, the Rehn's, joined it; one, afterwards, the prince took much notice of. At that time it was no unusual thing to see the prince's arm linked in Rehn's, giving directions and instructions. In after years it was an interesting sight, when the king was visited by some of the ambassadors, such as Prince Esterhazy, Prince Lieven, etc., to see him conducting a symphony of Mozart's or Haydn's, as was often his habit. That was the time to hear the band to perfection. Bands do not every day get a regal conductor; and, on these occasions, every one did his utmost, which was sure to call forth flattering expressions from His Majesty, such as "Charmingly played," "That I call perfection," "You have outdone yourselves to-night." On other occasions, when affairs of State troubled him, the players were often made to feel his displeasure. One night, during the queen's trial, he was sitting close to the band, apparently paying little attention to what they were playing, when he surprised them all by suddenly saying, "I suppose, because you are all asleep, you think that I am. There is an old saying, that birds that can sing and won't sing, must be made to sing; and I will make you play that better. Now play it over again." Of course, this screwed up their attention and exertion to the highest pitch; and it was played to his satisfaction on the repetition.

"Kramer, what is the matter with Distin to night?" exclaimed his Majesty on another occasion. "Your Majesty, he has a bad lip." "Oh, I thought something was the matter, as I missed the trumpet in the last piece." From some disappointment, Kramer was obliged, one morning, to officiate at the organ in the chapel. "Who played the organ this morning?" inquired his Majesty. Kramer replied, "not the organist in ordinary to your Majesty; but your Majesty's ordinary organist." The old German would chuckle at his success. Little episodes such as these were often occurring, which served to prove the critical attention his Majesty paid to the performance. One evening with the Princess Lieven on his arm, standing close in front of the band, who were playing Händel's choruses, he said to the Princess, "How delighted my poor father would have been, could he have heard Händel's music played in this manner." Occasionally, of a Sunday evening, a selection of the sacred choruses was sung by a portion of the band and some of the choir of St. Paul's Cathedral. One evening they were surprised by his Majesty wedging himself between two of the performers, and, catching hold of one side of the book held by Spellerberg, the oboe player, his Majesty joined lustily in the bass part of the chorus to the end.

When Rossini visited England, he was commanded to spend three days with the King, who was then at the Pavilion. A very large party of the nobility were invited to see the great maestro. Before the band commenced, he said to Rossini: "You shall now hear an overture of a composer that we hold in the highest estimation." And the band played Rossini's overture to La Gazza Ladra, which had been previously agreed upon.

Sir Henry (then Mr.) Bishop, arrived one night at Kramer's residence, just as he was leaving home for the Pavilion. "Come with me to the palace," said Kramer. "I cannot, I am not dressed." He had a smart drab surtout coat, and was a man who took considerable pains with his toilet. "Come and hear the band; you have no occasion to be seen; you can stand at the back of the orchestra." Sir Henry consented. Upon the King's coming up to give some direction to Kramer, the latter (who was fond of a little mischief, where a dandy was concerned) immediately said to the King: "Mr. Bishop is here, your majesty, but he is not dressed, and does not wish to be seen." "Oh, hang his dress, ask him to come forward." Poor Bishop was obliged to present himself in his drab coat; but no one could say agreeable things with more grace than the King. He told Bishop he was most happy to see him, and directed the band to play his composition, the "Chough and Crow," adding, "I hope you will name whatever you wish them to play." The evening passed so agreeably to Bishop that he quite forgave Kramer.

Perhaps the most effective pieces performed by this famous body of instrumentalists were Beethoven's symphony in C minor—the grand military character of the last movement told with more effect on this than on a stringed band; Mozart's Jupiter, and his No. 5 symphony in E flat; the finales to the second acts of Don Giovanni and Il Barbiere; a chorus from Winter's Proserpine; the overture to Anacreon of Cherubini; "The horse and his rider" of Händel; the quartet from Marino Faliero. Nothing could exceed (in a military point of view—Ed. M. W.) the volume of tone, the light and shade, and the vigor and brilliancy with which those pieces were performed.

The band used to practice daily from eleven to one in the palace during that portion of the year when the King was not in Brighton, but when the court was here the practice was discontinued, and they merely attended in the evening from nine until eleven. The expenses amounted to between six and seven thousand pounds annually. On evenings of attendance, each performer was provided with a supper, a pint of wine, and ale, in addition to his pay. In a fit of economy, on one occasion, the wine, allowed to the household up to a certain range, was ordered to be discontinued: it was consequently stopped from the band, and doleful were their looks when assembled for the evening. Whether designedly, or not, the vigor of their style was considerably diminished, and Lord Conyngham was sent by the King to say that he thought they did not play with their usual spirit. Kramer, who had been waiting for his opportunity, immediately replied: "How can they play with their proper spirit, my Lord, when they have cut off their wine." This, as was anticipated, was taken to the King, who ordered the wine to be allowed as usual, and it was never afterwards discontinued.

When the King ceased to reside in Brighton, the Band, much to their regret, removed to Windsor, where they continued until the King's death, occasionally playing at Cumberland Lodge, or attending His Majesty in those delightful fêtes on Virginia Water. At his death, some received a pension, others, of short service, a gratuity; but the Band was entirely broken up, several of the old Germans returning to Brighton: Brighton was everything to many of them. They had risen with the town, grown with its growth, had family ties and connections in the place, and they came here to end their days. Many of them are gone. It was a sad pity that so fine a body of musicians, brought to such perfection, should have been dispersed; but a spirit of economy came over the successors of George the Fourth, who, with all his faults, was a kindly, munificent, and real lover of music. As regards the Band, "Take it for all in all, we shall ne'er look upon its like again."

Another Letter from a Country Singing Teacher.

M——, Oct. —, 1855.

JOHN S. DWIGHT, Esq.,

Dear Sir:—Your kindness in printing my letter leads me to trespass upon you again. You have proved that you are willing to let both sides be heard, and what is better, are willing yourself to grant a respectful hearing, even to those who are not always using the pen. I wish again to have my say about Psalmody, and that, too, in view of an opinion several times expressed in the course of your Journal, that a few dozen or scores of good solid choral tunes are all that we need. I think I am stating the idea correctly.

Now I am not exactly qualified, perhaps, to argue the matter from any general principles, and very likely I may be influenced by my personal interest. I am willing to grant this; but I can certainly come forward as a witness, simply stating what my experience is and has been, and if this testimony be reliable, it must have its weight so far as it goes.

I gave you a reason before, as a teacher of country singing classes, why I am in favor of allowing the book-making business to go on; I shall try now, as a leader of the singing in a country church, to give you a reason or two why I cannot agree with you in confining our singing to a few dozen solid tunes. I notice in reading the reports in your Journal of all sorts of musical performances, that the same piece is not very often repeated; but that when this is the case they are very soon spoken of as "hackneyed." As an instance, in noticing a certain concert, it is stated that the orchestra played the "hackneyed" overture so and so. On another occasion a humorous article offered a reward for a new tune for pianists and violinists to play. On another occasion one of your most frequent correspondents mentioned certain songs, which he said all the public singers sing, until he had "rather hear Yankee Doodle ground on a hand organ."

Now, Sir, imagine yourself living in the country, and following to the full extent our country habits, of going to church twice every Sunday, as well as on Fast days and Thanksgivings once. You would then have in the course of the year—as we sing three times to each service—318 times; not to mention the evening meetings, occasional sermons, and on most Sundays an extra service or lecture in the evening. Imagine this going on year after year, and if you, like many of the people who worship in the church where I am employed, were always there, rain or shine, I think you would in time wish to have your few dozen tunes increased by some of the newer article.

And, putting your tastes as a hearer out of the question, imagine yourself a member of the choir. When you first join the choir the feelings with which you rise and join in the hymn are those only of pleasure, and you look forward to Sunday with delight. But after a year or two, being one of the singers, or, as we express it, "sitting in the seats," loses its novelty, and gradually you find that to a certain extent this portion of the divine service is settling upon your shoulders, and you begin to feel it a duty which you must perform. Some of your fellow members of the choir move out of town, some are taken sick, some, I am sorry to say, will get put out with somebody or something, some will be led to join the choir in another church, and before you know it you have become a leading person in the singer's gallery, and more of the responsibility is resting upon you than you could wish. The tunes, which two years ago you thought so good, have lost their charm, and you grow tired to death of the same old thing over and over again. This cannot be otherwise.

But there are tunes which never can wear out, you may say; why not sing them? As to this point, Sir, we differ. We get weary of the best things, whether in singing or in anything else, if we can have no change. Now, what I call the best things, are not always what my singers feel to be such.—They have not the necessary amount of practice in singing all sorts of tunes to enable them to feel the truest and best, nor are they so widely advanced in the art of singing as to be able to give these best things that expression and taste, which is what makes them best.

I remember at Mr Perkins's church, at Weymouth Landing, some years ago, having heard what I then thought about the finest congregational church music I ever heard. That was easily accounted for. In that society a few really cultivated persons had taken the singing in charge years before and had remained true to their posts, so that the same faces and voices were to be seen and heard year after year, and with their experience their power of executing good music and their taste for it continually improved. They, however, in the matter of new music, held very different opinions from those I am opposing.

And this leads me to a point, which seems to have been forgotten by those who have written in the papers upon singing in the churches.

The amount of disposable force for the singing seats—so to speak—in our country churches, at least, depends upon the size of the congregation, as but a small number of the scattered inhabitants of a country town of farmers and small mechanics really make such attainments as to make them of service in singing. Now the great evil is that every fifty or sixty families must have their own meeting house. A few Methodists, a few Baptists, a few Unitarians, and a few Calvinists compose the town, and each sect has its church, and must furnish a choir—for, say what you will, our people have not yet attained so much musical culture as to keep up anything like congregational singing. The choir is necessarily small, and unfortunately the women's voices are almost invariably supplied only by the young girls and unmarried, for when they marry and the domestic cares of a farm fall upon them, there is at once an end of the singing in church.

We, then, in these cases, have neither the force for an adequate performance of your grand old chorals, nor have we, nor can we have the skill, knowledge, taste and experience necessary for really fine music. We must, Sir, do the best we can. If you can elevate the standard of culture any faster than we singing teachers are endeavoring to do it, we beg of you to do so. If it was possible to prevent the cutting up of one society of a respectable size into half a dozen little squads, there would be more hope. As it now is, I do not see any other way than to keep singing easy tunes, and as fast as these are worn out to buy new books and learn new ones. Where I am living, the town being larger and the society in which I sing being also large, other influences are at work, which, with your permission, I will try to explain at another time.

Respectfully Yours, P. E. G.

THE BRIDGE.

FROM GRAF VON AUERPERG.

There's a wondrous bridge, my lady,
In the softest clime I know,
Where with sweetest breath of balsam
Winds of Spring eternal blow.

From one heart unto another
Leads this bridge's wondrous way;
Love it is who guards the portal,
Open to those who own his sway.

Love it is the bridge that buildeth,
Roses are the means supplied;
O'er it soul seeks soul in union,
As a bridegroom seeks his bride.

Love has spanned and capped the arches,
Decked it with its fair array;
Love, too, gathereth the taxes,
Kisses are the tolls to pay.

Wouldst thou willingly, sweet maiden,
See this wondrous bridge of mine,
Then it is that thou must lend me,
If we build it, help of thine.

From thy brow then drive the shadows,
Smile but on me, if thou wilt!
Then let's lay our lips together
And the bridge will soon be built.

W.

M. Vivier at Baden.

After the fireworks and the illumination, the concert commenced.

On this occasion, M. Vivier arrived with his horn; not a false Vivier, not a second-hand Vivier, but the true Vivier, the only Vivier, in a word, Vivier. The public saluted him with thunders of applause before seeing or hearing him; but that was nothing to what they did afterwards.

There are some incredulous persons who assert that M. Vivier slightly resembles Schamyl; they are not sure that he really exists.

"He is a myth," say some; "He is a symbol," remark others. "In ancient times, Theseus was the personification of strength, and Pirithoüs of friendship. In the same manner, Vivier is the personification of the horn."

Now that Paganini is dead, how many people affirm that he never lived!

It is very certain that this theory has its inviting side, which is capable of shaking the most deeply-rooted conviction.

"Look for your M. Vivier," persons have said to me, "and find him if you can."

All of a sudden we heard that he was at Constantinople.

"A horn-player among the Turks! Is it likely? It is true that Schamyl is reported to be in Circassia, but who ever saw him?"

Another day there was a rumor that he had just given a concert at Moscow.

Now, every one knows that Moscow was burnt down.

Later, he was said to be at Smyrna or Liverpool. Why not at Quebec or Ispahan?

After all, however, Vivier—Vivier, body and bones, the real Vivier, alive and kicking, performed on the horn, last Saturday, at half-past nine o'clock in the evening, at Baden. Fifty people saw him.

He played very little, but he did play. The only piece he played, in the midst of the most profound silence, is entitled "La Chasse;" he composed it for himself, and I doubt if any living man but himself could execute it.

Formerly, Lucullus dined with Lucullus; at present Vivier works for Vivier.

Any person who has not heard him can form no idea of his playing. Tradition stops at it. His horn is not a horn; it is an instrument without a name, which sighs like a flute or thunders like the trumpets of Jericho. In the hands of Vivier, the horn is doubled—trebled. It is heard by his side, it is heard in the distance, it is heard here, it is heard there—it approaches, retreats, it bursts out, it calls upon itself, and it replies—it is the sound and the echo in itself alone.

Old chroniclers speak of fairy-horses, which were always running and could never die. M. Vivier makes me believe in fairy-horns: his is the soul of the Black Huntsman speaking—Assemblée Nationale.

ELEGY.

The curfew tolls the knell of parting day,
In every clime, from Lapland to Japan;
To fix one spark of beauty's heavenly ray,
The proper study of mankind is man.

Tell—for you can—what it is to be wise,
Sweet Auburn, loveliest village of the plain,
The man of Ross, each slaving babe replies,
And drags, at each remove, a length'ning chain.

Ah! who can tell how hard it is to climb
Far as the solar walk, or milky way;
Procrastination is the thief of time,
Let Hercules himself do what he may.

'Tis education forms the common mind,
The feast of reason and the flow of soul—
I must be cruel only to be kind,
And waft a sigh from Indus to the pole.

Syphax, I joy to meet thee thus alone,
Where'er I roam, whatever lands I see;
A youth, to fortune and to fame unknown,
In maiden meditation fancy free.

Farewell! and wheresoe'er thy voice be tried,
Why to yon mountain turns the gazing eye?
With spectacles on nose and pouch on side,
That teach the native moralist to die.

Pity the sorrows of a poor old man,
Whose beard descending swept his aged breast;
Laugh where we must, be candid where we can,
Man never is but always to be blest.

MILWAUKEE, July 16, 1855.

A Curious Sermon.

The Brandon (Mississippi) Register reports the following curious sermon preached at the town of Waterproofs, not far from Brandon:—

I may say to you, my brethering, that I am not an edecated man, and I am not one o' them as bleeves that edecation is necessary for a gospel minister, for I bleeve the Lord edecates his preachers jest as he wants 'em to be edecated, an', although I say it that oughtn't to say it, yet in the state of Indianny, whar I live, thar's no man as gits a bigger congregation nor what I gits.

Thar may be some here to-day, my brethering, as don't know what persuasion I'm uv. Well, I may say to you, my brethering, that I'm a Hardshell Baptist. Thar's some folks as don't like the Hardshell Baptists, but I'd rather hear Hardshell as no shell at all. You see me here to-day, my brethering, drest as in fine close; you must think I was proud, but I am not proud, my brethering, and although I've been a preacher uv the gospel for twenty years, an' although I'm capt'ing of that flat boat that lies at yure landing, I'm not proud, my brethering.

I'm not a gwine ter tell you edzackly whar my tex may be found; suffice it to say it's in the leds of the Bible, an' you'll find it somewhar 'tween the first chapter uv the Book uv Generations and the last chapter uv the Book uv Revolutions, an' ef you'll go and sarch the Scriptures, as I have sarched the Scriptures, you'll not only find my tex thar, but a great many uther texes as will do you good to read, an' my tex, when you shill find it you shill find it tu read thus:

"An' he played on a harp uv a thousand strings—sperits of just men made perfect."

My tex, brethering, leads me to speak uv sperits. Now thar's a great many kinds uv sperits in the world—in the fust place, thar's the sperits as some folks call ghosts, and then thar's the sperits of turpentine, and then thar's the sperits as some folks call liquor; an' I've got as good an' artikel of them kind uv sperits on my flatboat as ever was fotched down the Mississippi river, but thar's a great many other kinds of sperits, for the tex sez:—"He played on a harp uv a thousand strings—sperits uv just men made perfect."

But I'll you the kind uv sperits as is meant in the tex, its fire. That's the kind uv sperits as is meant in the tex, my brethering. Now thar's a great many kinds of fire in the world. In the fust place, thar's the common sort uv fire you lite a segar or a pipe with, and then thar's cam fire, fire before yure reddy and fall back, and many other kinds uv fire, for the tex sez: "He played on a harp uv a thousand strings—sperits of just men made perfect."

But I'll tell you the kind uv fire as is ment in the tex, my brethering—its hell fire! and thar's the kind uv fire as a great many uv you'll come to, ef you don't do better nor what you've bin doin'—for "He played on a harp uv a thousand strings—sperits uv just men made perfect."

Now, the different sorts of fire in the world may be likened unto the different persuasions of Christians in the world. In the first place we have the Piscapalions; an' they are a high sailin' and a high falutin set, and they may be likened unto a turkey buzzard, that flies up into the air, and he goes up and up, till he looks no bigger than your finger nail, and the fust thing you know he cums down and down, and down and down, and is a fillin' himself on the karkiss uv a dead hoss, by the side uv the road—and "he played on a harp uv a thousand strings—sperits uv just men made perfect."

And then thar's the Methodist, and they may be likened unto the squirrel, runnin' up into a tree, for the Methodist blieves gwine on from one degree uv grace to another, and finally on to perfectshun, and the squirrel goes up and up, and up and up, and he jumps from lim' to lim' and branch to branch, and the fust thing you know he falls and down he cums kerflummux, and that's like the Methodist, for they is allers fallin' from grace ah!—and—"He played on a harp of a thousand strings—sperits of just men made perfect."

And, then, my brethering, thar's the Baptist ah! and they hev bin likened unto a possum on a 'simmon tree, and the thunders may roll, and the earth may quake, but that possum clings there still ah! And you may shake one foot loose, and the other's thar, and you may shake all feet loose, and he laps his tail round the limb, and he clings furever, for—"He played on a harp uv a thousand strings—sperits of just men made perfect."

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, OCT. 22.—Musical gossip is rife here, and I snatch a few minutes to give you some items. The Academy is languishing along with old operas and very poor audiences. Last night Norma was given "for the last time" (in America, I hope.) Le Prophète will soon be produced with great splendor, and the public hangs back for it. Meanwhile, the following new engagements are announced: Sig. SALVIANI, primo tenore, from Florence; Sig. CASPIANI, primo basso, Milan; Mlle. DERLI-PATAMA, prima donna, Munich; and Mlle. VENTALDI, seconda donna and contralto.

Mlle. RACHEL, on her return from Boston, will perform at the Academy on the off nights.

On dî, that MARETZKE is going to leave 14th Street, and, together with STRAKOSCH, PARODI and VESTVALI (who is not going to Mexico after all) open the Metropolitan as an opposition house to the Academy.

At Niblo's, the PYNE troupe close at the end of next week. To-night "Rip Van Winkle" was given for Mr. BRISTOW's benefit, to a crowded house I hear, and on Friday, Mr. HARRISON, for his benefit, gives Fawcett's adaptation of "The Barber."

At Burton's, there is a small English opera troupe, with Miss ROSALIE DURAND as Prima Donna. They have been performing an adaptation of Boildieu's "John of Paris" and have done it very well, it is said.

Mr. EISFELD has returned in good health, and weighs about two or three times as much as when he left. He will resume his quartet soirées during the winter.

Mr. BERGMANN and WILLIAM MASON intend giving a series of six musical matinées.

To conclude, I will give you a musical marriage announcement: Mr. STEPHEN LEACH, late basso of the Seguin and Thillon troupes, was united last Saturday evening to Mrs. GEORGINA STUART, our amiable and talented Prima Donna. A long and happy career to them. R.

Musical Chat-Chat.

The Orchestral Concerts in the Music Hall will commence on the 10th or 17th of next month. The orchestra of fifty is complete, the prospect of a large audience morally certain, and the leading features of a rich opening programme fixed. These will be Beethoven's Seventh Symphony; Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto, played by OTTO DRESEL; an overture by Mendelssohn (either "Fingal's Cave" or "Midsummer Night's Dream"); perhaps, too, the Leonora overture of Beethoven; probably the first finale (for orchestra) from Don Juan; and in each part some singing worthy of the occasion:—thus mingling the grave and the gay, the solid and the brilliant in attractive and edifying proportions.... Mlle. PARODI and STRAKOSCH had a third brilliant concert on Saturday evening, and have to a considerable degree kept up the interest through three extra concerts during this crowded "gala week" of Boston, and in spite of the nightly almost all-absorbing attractions of RACHEL... The old HANDEL and HAYDN SOCIETY, it will be seen, announce their annual series of Six Oratorio Concerts, in the Music Hall, at the exceedingly low price of two dollars for the series. The first oratorio will be Handel's "Solomon", never before given in this city, or this country. We have heard some of the choruses under Mr. ZERRAHN's careful drill, and found them full of beauty, variety and true Handelian vigor. The opening is fixed for Sunday evening, Nov. 18th.

We are glad to learn that a series of six concerts, and five or six lectures for the people, at people's prices, are to be given in the Music Hall, under the auspices of the Artizan's Recreative Union, an excellent institution apparently, of which we shall have more to say. For the concerts Miss PHILLIPPS, Miss TWICHELL, Miss BOTHAMLY, Mr. MILLARD, Mr. WETHERBEE, Mr. ADAMS, Mr. MOZART, and the Germania Serenade Band have been engaged. Tickets one dollar for the series. That is the true way to keep out intemperance and vulgarity: pre-occupy the moral elements that grow intemperate with wholesome, genial excitements. Provide cheap and refined amusements.

Messrs. SCHULTZE, JUNGnickel and CARL HAUSE gave a concert of classical and popular music in Worcester last week, assisted by the vocal talent of Miss BOTHAMLY. Mr. Hause played a piano concerto by Hummel, and the three the Andante with variations, from Beethoven's Trio in C minor. Instrumental solos, duets and songs made out the feast, which "Stella" says was a rich one; yet either politics stood in the way, or "some one had blundered", for

Into the City Hall
Walked but two hundred.

—"Stella" judges from the advertising columns of one of the New York dailies that the banjo is the favorite musical instrument in that city.

Congregational singing has been introduced at Rev. Dr. Alexander's church, Fifth Avenue, New York. One of Jardine's organs is placed behind the pulpit, and is played by WILLIAM MASON. Dr. LOWELL MASON leads the singing, and the whole people join, supported by some of the stronger voices which are placed in the front side-seats. The Review says that "the tunes selected are appropriate in their rhythmic and melodic structure," and describes the effect as being grand. . . . CARL BERGMANN, in his capacity of violoncellist, and WILLIAM MASON, as pianist, propose a series of six musical matinées in New York, with a view of extending the circle of those acquainted, as all refined society should be, with the masterworks of chamber music, especially "such quartets, quintets, trios, sonatas, and the like, as have not before been heard in New York in public." These must prove a valuable auxiliary to the good work going on under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society and EISFELD's quartet party, who are preparing to resume their classical soirées. . . .

Signor Roncari's new opera company are to commence in Mexico next week. The operas for the first month are to be Norma, I Montecchi e Capuletti, Luisa Miller, Semiramide, Lucrezia and Lucia; each month a new opera will be produced, including Rigoletto, Travatore, Tancredi, and Prophète. The troupe comprises: primadonnas, Mlle. Delmonte and Madame Manzini; contralto, Mlle. Vestvali; tenors, Graziani and Gianconi; baritones, Z. Winter and Walther; bass, Garone; an orchestra of forty, and a chorus of thirty-six: all under the direction of L. Winter, a son of the celebrated German composer.

A writer of musical reminiscences in the Musical Review recalls a remark of "old THOMASCHek, in Prague, the master of so many masters in our art, who used to say, that whenever he heard an artist singing at one moment pianissimo, at the next fortissimo, it reminded him of a large door, which was softly opened, only to be shut immediately afterwards with a tremendous noise." There was quite a rage, he adds, among the artists to illustrate this remark; but of late years, with the exception of some Italians, all the singers seem to have got rid of the door-clapping style, except the celebrated baritone, FISCHER, and the English tenor, SIMS REEVES.

Among the antiquities of Newport, R. I., is an organ, the gift of Bishop Berkeley, of which we find the following notice:

"It was also after his arrival in England, in 1733, that he presented the organ to Trinity church, at Newport, which is still surmounted by the crown of the olden time, and which bears an inscription that it is the gift of Dr. George Berkeley, late Lord Bishop of Cloyne. This organ was originally forwarded to America by the Dean as a gift to the town of Berkeley, in Massachusetts, which had been named after him. The select men of the town, however, were not prepared to harbor so dangerous a guest, and voting that 'an organ is an instrument of the devil, for the entrapping the souls of men,' declined the offer; when the Dean conferred it on Trinity. It still sends forth its strains from some of the old pipes.

"It is said that there is another claimant for the honors of the organ, in a church of Brooklyn, N. Y. The story goes that the Newport organ, being out of repair, was sent to New York to be put in order. A portion of the pipes were found to be so defective that it was considered expedient to replace them by new ones, which were provided, and forwarded in the old case. It afterwards occurred to a workman that the old metal should not be thrown away; so he restored the rejected pipes, and they were set up in a new case in the Brooklyn church. Mason states: 'The original case, of English oak, is still in use in the church, and it contains a part of the old works, with the addition of such pipes as was found necessary when it was rebuilt a few years ago.'"

. . . The Philadelphia opera house is fast becoming a reality; the Bulletin reports progress as follows:

The work on the splendid building for the American Academy of Music, at the corner of Broad and Locust streets, is progressing rapidly. The first story is nearly up, and the handsome brown stone front on Broad street gives earnest of what the structure will be when completed. The building is very large, and it will inaugurate a new era in Philadelphia in theatrical architecture. The city has never yet had a regular opera house, and the theatres that have been at times appropriated to opera purposes are generally small, inconvenient and not constructed with much regard to the laws of acoustics.

The following particulars in relation to the new Opera House will give our readers an idea of its size and capacity. The building has a front of 140 feet on Broad street, with a depth of 238 feet on Locust street. There will be regular seats for 3000 persons, and stool and standing room for 600 more. The orchestra will be 65 feet long, by 10 feet wide, and will afford ample room for seventy musicians.

Width of stage department 150 feet; width of stage proper, 90 feet; depth 73 feet; width of auditorium between the walls, 90 feet; height to dome, 70 feet; depth from curtain to back of boxes, 102 feet; width of curtain 48 feet; height, 48 feet; width of lobbies, at proscenium, 9 feet, gradually widening at vestibule entrance to 13 feet; entrance of lobby on Broad street, 10 by 73 feet; two main stairways in vestibule, width of each 13 feet; width of same to second tier, 8 feet; to third, 7 feet. The grand saloon, which can be used for concerts, lectures, balls, &c., is 39 by 85 feet; height of same, 30 feet; the number of exit doors is 14, all of them opening outward, comprising a space of 117 feet; so that a full house can be discharged in from four to five minutes; the covered carriage way is 70 feet on Locust street, to curb; width of Broad street pavement, 18 feet; Locust street, do. 12 feet; stage excavation below the floor, 10 feet; under remainder of the house, 8½ feet; heated by steam generated in two boilers. The auditorium is to be illuminated by a circle in the dome, containing 500 jets, also by two rows of jets along the cornices, and by bracket lights against the walls.

There will be ventilating flues throughout the house, connecting with the main ventilating shaft, over the illuminating circle. The parquet entrances are, to wit: two at orchestra, 3 feet wide, gradually enlarging to 6½ feet at lobby, with two additional side entrances, each 5½ feet wide. Numerous other passages throughout the house, leading to seats, commence along the inner circle, being two feet broad, and gradually widening to 4 feet at lobbies. Restaurant in basement, 26 by 62 feet; height of the building to cornice 60 feet. The roof will be of iron, main span 90 feet; passage way on south flank 10 feet; passage way on rear to Westmoreland street 15 feet; a balcony on Broad and also one on Locust street, each 70 feet.

The Leipzig Signale gives an interesting account of music at St. Petersburg, from which we translate:

"The attention of the Russian rulers has long been directed toward music. Under Peter the Great already German musicians came into the country. Under the empress Elizabeth, about the year 1750, one of the best opera troupes from Italy was called to St. Petersburg; twice a week in the winter palace, in the theatre of the Hermitage, which is still standing, they gave representations, to which every respectable person was admitted gratis; the doors were not closed till the hall was full. Under Catherine II. there was one of the best Italian opera companies here, with which the great Cimarosa was connected as composer. At the same time lived here too the celebrated Sarti. At a later period, under Alexander, there was, besides the Italian, also a French opera here, to which belonged the excellent singer Philis-Andrieux, and Boieldieu as composer. Here this distinguished man wrote several of his best operas. At the same time there figured here three of the greatest violinists: Rode, Baillet and Lafont, as also Neukomm and Steibelt as chapel-masters, and the world-renowned pianist, Clementi, who brought here with him his best pupils, Field, Klengel and Berger. The first—the greatest piano-player of all times—remained in Russia till his death.

"Under such favorable auspices it was impossible that St. Petersburg should fall behind other royal residences in Europe in musical taste, and nearly all the celebrities (except Paganini) have visited this city, and several have settled down here for the remainder of their lives, among whom we may name the great singer, Mme. Mara.

That music at the present time is extremely well diffused in Petersburg, is proved by the existence here of twenty music shops, forty piano manufactories, and, it is said, about eight hundred music teachers. The piano here, as everywhere, is most generally in vogue. The most distinguished pianists are: Rubenstein (now in Germany), Gerke, Henselt, Lewy, Kündinger, Jr., Leschetitsky, Frackmann and Vogt. The best violinists: Maurer, father and son, Kontsky, Minkus, Albrecht, Schlosser, Pikel, Kündinger, Sen., Engel, Dwitrieff, Ofenasiëff, Ludoff and Latischeff; the four last are Russian born. All the above named violinists are members of the imperial orchestras, of which there are several here. Thus, for example, the Italian opera, the Russian opera, the German theatre, the French Vaudeville, the Ballet and the Circus, each have separate orchestras, of which Louis Maurer fills the place of general inspector. Each member of the orchestra receives, in proportion to his services, from 400 to 700 silver roubles yearly salary, and after fifteen years' service a pension for life of 600 silver roubles, which he may spend where he pleases.

"The Italian opera here consists of the ne plus ultra of the throat-artists of Italy and lasts only four months in the year; for which short season a Lagrange, a Grisi, a Mario or Tambril draws a salary of 20,—25,000 silver roubles. There is no Conservatory here, to be sure, but you find an equivalent in the theatre school, where separate classes are organized for singing, instrumental music, and the study of Harmony. Also among the imperial educational institutions there is one in which pupils are specially formed for music. Of musical institutes or academies the following may be named: The Institute of Court singers, which has for its object to train voices for the divine worship of the Court church. Europe has scarcely the equal of this to point to, in all that concerns enchanting voices and perfection of harmony in the most perfect execution. Then there is the Blind Institute, in which there is a whole orchestra composed of the blind. Then the Symphony Society of the students, who every Sunday, under the direction of C. Schubert, give public performances in the splendid hall of the University. Besides this, there is a second Symphony Society of amateurs. Then there are the Sing-akademie of the Germans, which has been in existence these thirty-five years, and makes gratifying progress; the German Liedertafel; the Philharmonic Society for sacred music, and several small private musical societies.

"Nor is there any lack of public places of recreation enlivened by music. Among others, you find weekly musical soirées in three different Clubs; five or six different orchestras à la Strauss play in public gardens; twice a week there are concerts in the hall of the Passage Steinbrock, where the peculiar, yet interesting half-wild song of the Muscovite gipsy bands is to be heard. From all this it may be perceived that music is not the least of the agreeable resources of the Palmyra of the North."

Sunday Evening Concerts.

We alluded last week to the fact that the ice had been broken in the matter of Sacred Concerts in the city of Providence, and a concert given there, for the first time, on Sunday evening of week before last, by Mr. AHNER, for the benefit of the Norfolk sufferers. Yet it appears that the ice was only broken, it was not altogether melted. Providence would seem to resemble in this respect one of those secluded vallies where the ice of centuries is stored up still to harden, while the sun makes summer over all the earth. The novelty of the thing, so common elsewhere, seems to have been startling. Various were the opinions called forth. Some approved, but others frowned. Several of the pulpits opened their batteries upon the dangerous innovation, editors of newspapers, forgetting politics and trade, grew scrupulously pious upon the occasion, and gave place in their columns to solemn protests against this unheard of desecration of the Sabbath. For instance, one concludes:

In a word, we do not believe in the propriety of what are called Sacred Sunday Concerts. For whatever purpose instituted, they cannot be regarded as much short of actual Sabbath desecration. Like any other concert, we buy the music for self-diversion and pleasure. So far from devotion, it is actually recreation. Nor does the sacred character of the music necessarily make the exercise sacred. It is the music, the vocal harmony of superior voices, and not the words, that awaken the interest and gather in the people. Let us not be understood as condemning this, as anything exceedingly bad, but we say that connecting, as it does, the secular and the religious, traffic and ostensible devotion, it exerts a most deleterious influence upon the holy and solemn character of the Christian Sabbath.

Another thanks the writer, and among other things says these:

God has given us nights enough, without taking up a portion of the Sabbath for such purposes. If we can find evenings during the week for the exhibition of Uncle Tom, and every thing else that comes along, then we can find a week day evening for a concert in behalf of Norfolk, and to pretend that we must take the Sabbath because we cannot get people out on a week day, is setting a very low estimate on the morals and liberality of Providence.

We cannot believe in the doctrine, that the end sanctifies the means, hence because a sacred concert contemplates a benevolent end, therefore it accords with the design of the Sabbath, and may occupy that day. It is very evident that this concert was to be a sort of public entertainment, a time of recreation or amusement. Certainly it was not designed for religious worship in the Christian sense of worship. We doubt whether any one expected any religious services, whatever, as a part of the programme for the evening. It was to be a kind of social entertainment for a benevolent object. How could Christians look upon such an entertainment in any other light, than a secular affair, wholly irrelevant to the spirit and design of the Sabbath? How then could they patronize it? And how could they but speak out against it, as quite a number of our clergy did on the Sabbath? Let us have the concert, when we can go and not desecrate God's Sabbath and cast a stumbling block before men, which will be a greater evil than all the good we hoped to do.

Here and in most civilized communities it would seem unnecessary and a waste of words to argue such a question at this late day, as if the innocence of listening to good music on a Sunday needed to be proved! But for the sake of the good cause, begun so late in our sister city, it may be worth while to hint a few obvious considerations.

1. The position of these Providence moralists and preachers in this matter is peculiar. It is behind the age; an anomaly in civilized Christendom. America is but a part, the younger part of Christendom. All over Europe, if you except some islands, the Sabbath is not only a holy but a holi-day. Cheerful, thankful worship, rest, and innocent enjoyment, as of the great family of God's children, is the spirit of it. After the morning services, the day is given up to recreation. Do you protest that this is merely a Roman Catholic abomination, part of a sensual system? Then what have you to say of the example of Protestant Geneva, all whose institutions, manners, habits, bear to this day the stamp of Calvin. That stern reformer himself, it is said, played cards on Sunday. The people of Geneva spend the afternoons and evenings of Sunday in social recreations. In those famous schools for youth, those model schools, at Hofwyl and at Fellenberg, it is a part of the regime to have out-of-door exercises, games of ball, &c. on Sunday afternoon, and music and other social pleasures in the evening.

We have not gone so far as that. With our less genial national character, without our poor understanding (as a people) of the art of enjoying ourselves, we shrink perhaps wisely from the incidental dangers of excess in too much liberty of this sort. We cannot drink without getting drunk. We let liberty run into license. But we cannot suppress the innate craving and necessity for some sort of amusement, some sort of happy and spontaneous activity. Hence we do well to give the preference to those amusements which cannot corrupt, and which can and do essentially refine and educate and elevate. Such is Music. Whether "secular" or "sacred," does not altogether matter, (speciality of occasion being left out of the question,) so long as it inspires the soul, and does not merely tickle the ear and lift the feet—so long as it is not frivolous. But even here, even in Puritan New England, in our larger cities, where there are most churches, most schools and most charities, Sunday Concerts, Oratorios, and the like, have grown into a custom. In Boston and New York it is so, and shall they assume that they are so much purer in the half-way house between the two at Providence!

2. Is the moral atmosphere of Providence, then, so very much purer than that of Boston, not to say New York? Can any of those preachers, when he charges his hearers to keep the Sabbath holy after their old solemn fashion, congratulate them upon their higher average of spirituality, of sobriety, of temperance, of morality, of refinement, and disinterested virtue, as compared with Boston, where for forty years we have been "desecrating the Sabbath" by oratorios and concerts in the evening? Or will any one of them undertake to say he can perceive any new shade of wickedness that has come over the old city, since the concert for the Norfolk sufferers? If it is "setting a low estimate on the morals and liberality" of the Providence people to suppose they cannot have a charity concert without taking Sunday evening for it, much more so is it to suppose they cannot listen to pure, soul-satisfying music without being injured; that they cannot listen to inspiring harmonies without forgetting God; that they cannot quit the solemn posture of devotion without ceasing to be religious. Is religion a formal act, a formal abstinence, or is it a life? Is it a mere affair of Sun-days, or is it good in all weathers?

So much for the example of the world and the exceptional case of Providence. Now for the intrinsic merits of the case.

3. If it is theoretically, with our strict Sabbatarian friends, a question between concerts of music and "concerts of prayer," between seeking pleasure and seeking God, is it not practically, must it not ever be with the great mass of people, a question between innocent and edifying amusements on the one hand, and solemn torpor, ennui, idleness, or sneaking sensual recreations, beer-shops and the like, upon the other? If you would keep young people out of low and vulgar haunts of entertainment, you must open for them pleasureable opportunities which tend only to refine and elevate. It is but the lesson taught by the whole history of Christendom, the result of the whole social experience of mankind. Far better send the child to a theatre, than make him sit and suck his thumbs the live-long day in constrained idleness and mental, moral inanition, under the outward form of negatively keeping the day holy:—for this is practically all that the experiment amounts to in the majority of cases. You cannot expel nature with a fork, especially when you put nothing in her place.

4. Good music, even when enjoyed for itself, when unconnected with solemn services, is one of the best outside auxiliaries to all truly sanctifying services. Music in itself has a meaning, and carries a message and a heavenly influence to the heart, the soul. One of the writers quoted above is so ignorant of music as to think that any sacredness attaching to it resides only in the words to which it may be sung; and that since people go to concerts, not for the words, but for the music, therefore they are forsaking God. We most sincerely hope, as the kindest wish of Christian charity, that grace may one day be given to this writer to know and feel what music is.

5. "The concert is not a religious service." All the better that it is not. A whole day can not be spent in formal services. If it can, why do we eat? And must not the mind have its periodical refreshment as well as the body? The attempt so to spend it only ends in the reactions referred to, or in that idleness and listlessness in which the mind and the affections run to weeds. How much better to have something, to which the mind may spring with free attraction, and in which it finds, without any solemn purpose or pretence, a cheerful, wholesome aid and confirmation of all the solemn influences and lessons of the day! How much better music than emptiness and idleness, not to say than drinking, gambling and such popular alternatives!

6. There is such a thing as frivolous and foolish music, as music of a mere sentimental and unnerving character. But there is a plenty, both vocal and instrumental, which humanizes, braces and exalts the soul; which speaks to our deeper, better nature, and nourishes the heavenly faculties, the sympathies with all things great and good, the instincts whereby we feel our relationship with life and love beyond these accidents of time. Mr. Abner's selection, in the concert in question, was mainly of this kind, and those who really enjoyed the music, we doubt not, were so far the better for it, so far the better subjects for the stated ministrations of each following Sabbath. If they really drank in the strains, their hearts were softened, and the preacher should be thankful the next time he comes to sow his seed.

We trust therefore that the givers of such concerts will go on. It is only a question of time. They are morally sure to melt all opposition in the end; and even now they doubtless have the sympathy and the approval of the larger and the better number, in Providence itself, as well as elsewhere.

RACHEL.—Music this week has been entirely secondary to the excitement of the Drama: BEETHOVEN and MOZART to—not SHAKESPEARE, but to CORNELIUS and RACINE. Those old stilted French tragedies, with their "unities," and their everlasting sing-song Alexandrines, are what few of us, since they were school or college text-books, would ever have felt moved to read again;—rare works of Art they may be in their way, but that way is a dull and thankless one, and not cheered by the least spark of imaginative genius. Yet those old plays—would that they only were "classical," with any of the vitality of Æschylus and Sophocles!—heard in a foreign language, and with all their tedious dialogue, in which all characters discourse alike, have been made all alive to us, and filled with inspiration not their own by the consummate acting of one woman, whose silent by-play and mere magnetism of look, while she is not speaking, reflects light and meaning over all the rest. In common with all the lovers of high dramatic Art, we have wondered, and have thrilled under in their way perfect impersonations of RACHEL. The phenomenon, until one has sounded her whole compass, (and we have only seen her Camille, Phædre, Tiêbe and Andromaque.) is too strange, as is the physical woman in her beauty strange, for us to attempt yet anything like analysis. We would rather simply accept, wonder and admire. Great it is unquestionably, but in what precise way great, whether the greatest, whether as satisfactory as great, is what we would rather consider after all the evidence is in. Meanwhile we have no room for report of each evening's particulars, and are they not in all the newspapers? But we say, let no one miss the opportunity of seeing Rachel all he can during her short stay.

One word, however, which no one else may think of—it is our own speciality—in compliment to Mr. COMEN's orchestra. We have been surprised and pleased at their classical overtures and interludes. One night they gave the overture to Mozart's Tito; the next night to Zauberflöte; and on the night of "Angelo" were played the overtures to Iphigenia (Gluck's) and Don Juan, besides any quantity of movements from Haydn's Symphonies. Classical music enough, between the acts of one play, for a Philharmonic Concert!

NEW COURSE OF HARMONY, BY L. H. SOUTHARD.

The Publishers call the attention of the musical profession to this work, as one eminently calculated to lighten the labors of the teacher, and rapidly advance the pupil. It is emphatically a PRACTICAL work, serving both as a Manual of instruction on the one hand, and a Text-book on the other; and it is believed that the peculiar arrangement of the work, together with the very large number of exercises and examples, presents great advantages, to both scholar and teacher, over any similar work of the kind. Teachers highly commend the work. Mr. WILLIAM MASON says it is a work unsurpassed in the language. Mr. GEORGE J. WEBB says that it is a work perspicuous in diction, methodical in arrangement, and sufficiently copious to embrace all the essentials of the general doctrine of accord. It can be ordered through any respectable Music-seller, and will be sent through the mail on the receipt of the price, ($1.75), postage prepaid.

THE Inventor, having now fully prepared the way for the successful manufacture of his Æolicons on a large scale, by applying to them the severest tests while manufacturing for six years, and showing them to, and receiving autograph recommendations from, about 275 of the most eminent musicians, manufacturers and dealers in 24 cities and 12 chief towns of 18 states, and many very positive editorial recommendations in the periodicals of the same and other places; and having himself little physical or pecuniary ability, wishes to sell the patent right for the U. S. except Vermont. From the following recommendations it is evident that the Æolicon, in 16 varieties, with from 4 to 7 octaves, 1 to 8 banks of keys, 1 to 24 draw stops, 0 to 8 oct. pedal bass, in size from 6 1/4 inches square and 8 ft. long, to 6 ft. square, in price from $45 to $1,500, is well adapted to every occasion in life where a keyed instrument is wanted, and must supersede all other reed instruments as soon as extensively manufactured, furnishing profitable employment to thousands of workmen in the different departments.

New York, July 11, 1854.—We the subscribers having examined Mr. Nutting's Æolicons, very cheerfully recommend them to the public, believing that Mr. N. has by his constant labor for over 15 years succeeded in producing an instrument which very much excels all other instruments of the Seraphine or Melodeon class. Its capacity to produce musical effect by variety of expression and rapidity of execution; its clear, pure, distinct, and yet very powerful, voluminous and solid tone; its perfection of scale; its simplicity of construction and ease of operation are especially remarkable.

HENRY C. TUCK, Geo. ANDREWS, formerly Cond'r N. Y. Acad. of Music, C. M. CADY, Ed. of Musical Review, THOS. HASTINGS, Composer & Teacher of Music, I. B. WOODBURY, Composer & Teacher of Music, GEO. WALKER, Prof. Music, LOUIS SCHMIDT, Organist St. Mark's Ch. and P. F. Teacher, J. L. KESION, Organist Broadway Tabernacle, J. W. MOORE, Compiler 'Moore's Encyclopedia of Music.'

Endorsed by WM. H. FAY, in N. Y. Tribune, Oct. 6, 1855.

New York, July 11, 1854.—After a somewhat careful examination of three varieties of the Æolicon, I am satisfied that they excel all other reed instruments with which I am acquainted, chiefly in quality, power, quickness and resonance of tone, action of the keys, and capacity to produce musical effect by the perfection of the swell and diminish.

MICHAEL RAPETTI, Opera Conductor and Composer.

Troy, July, 1855.—After again examining the Æolicons, I am still of the opinion that they are decidedly superior to any instrument of similar character I have ever seen. The 'Pocket Æolicon,' designed especially for travelling musicians, is a prodigy for power and compactness.

THOS. J. GUY, Organist & Direc. of Music, St. Joseph's.

Albany, N. Y.—I have carefully examined the Æolicon, and can safely say that for power, beauty and delicacy of tone, elasticity of touch and quickness, it is decidedly far in advance (so far as I have seen) of any previous invention.

T. S. LLOYD, Org't & Direc. of Music 1st Pres. Ch.

Albany, N. Y. July, 1855.—I have examined with much pleasure the Æolicon, and am most happy to add my testimony as to its excellence. In mellowness of tone, it is unequalled by any reed instrument I have ever seen, and its power is truly wonderful. Again, from its repeating qualities, the performer on that is able to execute as rapidly as on any instrument, the piano-forte not excepted. In short, I think there can be but one opinion in regard to it, viz: it is far in advance of any instrument of the Melodeon kind, and must very soon supersede them entirely.

H. TUCKER, Composer, Organist, Teacher P. F. & Ballad Singer.

Buffalo, N. Y.—It gives me great pleasure to give my opinion in favor of your Æolicon, which, after examining, I found superior in every respect to any reed instrument I have ever seen or played upon.

C. G. DÖRNERHARD, Prof. of Music.

I am satisfied that Nutting's Æolicons surpass all other reed instruments I ever have seen, especially in the cres. and dim., repeat, quality of tone and power. A. POPPENSBERG, Buffalo.

I also. E. A. HOPKINS, Organist & Teacher, Cleveland, O.

For all purposes to which a reed instrument is applicable, the Æolicon is decidedly the best I have seen.

ROBERT DENTON, Organist St. Paul's Ch. Buffalo.

We cordially recommend Nutting's Æolicon to manufacturers and the musical public, as possessing more desirable characteristics, and those in a greater degree, than any other reed instrument with which we are acquainted, here or in other countries. The intensity, brilliancy, power and uniformity of tone, with the simplicity of construction, are especially recommended.

And fifty-two others in Western and Middle States.

The demand for these instruments will of course be regulated by public opinion, which is fully indicated by the above specimens of the multitude of testimonials that have in every instance been gratuitously given. It is thought that one company ought to own and control the right of the U. S.; but in case of a failure to agree upon terms, each of the states will be offered separately, except Vermont, at prices varying from $500 to $8,000. Terms, one-fourth cash, and three equal annual payments for the rest. The U. S., except Vt. $50,000, one-eighth cash, and seven equal annual payments. The inventor's services may be obtained for a limited time, alternate weeks, if desired. The discerning will readily see that this is an opportunity of rare occurrence to engage in a very large, pleasant and profitable business. All who wish to negotiate for rights, will please to communicate immediately at Randolph, Vt., with the inventor, who will give statistics as to profits, etc., and will be at No. 80 Chatham St., New-York, Nov. 18, with two varieties of Æolicons. The propositions for rights already received are such that all may be assured that as soon after the appointment as may be, a large Æolicon Factory will be in operation.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

CHURCH ORGANS. COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

WM. B. D. SIMMONS, Organ Builder,
(Heretofore doing business in the style of Wm. B. D. SIMMONS & Co.) and

GEORGE FISHER,

Of Cambridge, have this day formed a Copartnership for continuing the manufacture of Church Organs.

We design to keep in our Warerooms New Instruments for sale at prices from $400 to $1,500 each, and are prepared to build by contract at the shortest notice. Organs, worth from $800 to $12,000. And by prompt and faithful execution of orders hope to merit a like encouragement to that heretofore extended to Wm. B. D. SIMMONS, and which has indicated the necessity of this business connection, that his entire attention may be devoted to the more difficult and artistic parts of the business, so that an increase thereof may cause no diminution of the personal attention which is requisite for the maintenance of the CHARACTER of our instruments, upon which we rely for success.

While it will be our aim and ambition to furnish ORGANS OF A PERFECTION OF TONE and MECHANISM, AND OF AN ELEGANCE OF EXTERIOR UNSURPASSED, we are confident of ability to offer terms MORE FAVORABLE THAN CAN BE OBTAINED ELSEWHERE, for the following reasons: Having ample means, we can purchase in large quantities at first cost, for cash; can always command the most talented assistants, and also do sufficient business to practise division of labor, which, by assigning parts to workmen skilled in their particular branch, necessarily insures better work at less expense. Our Manufactory, by its proximity to Charles river, enables us to receive lumber direct from the vessel at first cost, and having been erected expressly for the business, is in arrangement, size, convenience and its facilities unequalled, being furnished with steam engine, steam-heated drying-house, planing, grooving, matching, moulding, tenoning, boring, and other machines, together with lath scroll, circular and other saws, &c., all operated by steam power.

These facilities are such as are possessed by no other manufacturer of Organs in this country, and of themselves would enable us to furnish instruments, with a fair profit, at a price which those of like quality must cost builders who have work done by hand that can be better executed at half the cost by steam machinery.

Second hand Organs at all times for sale.

Orders for tuning church organs promptly attended to, and contracts taken for tuning by the year.

Orders respectfully solicited.

By means of a new method of voicing, known only to themselves, they have succeeded in removing the harsh and buzzing sound which formerly characterized the instrument, rendering the tones full, clear and organ-like. The action is prompt and reliable, enabling the performer to execute the most rapid music without obscuring the tones. The swell is arranged to give great expression.

The manufacturers received the First Premium, over all competitors, at the Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association; also at the Metropolitan Mechanics' Fair, held at Washington, D. C.

For the Parlor, instruments are furnished at prices varying from $45 to $150.

Larger instruments, with two banks of keys, for chapels and small churches, from $150 to $300.

Life of John Sebastian Bach;

WITH A CRITICAL VIEW OF HIS COMPOSITIONS, BY J. N. FORKEL.

John Sebastian Bach was now thirty-two years of age; he had made such good use of his time, had studied, composed, and played so much, and by this unremitting zeal and diligence acquired such a mastery over every part of the art, that he stood like a giant, able to trample all around him into dust. He had long been regarded with admiration and wonder, not only by amateurs, but by judges of the art, when, in the year 1717, Mr. Marchand, formerly much celebrated in France as a performer on the clavichord and organ, came to Dresden, where he performed before the king and obtained such approbation, that a large salary was offered him, if he would engage in his majesty's service. Marchand's merit chiefly consisted in a very fine and elegant style of performance; but his ideas were empty and feeble, almost in the manner of Couperin, at least as may be judged by his compositions. But J. S. Bach had an equally fine and elegant style, and at the same time a copiousness of ideas, which might perhaps have made Marchand's head giddy, if he had heard it. All this was known to Volumier, at that time director of the concerts in Dresden. He knew the absolute command of the young German over his thoughts and his instrument, and wished to produce a contest between him and the French artist, in order to give his prince the pleasure of judging of their respective merits, by comparing them himself. With the king's approbation, therefore, a message was dispatched to J. S. Bach, at Weimar, to invite him to this musical contest. He accepted the invitation, and immediately set out on his journey. Upon Bach's arrival in Dresden, Volumier first procured him an opportunity secretly to hear Marchand. Bach was not discouraged, but wrote to the French artist a polite note, formally inviting him to a musical trial of skill: he offered to play upon the spot whatever Marchand should set before him, but requested the same readiness on his part. As Marchand accepted the challenge, the time and place for the contest were fixed, with the king's consent. A large company of both sexes, and of high rank, assembled in the house of Marshal Count Fleming, which was the place appointed. Bach did not make them wait long for him, but Marchand did not appear. After a long delay, they at last sent to inquire at his lodgings, and the company learned, to their great astonishment, that Marchand had left Dresden in the morning of that day, without taking leave of anybody. Bach alone, therefore, had to perform, and excited the admiration of all who heard him; but Volumier's intention, to show, in a sensible and striking manner, the difference between the French and German art, was frustrated. Bach received on this occasion praise in abundance; but it is said that he did not receive a present of 100 louis-d'ors, which the king had designed for him.

He had not long returned to Weimar, when Prince Leopold of Anhalt-Cöthen, a great judge and lover of music, invited him to take the office of master of his chapel. He immediately entered on this office, which he filled nearly six years; but during this time (about 1722) took a journey to Hamburg, in order to perform on the organ there. His performance excited universal admiration. The veteran Reinken, then near a hundred years old, heard him with particular pleasure; and in regard to the chorus, "An Wasserflüssen Babels," which he varied for half an hour in the true organ style, he paid him the compliment of saying, "I thought that this art was dead, but I see that it still lives in you." Reinken himself had some years before composed that chorus in this manner, and had it engraved, as a work on which he set a great value. His praise, therefore, was the more flattering to Bach.

On the death of Kuhnau, in the year 1723, Bach was appointed director of music, and chanter to St. Thomas's School at Leipzig. In this place he remained till his death. Prince Leopold of Anhalt Cöthen had a great regard for him, and Bach therefore left his service with regret. But the death of the prince occurring soon after, he saw that Providence had guided him well. Upon this death, which greatly afflicted him, he composed a funeral dirge, with many remarkably fine double choruses, and executed it himself at Cöthen. That in his present situation he received the title of master of the chapel from the Duke of Weissenfels; and in the year 1736, the title of court composer to the King of Poland, Elector of Saxony, is of little consequence, only it is to be observed that the last title was derived from connections in which Bach was engaged by his office of chanter in St. Thomas's School.

His second son, Charles Philip Emanuel, entered the service of Frederick the Great in 1740. The reputation of the all-surpassing skill of John Sebastian was at this time so extended that the king often heard it mentioned and praised. This made him curious to hear so great an artist. At first he distantly hinted to the son his wish that his father would one day come to Potsdam. But by degrees he began to ask him directly, why his father did not come? The son could not avoid acquainting his father with these expressions of the king's: at first, however, he could not pay any attention to them, because he was generally too much overwhelmed with business. But the king's expressions being repeated in several of his son's letters, he at length, in 1747, prepared to take this journey in company of his eldest son, William Friedemann. At this time the king had every evening a private concert, in which he himself generally performed some concertos on the flute. One evening, just as he was getting his flute ready, and his musicians were assembled, an officer brought him the list of the strangers who had arrived. With his flute in his hand he ran over the list, but immediately turned to the assembled musicians, and said, with a kind of agitation, "Gentlemen, old Bach is come." The flute was now laid aside; and old Bach, who had alighted at his son's lodgings, was immediately summoned to the palace. William Friedemann, who accompanied his father, told me this story, and I must say that I still think with pleasure on the manner in which he related it. At that time it was the fashion to make rather prolix compliments. The first appearance of J. S. Bach before so great a king, who did not even give him time to change his travelling-dress for a black chanter's gown, must necessarily be attended with many apologies. I will not here dwell on these apologies, but merely observe, that in William Friedemann's mouth they made a formal dialogue between the king and the apologist.

But what is more important than this is, that the king gave up his concert for this evening, and invited Bach, then already called the old Bach, to try his forte-pianos, made by Silbermann, which stood in several rooms of the palace. The musicians went with him from room to room, and Bach was invited everywhere to try and to play unpremeditated compositions. After he had gone on for some time, he asked the king to give him a subject for a fugue, in order to execute it immediately without any preparation. The king admired the learned manner in which his subject was thus executed extempore; and, probably to see how far such art could be carried, expressed a wish to hear a fugue with six obligato parts. But as it is not every subject that is fit for such full harmony, Bach chose one himself, and immediately executed it, to the astonishment of all present, in the same magnificent and learned manner as he had done that of the king. His majesty desired also to hear his performance on the organ. The next day, Bach was taken to all the organs in Potsdam, as he had before been to Silbermann's forte-pianos. After his return to Leipzig, he composed the subject, which he had received from the king, in three and six parts, added several artificial passages in strict canon to it, and had it engraved, under the title of "Musikalisches Opfer" (Musical Offering), and dedicated it to the inventor.

This was Bach's last journey. The indefatigable diligence with which, particularly in his younger years, he had frequently passed days and nights, without intermission, in the study of his art, had weakened his sight. This weakness continually increased in his latter years, till at length it brought on a very painful disorder in the eyes. By the advice of some friends, who placed great confidence in the ability of an oculist, who had arrived at Leipzig from England, he ventured to submit to an operation, which twice failed. Not only was his sight now wholly lost, but his constitution, which had been hitherto so vigorous, was quite undermined by the use of, perhaps noxious, medicines, in consequence of the operation. He continued to decline for full half a year, till he expired on the evening of the 30th of July, 1750, in the 66th year of his age. On the morning of the tenth day before his death, he was all at once able to see again, and to bear the light. But a few hours afterwards he was seized with an apoplectic fit; this was followed by an inflammatory fever, which his enfeebled frame, notwithstanding all possible medical aid, was unable to resist.

Such was the life of this remarkable man. I only add that he was twice married, and that he had by his first wife seven and by the second wife thirteen children, namely, eleven sons and nine daughters. All the sons had admirable talents for music; but they were not fully cultivated, except in some of the elder ones.

AN OLD BALLAD.

We find the following in the "Curiosa" collected for the Philadelphia Bulletin, by "Melster Karl," who says of it: "The following eccentric ballad is somewhat modernised from one given in the 'Songs and Carols,' printed from a MS. in the Sloane Collection.' It was written about the year 1450."

I have a young sister
Far beyond the see;
Many are the presents
That she sente me.
She sent me a cherry
Without any stone,
She sent me a pigeon
Without any bone;
Without any thornes
She sent me a briar,
She bade me love my lover,
And that without desire.

How can a cherry
Be without a stone?
How can a pigeon
Be without a bone?
How can a briar
Be without a thorne?
And who e'er loved without desire
Since true love first was born?

When the cherry was a blossom,
Then it had no stone;
When the dove was in the egg,
Then it had no bone;
When first the briar sprouted,
Never a thorne it bore;
And when a maiden has her love,
Oh then she longs no more!

Letters from a Country Singing Teacher.

No. III.

M——, Oct. 29, 1855.

JOHN S. DWIGHT, Esq.,

Dear Sir:—I promised, with your permission, to try my hand at giving you some idea of the difficulties we "psalm-singers" meet with in our endeavors to aid in the progress of a better musical taste. Heretofore a very strong prejudice has existed in the country towns against any one who devoted himself to the profession. Teaching music in any of its branches was considered derogatory, and the singing master especially was "a poor tool." When I was thinking of entering college, with small means, I had a conversation with an uncle, living forty miles from Boston, upon my prospects of being able to work my way through. I mentioned, among other means of earning something, the teaching of music. "Do anything that is honest and honorable," said he, "but don't think of turning singing master!" I can imagine what he would say, if he were still living, to see me making that my profession. I am not alone, however; many graduates of different colleges teach music, and, if I am not misinformed, even your so-called aristocratic institution at Cambridge has her representatives among us.

This feeling here in the country meets me at every turn, and in places like this, so large that society is divided into grades, the 'squires and other dignitaries' families are unknown lands to the 'singing master'.

Winter before last the Calvinist society here, which, with the exception of the Episcopalians, is the most aristocratic, and is indeed much the largest, employed me to teach a singing school, and I have the best reason to suppose that I gave full satisfaction,—namely, in that they have since employed me to take charge of the singing school in the church.

But I am before my story.

The cause of having a school at all at that time was the necessity of doing something to fill up the singer's seats, or, to speak plainly, to do something towards having any singing at all. In the Episcopal society two or three musical families, the most aristocratic people in the place, sustained the choir, sitting themselves in the seats, and making a sort of high-born affair of the thing. The result is very good music. In the Methodist society, where there is no aristocracy, all who can sing at all collect into the seats, and what they lack in science they make up in zeal; and there too it goes very well. The Unitarian society, small but rich, has a hired quartet, very rare in this region. But the large, rich Calvinistic society had had all kinds of trouble. As their numbers increased and some grew wealthy and sent their daughters away to be educated at academies and boarding schools, a gradual separation into ranks took place, until at length Miss Jones—not the real name to be sure—would not sit in the seat with Miss Smith! The one having spent a year away at school and being the daughter of the store keeper, and the other a girl who worked in Mrs. James's milliner's shop! So one after another left the seats, as I was told, on grounds of this sort. But another trouble was in the ambition of two or three would-be "choristers" or leaders. The plan had been pursued of having the singers choose one of their number as leader, and parties had grown up, and sometimes all one party sat below, sometimes the other, and at other times all. On one occasion, and that too when a stranger preached, the first hymn in the morning was sung by a single man, and the preacher gave out no more! An attempt was made to get the congregation to sing, but this proved a signal failure. At length the clergyman, who is one of those rarities, a preacher with a real love and understanding of music, declared he would not endure such a state of things, dishonorable to him, to the society, and to that Being whom they pretended to worship, and to whom they ought to sing praises.

Money was raised and I was employed to teach a school. I had some seventy pupils, and flatter myself that they made good progress; certainly Mr. A., the minister, complimented me highly. Great things were hoped from this school, and no sooner was it finished and I away, than an attempt was made once more to form a choir. For a few weeks all went well, but it was one thing to the young people to meet on a week day evening and have a good time, under the guidance of one who was paid to lead them, and quite another thing to come together on Sunday and undertake to sing under the lead of one who, they supposed, knew no more than they themselves, and who did not know just their favorite tunes and all that sort of thing. Then, too, the old rivalry returned between A, B, and C, and they were soon as badly off as before.

This led to a request for me to undertake the charge of the singing. I accepted, and upon a certain Saturday evening, according to appointment, I met such as felt disposed to join the new choir, and found to my astonishment the vestry full of people of all ages from fifty down to a dozen. Well, there certainly was too much of a good thing. It would be useless to tell all the steps taken to make a selection; it finally ended in my making privately a selection of some twenty-five of my best singers of the winter before, and in getting the ill will of at least as many more. The organist, I am happy to say, is a man of a thousand. At the outset he was kind enough to say that in all that concerned accompanying the vocal music he was entirely under my direction, but that he expected to have no interference from me in regard to his voluntaries and the like. To this I heartily subscribed, and no two ever got along better than we have done. This by the way.

Now came my task. The gentry of the parish continued to sit below. Young ladies, upon whose musical education had been spent I don't know how much, could not for a moment think of joining in the praises of the sanctuary, not they; they sit in the seats with common folks! Many of those who had been accustomed to sit there were utter strangers to me, and yet were offended at my not having sought them out, given them the chief places, and taken their advice. How could I do anything of the kind? I did not know them nor their capabilities. I did know what materials I had, just their worth, and their worthlessness. At all events, there was material of which something might be made. All were young; none capable of singing anything but very simple tunes, and with such tunes we made our first essay. My first request of the parish committee was for a set of new books, containing a higher grade of music than they already had; and, these obtained, there is no telling the labor and pains I took to drill the choir into some appreciation of the difference between good and bad, and into so much skill as would enable them to sing the good. In perhaps three months I began to feel some success attending my efforts. If I had had two young women of taste and musical culture at the outset there would have been no difficulty. But all such kept aloof, and the good girls who came to the choir meetings regularly and did the very best they could, and also came as much from a sense of duty as from any gratification, were laboring girls, "our noble Yankee girls", but of course without the sense of musical beauty which they had never had a chance to acquire.—I had two or three really fine voices, and it soon became a passion with me to develop them. Could my wife have been with me, it would have helped very much, but that was impossible.

But I am making this communication too long, I fear. Let me, however, mention one little incident that occurred some three months after I "entered office."

A Fair was held in the vestry for some charitable purpose, and great were the preparations. All the gentry took hold of it in earnest, and it was really a beautiful sight, as one entered the room and saw what taste could do, when the will was there. My new choir had practiced some good tunes and glees for the occasion, and of course I went over to assist. As I entered, here a face struck me which I had only seen in church or at the door, as a cat may look upon a king, now all wreathed in smiles, selling letters at the Fair post office. There another, the 'squire's daughter, selling lottery tickets, like any girl, behind the counter, only they went by another name. There another young lady, who had relations in Boston, behind a table, serving out lemonade, tea and coffee, and so on. They were taking up the cross and humbling themselves all for the glory of God; but though they would take part in this work, sitting in the seats with the very young ladies with whom on this occasion they were on such intimate terms, that never could be thought of. Well, we sang "Hail smiling morn,"—very appropriate, you may think, to be sung at an evening fair! I did not select it, however. And several other pieces that were within our powers, and then, after a pause, it was buzzed about the room: "Miss Jones is going to sing." Whether that had been kept secret or not I do not know, I knew nothing of what was coming.

Now came Miss Jones towards the piano, with a young man, who I afterwards learned was brought from the city for the occasion. I was standing close by the piano when the book was opened and put upon it. My heart leaped to see "With verdure clad"! It was long since I had had the opportunity of hearing anything of the kind, "cabined, cribbed, confined" to my daily task. The young man played delicately and well, and it was easy to see that he and the singer had full understanding, and that she would not suffer from any fault on his part. Oh, how sweetly she sang! Just that full, penetrating voice which goes to my heart, and withal fully imbued with that nameless something which speaks of refined and intellectual musical culture. A duet followed, sung by Miss Jones and Miss Adams, whose alto did justice to the soprano, and so some half a dozen pieces followed each other, each exciting me more and more, until the tears rolled down my cheeks. I stood there unnoticed by all save a few persons, who evidently were watching to see the effect all this would have upon "the new chorister." As the last piece ended and the singers rose, I forgot all about the difference of rank, and exclaimed to Miss Jones: "Oh, if you would only sit in the singers' seats!"

You should have seen the look she gave me!

Voice could not have said more plainly: "You singing master!" I am afraid my humility was not much increased by that look. It gave me tenfold energy, and I determined, if such a thing was in the bounds of possibility, my head soprano singer, a girl who wanted nothing but cultivation, should yet render Miss Jones's presence in the choir unnecessary.

Respectfully Yours,

P. E. G.

THE AUTUMNAL EQUINOX.

BY REV. N. L. FROTHINGHAM, D. D.

Room for King Autumn! Room!
Summer, the wanton queen, has run to doom,
And died. With warlike din,
The rude but bounteous conquerer marches in.
See how his banners fly,
The gonfalon of cloud and stain-streaked sky.
Hark to his pipe and drum,
On the fierce blast their stormy clangors come;—
They whistle and they beat
O'er the wide ocean, through the narrow street;
While to their terrible call
The surges mount, and tree and turret fall.
His cannon on the air
Flashes and roars. It is his sign! Room there!

Now he is sitting crowned;
And golden sunsets beam his brows around;
And ruddy noontide hours
Warm up the thin leaves of his mottled bowers.
At night the moon's pale face
Rises before its time, to do him grace.
Now plenteous fruits—not such As those before them, mouldering soon from touch,
But hardy, ripening still
For use long hence—the patient garnerers fill.

O equinoctial time,
Whose days are southing towards the frosty clime
Of this strange life! In rains
Of storm and wrath at first thy power invades;
And at the ominous gale
Which Nature shakes at, a poor heart may quail.
New King, be good to me!
Let me thy mellow favors round me see,
And something laid in store, [more.
When leaves have dropped and flowers will bloom no

And take not clean away
The genial glows that warmed a longer day.
Hunters' and Harvest moon,
Loath to desert, and coming up so soon,
Be emblems to my mind
Of love, that when most needed shows most kind;
And all that crimson West
Breathe of pavilioned hopes and no ignoble rest.

Diary Abroad.—No. 23.

BERLIN, SEPT. 26.—Last evening another of those delightful operas of common life, like Cherubini's "Water-carrier," Weigl's "Swiss Family," and Bellini's "Sonnambulist." This is Des Adler's Horst, (The Eagle's Eyrie,) the text by CARL VON HOLTER, the music by FRANZ GLAESER, born in 1792, at the time of Beethoven's death Kapellmeister at one of the Vienna theatres, about 1831 called to the Königsstädtisches Theatre in Berlin, and in 1849 holding a similar position in Copenhagen.

Probably no theatre in the world ever surpassed the Königsstädtisches in the variety and excellence of its performances for so long a period as ten years. SONTAG was for three or four years prima donna there, and the troupe in general was worthy of her. But I cannot stop to give a history of that concern. It is enough to say that in the winter of 1833-4, Des Adler's Horst was produced there, and that last autumn it was revived for JOHANNA WAGNER upon the stage of the Royal Opera. This is the story.

Away up on the Giant Mountains, just upon the line between Bohemia and Silesia, some thousands of feet above the plains below, lived the old herdsman, Father Renner, with his wife Veronica, his son Anton, and his adopted daughter, Maria. One summer came a young woman thither and entered their service. She was the wife of Richard, now the forester of the lord of that mountain tract; but he having deserted her, she had fled with her infant child from the taunts and calumnies of those who knew her and believed her not the wife but mistress of Richard. Her child she kept in a cave near the house of Renner, where she spent every spare moment of her time.

The play opens with her appearance at sunrise engaged in her duties as servant. A recitative and air make known her sorrows and her still living affection for her husband. It appears, but not very clearly, that her knowledge of Richard's pretensions to the hand of Maria—a match which Veronica is anxious to make, that Anton may get him a richer wife—is what led Rose to come hither for refuge. Rose's air is interrupted by the approach of Cassian, a smuggler, who comes clambering down the precipice behind the house. A scene mostly of spoken dialogue (thank the stars!) follows, in which Cassian will have a kiss from the new and pretty girl, and Anton comes angrily to her rescue, running into a trio and quartet, which is very natural and funny. The two smugglers, for Cassian is joined by Lazarus, Father Renner and his wife have parts full of comedy, and I do not know when I have had so good a laugh. In the second act is a most capital scene, where the smugglers produce a basket of Hungarian wine, each drinks a bottle, and Father Renner gets decidedly 'over the bay'. Richard, early in the first act, comes up the mountain on his way, if possible, to reach the nest of the eagle, away up there on the pinnacle of rock,—a place never yet reached by men, though it had been attempted with others by Father Renner.

In this scene, Maria tells Richard, in a trio, that she loves Anton; Richard, deprived of her love, offers his hand as a brother; upon which Rose rushes from the house and joins in the trio with, "Trust him not!" This is a very fine scene, and the music, though not great, is exceedingly fine and appropriate. The surprise of Richard, the astonishment of Maria, the offended womanhood of Rose, are excellently given. The scene is broken off, Richard hurrying up the mountains, by the approach of Anton with a crowd of villagers from the valley, who have come up to assist in the hay harvest of Father Renner. Singing and dancing and fun and frolic are the order of the day. Cassian takes out mother Veronica, and Renner, tripping along beside them with his fat carcass, finally gets so excited that he determines to join the dance, not with any of the maidens present, he has a partner in the house. He goes in, and partly by force, brings out Rose. Upon their appearance the dance ceases—"Rose, Rose; yes, 'tis she, the runaway, the scandalized, the dishonored," &c., from the chorus. Poor Rose; you should see Johanna Wagner's face, her shrinking, her agony! The dance ends, the hay-makers go into the field. Veronica is all indignation. Renner all pity. He has a long and extremely humorous scene of quarrelling with his wife, and then one in which he pities and consoles Rose; and the audience who have shaken with laughing at the first, shed tears at the second. Rose opens her breaking heart to the good old peasant and tells him her sad story. But now that Maria is safe from Richard, she calls Anton, and telling him that she is a wife, she joins Anton's and Maria's hands, and declares her intention of taking her child and going next day to a distant place, with a letter from Renner to a friend there, and there living as a widow among strangers.

There is a scene after this, in which Renner, having previously called his wife "a satan" in a maudlin state, makes up with her by averring that she is his "dear old angel", which convulsed the audience. The second act closes by the crowd of villagers coming rushing upon the stage, and shouting to Renner that the eagle has carried off an infant. The noise and confusion bring Rose from the house; all are pointing upward; she looks up into the clear heavens, and there, sailing towards his nest, is the eagle with her babe! The agony of her cry makes me shiver now to think of it. Rough human foot never trod those heights; she will attempt the rescue—a circumstance told by Scott as having actually occurred in Scotland—rushes through the crowd and disappears up the precipice, while the chorus seek ladders and ropes and everything that can aid in the ascent.

The third act opens with one of the most beautiful scenes I ever saw upon the stage—Alpine peaks enveloped in clouds. In the centre of the stage rise two cliffs, upon one of which is the eagle's nest, upon the other a dead tree. Rose appears climbing slowly up towards them; but her strength is almost exhausted, and overcome with fatigue and the cold she almost gives out. Now comes the sweet sound of the chorus far below, speaking hope, and with new strength she gives vent to her feelings in an air, the only accompaniment of which is the chorus in the distance.

She comes to the cliff with the tree. Too late she finds herself at the foot of the wrong peak, and though within a few feet of the nest, and she can see her child, a deep and impassable gulf lies between. Now, in despair, her voice sounds far and wide, and, as she calls the name of Richard, it reaches her husband's ears, who, spite of the thunder and lightning of the storm which is raging, has been drawing nearer to the object of his search, with a storm of repentance and sorrow more terrible raging in his breast. He calls, she answers. She tells him that she is there in hope of saving their child. Reconciliation takes place; she will return to him and forgive him if he will save the infant. Now the eagle settles down towards the nest and Richard fears to shoot. The lightning strikes, the old tree falls across the chasm—God has made her a bridge. He will direct the shot! Richard nerves himself,—fires,—the eagle drops; and Rose takes her child from the nest unharmed. Now comes up the crowd of villagers with ladders, planks, ropes, and the like, the chasms are bridged, Richard reaches Rose, and with a most beautiful tableau, amid the rejoicings of the chorus and the happiness of the re-united pair, and of good old Father Renner,—the opera ends.

I have found this beautiful both as a play and as an opera. I subscribe heartily to a criticism written in 1833. "The music is joined to a good but very copious text; its character is appropriate, only occasionally based a little too much upon the brilliant and striking instrumental effects, now so much the fashion; [this would not be thought of, however, in these days!] otherwise lively, melodious, for the prima donna very brilliant and well suited, and above all exceedingly well adapted for stage effect." And so on. It is long since I have enjoyed anything so much. I do not see why this opera, well translated and put upon the stage, with good scenery, and good chorus, and with such singers as I understand Miss HENSLEY and ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS to be, might not run fifty nights in Boston. Perhaps, though, a Wagner is necessary to success. How magnificently she did act!

SEPT. 26.—This evening the "Messiah" in the Garrison church, for a charity. I take a grim satisfaction in recording that this famous society gave it most wretchedly. The only number which went very well was the Amen, and that difficult chorus, which I do not remember ever to have heard well at home, rolled out here magnificently. But as a whole how much better I have heard it in Boston! How incomparably better was it given in New York by JULLIEN's orchestra and BUSTOW's Singing Society. None of the rôles were good except those of Madame HAHNEMANN, who always sings beautifully.

But oh, Handel's Music!

SIGNS OF FALL.

BY B. P. SHILLABER.

The curious wind comes searching through the streets,
With bodings bitter,
Whirling around the quick pedestrian's feet
Whole heaps of litter.

The charcoal man has donned his thicker coat,
And gloves of leather,
And chilly strains, that trembling gush, denote
He's 'neath the weather.

The shopkeepers withdraw their fragile stock
Of lace and muslins,
Unable these to stand the stalwart shock
Of autumn's hustlings.

Delaines and thibets float upon the air
In tempting manner,
And Bay State plaids are floating everywhere,
Like many a banner.

And winter furs come on us unperceived—
Of fitch and sable—
And sposa and the girls, their cloaks achieved,
Are comfortable.

And little Billy takes his winter boots
From where he's thrown them;
Alas! he tries and finds that neither suits,
For he's outgrown them.

The vine looks sickly on the trellis high—
The leaves all curling,
And every breeze that hastens rudely by Sets them to whirling.

The old spout, hanging by a single nail,
Doth sigh and mutter,
As if in meek remonstrance with the gale,
That threats doth utter.

The summer birds have left their breezy haunt
Among our branches,
And moved upon their regular annual jaunt
To warmer ranches.

Huge heaps of coal defile the sidewalk way,
And we, confound 'em,
Must o'er their slippery heights a path essay,
Or travel round 'em.

And many bills thrust in their leech-like length,
With items fearful,
Testing the purse whose corresponding strength
Is never near full.

And white hats fade like flakes of falling snow
In spring's warm weather.
And fashion's votaries take another bow,
Or higher feather.

The biting airs the shrinking flesh appal
By sharp incisions,
And every thing proclaims the approach of Fall,
Except provisions!

That "Elegy."

My Dear Mr. Dwight:—The Cento verses, published in your most musical Journal, under the head of "Elegy," dated "Milwaukee, 1855," commencing

"The curfew tolls the knell of parting day,
In every clime, from Lapland to Japan", originally appeared in the Boston Morning Post in 1838. They were selected and dove-tailed by H. D. Johnson, Esq., of Washington. Since that time I have seen them copied in papers from all parts of the Union, and I observed they were also garnered in the "Salad for the Solitary." By your publication one might imagine they were just invented at Milwaukee. Yours Respectfully,

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, OCT. 31.—Concert music with us can only be spoken of as in prospect, and that, alas, rather dim and confused. The elements are still in tumult, and it takes a long time to clear the atmosphere for the winter's campaign. We hear of one plan and another that make our hearts glad, but no new enterprise seems to gain a firm footing. So the promised concerts of the MUSICAL FUND SOCIETY appear to have been but a mirage that deceived us music-thirsty wanderers, and the matinée plan of Messrs. MASON and BERGMANN meets with so little encouragement that there is small hope of its being carried out. But one enjoyment we are sure of; that is Mr. EISEL's Quartette Soirées, which we all have learned to love, some from long habit, others for the pleasure and benefit derived from them. Mr. Eisel, who has returned from Europe in excellent health and with sundry additional pounds of "outer man", has already recommenced his usual activity, and promises us his first soirée, with a fine programme, early next month.

Two of the PHILHARMONIC rehearsals are among the things that have been. It was amusing while they were taking place, to watch the working of the new rule, mentioned in my last, against talking. The effect was different with different members of the audience. Those who came to hear the music could be distinguished by the severe aspect of their countenances at such undisturbed enjoyment; of the rest, some looked perplexed, others bored, and others again kept up with their eyes the conversation in which their lips might not indulge. The prohibition seemed to have kept no one away, for the hall was even more crowded than in former seasons. But if there was a forced silence during the music, the "flow of speech" was all the more rapid and unrestrained at the slightest pause, of which there were not a few, for Mr. Bergmann is remarkably thorough in his drilling of the orchestra. Now on the torrent rushed, at such times, until suddenly dammed up by the recommencement of the music.

Among the audience, last Saturday, we noticed GORTSCHALK, the pianist, (who, by the way, seemed unaware of the rule spoken of above, and might have been benefitted by the admonition of an usher). He has, I believe, but recently arrived in our city, and it is to be hoped that he may remain sometime. If he does not care to give concerts on his own account, may we at least hear him in the first Philharmonic concert.

The MOLLENHAUERS have recommenced their soirées in Brooklyn, but with what success I am unable to say.

NEW YORK, OCT. 31.—There is not much news this week, and I do not believe there will be until after the election. You may wonder what politics have to do with music, but here in New York at present everybody is perfectly mad with electioneering. I heard one of the first violinists of the Philharmonic make a political speech the other day, and I must confess I did not like his oratory half as well as his music. "And he played upon a harp of a thousand strings, sperits of just men made perfect." Even our ladies leave their music and no longer sing arias to their admiring beaux, but (I am glad to say) entreat them to vote the Republican ticket. But in a week or two all this will be changed, the Prophète will be produced, and New York have something new to excite it.

Meanwhile there was an attempt at ballet and concerts, last week, at the Metropolitan. The Spanish dancers furnished the pedal, and Sig. ROBBIO (violinist), Signora VIETTI-VERTIPRACH, &c. the manual and vocal amusement. Last Monday, however, the bubble burst, Signor Robbio uttered his moans of complaint from the stage, interrupting his solo to do so, and the affair "fizzled."

BUCKLEYS have produced ADAMS's La Chalet, and done it exceedingly well. In my next I hope to tell you more about it.

PHILADELPHIA, OCT. 25.—You editors are clever fellows, I know, but at the same time I am very well aware that you do not learn every thing by instinct; like the rest of the world you have to obtain information before you can impart it. You like to make your Journal a record of musical events throughout the country, and I am willing and ready to keep you au fait in regard to matters in Philadelphia. We are about to have a very brilliant season, particularly in the Sacred and Classical concert line, to which you have always paid so much attention in Boston, and it may interest your readers to be furnished with an impartial criticism from a person entirely disconnected with the givers of the various series. I am perfectly certain that such articles as I shall indite would be eagerly perused here, for, notwithstanding our Quaker principles, our papers never speak the truth in regard to concerts, unless free tickets have been scarce, when the actual defects of a performer are discoursed upon in most remarkable style.

To begin, then. We have, in the field of Sacred Concerts, two associations,—the MUSICAL UNION, and the HARMONIA SACRED MUSIC SOCIETY; the last a respectable chartered concern, with a convenient charter, plenty of money, a high standard of popularity, and any amount of energy; the former, a trio of musicians with very remarkable names—ROHR, THUNDER and CROUCH. You know CROUCH, the amiable Crouch, with his superfluous hair, and great voice; Crouch the unappreciated, Crouch the 'composer of Kathleen Mavourneen', as he so continually advertises himself.

THUNDER you probably do not know; a quiet, gentlemanly person, the organist of St. Augustine Catholic cathedral, and a performer of finished excellence; I know nothing against him in any way unless it be that he is unfortunate enough to be an Irishman, which after all is not so bad, now that the Know Nothings have been defeated. ROHR used to sing bass with the SEGUINS during the latter part of that company's existence, and was afterwards with Mr and Miss RICHINGS: a capital singer, too, with a delicious voice. These three have organized a series of performances, the first of which took place on Tuesday, the 28th inst., at Concert Hall, of course, where the large organ of the Harmonia Society is placed. Mr. Thunder presided at this instrument, which is, within a very few pipes, as large as the Tremont Temple organ, with the same number of manuals, and as great a variety of stops; it is badly placed, however, being compressed into the smallest possible of ugly cases, and packed up on a gallery, so that many of the pedals speak against the ceiling. The chorus of the Musical Union numbered, according to the bills, two hundred, according to appearances, a little more than half of that.

The oratorio selected was MEHUL's "Joseph", and had not the night been inclement in the extreme, the hall would have been thronged; as it happened, about seven hundred persons braved the rain storm, and were scattered about the room. The music was very well done in the main; the choristers well drilled and efficient; the organist accompanying with much taste; but the solo singers were very inferior. Your tenor, ARTHURSON, seemed frightened out of his wits, and performed some very extraordinary gymnastics with his pretty voice; he evidently did not know his part, which was a difficult one, full of long uninteresting recitatives, which require to be sung in first rate style to make them acceptable. Then there was a young lady to sing the part of Benjamin; fortunately she had very little to do, as she had neither voice nor style, nor ability to comprehend the music. Some of the newspapers here do talk nonsense about her; for instance the City Item, "our musical organ", says she had "very little to do as Benjamin, but made that little great by the artistic conception with which she rendered the music of the part." This is most certainly "information for the people" who heard her. In our humble opinion the "artistic conception" would have driven the composer out of the hall, full tilt. Mr. Rohr sang Jacob out of tune, but with a degree of expression, a little marred by his Germanic pronunciation. Mr. RAINER shouted the scenes of Naphtali in a surprising manner, while conductor Crouch growled his part from his desk, with his back to the audience, so indistinctly as to be unintelligible. Fancy this quintet, friend Dwight, slaughtering Mehul's beautiful, classic, refined music.

"Joseph" is properly an opera, and is about as well suited for an oratorio as the "St. Paul" or "Elijah" for the stage. Consequently the music sounds tame, deprived of its action and scenic accessories. With all its beauties, it did not tell on the audience, for not a solitary encore was demanded from one end to the other, and the little applause that did manifest itself was highly suggestive of claqueurs. As the Item truly remarks in the course of the same article, (which, by the way, we would particularize as one of the most striking specimens of contradictory writing in our range of reading): "Throughout, Mehul seems to have composed more for an audience of cultivated musicians, than for the public at large." Notwithstanding the failure of the so-called oratorio, it is announced to be repeated on Saturday evening. The performers may avail themselves of the intervening days to practice their solos; if they do not, woe to those who go to hear them.

So much for the "state of the 'union'", and its perpetration of "Joseph". Unhappy Philadelphia! threatened with eleven more concerts from it.

Of the Harmonia we can say but little at present, as its first concert does not take place until next Monday. I tried to get into a rehearsal last Thursday, and certainly succeeded as far as entering was concerned, the doors being open to any one, for the policy of the association is politeness; but staying there was altogether another affair, every seat in the saloon being occupied, and every standing place filled. Not even "The Heavens are telling" could keep me, as I had to listen in an upright posture, consequently I departed as wise as I had come. The society announces HAYDN's "Creation" for its first concert, with the organ I have already mentioned, a full orchestra, the chorus, which has a high reputation, and the best solo talent to be found among the ranks of its members, no one being suffered to appear unless regularly belonging to the vocal department. I will tell you all about it in my next, but in every probability that "all" will be but "small", as I consider the Harmonia absurdly overrated.

The celebration of MOZART's Birthday is taken in hand solely by the German societies, although they confidently expect the assistance and concurrence of the Musical Union and Musical Fund Society. It will doubtless be a grand affair.

PARODI returns to us next week, and Mme. LAGRANGE is coming back to sing for the Philharmonic—perhaps. Yours, VERITAS.

[We shall be pleased to hear again from "Veritas," but we must require the writer's real name.—Ed.]

Serenity, repose, grace, the characteristics of the antique works of Art, are also those of MOZART's school. As the Greek portrayed his thundering Jove with a serene face, so Mozart wields his lightnings.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, NOV. 3, 1855.

New York Philharmonic Society.

We have received the Thirteenth Annual Report of this now really flourishing society. Its history is not only full of encouragement to the high-toned musicians, who have labored through its instrumentality to make classical music a permanent institution in that great Babel of a city, and to those among its busy, care-worn population who hunger and thirst after good music, but it may furnish some good lessons to those of like wants and tastes in our own and other cities. The love for great orchestral music is sure to deepen and the audience therefor to widen, where such music can be frequently and well performed, and easily accessible. In each of our large cities there are given the desire for it on the part of many, and the capacity in more; there are given also the musical material and talent for such concerts. The only real problem is of organization, of bringing the demand and supply into some permanent and working form. The New York Philharmonic Society may not be by any means a perfect solution of the problem; its plan perhaps admits of many modifications for the better; yet it has wrought out a result instructive and encouraging.

By the Report it appears that the gross receipts from the four Concerts (with rehearsals) for the season of 1854-'55, amounted to the large sum of $6,400. This, after defraying all expenses, left a dividend of $65.00 to each member of the orchestra of over seventy musicians.—Since the beginning of the society the amount of $1,434.14 has been appropriated for charitable purposes, for the relief of members in distress, of widows and children of deceased, &c. The Report gives a list of 747 "associate members," as the subscribers for season tickets are called, who form for the most part a body of reliable supporters of the concerts season after season. There is also a list of 144 "professional members" and of 51 "subscribing members," whose relation to the affair we do not precisely understand. Some light, however, may be gathered from the opening paragraph of the Report:

We again have cause to rejoice at the liberal patronage our Society has received during the past season, which, indeed, has proved one of unprecedented success, the number of professional members having increased during that period from 555 to 747; the number of subscribing members, however, diminished from 62 to 51. As this last item may seem a contradiction when we speak of our increasing success, and as it may appear strange that the annual reports for several seasons should show a gradual but steady decrease in the number of subscribers, we will embrace this opportunity for assigning the true cause of it, for instead of considering it a feature for discouragement, it will be easily seen that we have cause rather to rejoice over it. At the time of the formation of the Society we had only subscribing members, whose privilege it was to attend the three concerts of each season, and who were quite satisfied with listening to our performances on these occasions alone; a few years later, however, a desire was manifested by many to attend also the rehearsals of the Society, so as to have an opportunity of hearing the works of the great masters several times before the final performance, in order to be enabled to enjoy and appreciate them more thoroughly, which fact at once induced the Society to create an associate membership, the additional advantage of which is, that all such belonging to this class of members have an admission to all the rehearsals of the Society; moreover the annual number of concerts was increased from three to four. From the moment this arrangement was consummated, the associate members increased rapidly from season to season, while the list of subscribers as regularly decreased. You will at once perceive that a most unmistakable proof is thus furnished of the great change which has taken place during the last fifteen years in the musical sense of our community, and of the increased interest that is now felt in our midst for truly good music.

Strange to say, this admission of audience to rehearsals, which operated so badly in the case of the Musical Fund orchestra in Boston, seems to have been the salvation of the Philharmonic. Yet it has not been without its attendant evils there. Can an orchestra be actually and sincerely drilled before an audience? Will the individual member submit with a good grace to be checked by the conductor and asked to try his lame passage over by himself in presence of the beau monde? Can the conductor feel as free to interrupt the music and the smooth enjoyment of the audience, as he would in private? Doubtless the Philharmonic, too, has had its share of this old difficulty; to offset which, in part, at least, the Government in their Report repeat the recommendation of separate (private) rehearsals for the string instruments alone. They have also found their business disturbed by the ungentelemanly and unlady-like behavior of some guests so privileged; and for protection against this outrage they have this season employed ushers in the hall for the express purpose of checking all such improprieties, in furtherance of the following recommendation:

4th. That the most efficient means be taken for preventing the disgraceful habit of talking aloud at the rehearsals while the performance is going on; which, to say nothing of such gross breach of good manners, has of late become such a source of annoyance, that it has provoked serious and just complaints, the more so, as this unwarrantable conduct seems to emanate from but a few of those present, who—to the detriment of the many true lovers of music—would seem to be more attracted and charmed by the sounds of their own voices, than by the inspiring, solemn, majestic tones of BEETHOVEN or MENDELSSOHN.

An excellent, because just and necessary, although unfortunately necessary, measure, which it would be well to introduce into Concerts, strictly so called, as well as into public rehearsals. We commend it to the directors of our own various orchestral and oratorio concerts for this coming winter. It will allow the quiet ones to listen to Mozart and Beethoven in peace, while the offending parties cannot possibly complain when checked, since a moment's reflection must show them that they and they only have been in the wrong. These are the two serious objections against the public rehearsal system. As to the third one, often urged, that they take off the edge of public appetite and spoil it for the concerts, by making these fine feasts too cheap and common, we see little force in it. The truth is that all great musical compositions require to be heard more than once to be appreciated; that the eager love for such great music "grows by what it feeds upon," and can only exist to any wide extent amid frequent opportunities of hearing it; that a symphony of Beethoven, where it has been heard again and again by thousands, will attract thousands, whereas when announced for the first time it will barely attract hundreds; and therefore we conclude that a well regulated system of admission of audiences to rehearsals, by familiarizing the ears and minds of people with good music, does really tend to recruit and educate fresh audiences for concerts. The perfect settlement of the question would be a system which should combine both private and audience rehearsals. The Philharmonic plan extends the privilege of rehearsals only to subscribers to the series of Concerts, or "Associate Members," and to others introduced by them, upon the payment of fifty cents for each such admission.

The success of the Philharmonic Society seems due to several causes, prominent among which are these. First, it has been fortunate from the start in the composition of its members, and particularly in the fact, that being a self-governing society of musicians, a class so seldom capable of managing the business of a society, it has found musicians gifted with the capacity for leadership, high-toned, gentlemanly, who had the spirit of devotion and of order, and whose wholesome influence was cheerfully seconded by all. Second, as regards the musical excellence and completeness of the orchestra, New York has so very large a body of musicians, from which such a society may draw. Third, their audience, although it has averaged very much smaller, until the last year, than our Boston audiences for such concerts, has paid very much better. The high price system has prevailed. A sort of exclusiveness has even been the policy of the society during the years of its initiation; it has been made a privilege to be enrolled among its auditors, like an admission into the true society and sphere of music-lovers:—a thing therefore worth paying well for, for the sake of listening in a somewhat congenial atmosphere and undisturbed. This has not been without its good result; it has given character and basis to the concerts, on the strength of which they can now afford to make themselves more cheap and popular, without catering to lower tastes.

But in and through all and above all is this success due to the high stand taken, and persistently maintained, by the artistic leaders who have given tone to the society; who, notwithstanding some inferior programmes, have ever had a foremost regard to the cultivation of a high and classical taste in music; and who have not compromised the dignity of Art by resorting to the extraneous means of brilliant superficial triumphs, to swelling advertisements and the like Barnumbian clap-trap. Content to persevere in doing a good thing and let the world find them out, they at length have their reward.

A LEAGUE FOR TRUTH.—"Veritas," who writes to us from Philadelphia, complains that the newspapers there never will tell the truth about the concerts, unless their consciences are suddenly quickened by the withholding of "free tickets." The same thing is lamentably too true of newspapers in all our cities, nor is the case a great deal better when you go to London and to Paris. "Musical criticism" in newspapers, we all know, with a very, very few exceptions, and those exceptions sometimes only for a short spell, is anything but criticism, and anything but truth-telling. It is simply extra-bountiful advertisement, which the concert-givers have got spoiled and pampered into looking for as a part of the quid pro quo when they insert paid advertisements. In paying a business price, they expect not only to have their business done, but to have any amount of friendship and partiality and praise thrown in besides. Newspapers live by advertising, and so vie with one another in inconsiderate praise and compliment of artists and would-be artists and humbugs and all, rather than lose their patronage.

If a young man, with some sincere love of musical truth, reviews a concert for a newspaper, he is very apt to receive a hint from the employer that the article must be as complimentary and flattering as he can "conscientiously" make it; and he must stretch that conscience very far not to be told the next morning that he has been "terribly severe," let him write as kindly as he will. We blame no one; perhaps in the present state of things they cannot do better; perhaps it is impossible to swim against the tide. The truth is, musical criticism, in any true sense, does not pay. Very rarely does a newspaper see its interest in paying for it liberally enough to secure the services of persons qualified for such a task. They make light of it, are content with the loose and thoughtless paragraphs of any boy, who is glad to gratify his love of concert-going, and perhaps his vanity, getting free admissions and a few dollars to-boot for so easy a service as the fun of inditing the said paragraphs and reading them the next morning. The staple of the articles is praise, promiscuous and unqualified, in full chime always with the heralding announcements of Madame's or of Signor's enterprising, gentlemanly, generous agents. Sometimes a little personal spite or prejudice varies the color of the article, embittering its tone, but who will deny that we have faithfully depicted the prevailing practice? A third-rate prima donna comes, with shrewd associates and agents; telegraphic despatches, even, have forewarned us of her astounding triumph last night in another city; the laudatory echoes are caught up by paper after paper with the simplest, silliest good will; she sings, perhaps shows real merits, but the talk is started, the fashion is set, "it's the humor of it" (as Corporal Nym says,) and "peerless," "unapproachable" are the flaming epithets that break out over every newspaper. You would think that here was another LIND or GRISI; for all that was ever said of them is said of this one, and will be said again and again of others who shall follow at an humble distance after her.

Now we make a proposal to the conductors of our City Press; for we know that they all would gladly maintain the dignity of criticism in music as in other matters, in their columns, if they only knew they could. The proposal is simply this: let all the daily papers enter into a league together, that, whether concert-givers advertise with them or not, in their notices of artists and of concerts, they will all abide by one another in telling nothing but the truth, so far as they are able to find it out; that any suggestion from agents or managers of concerts as to the kind of notice expected, shall be treated as a discourtesy to the Press; as, in fact, so much impertinence. This will soon bring the agents to their senses, and show them their advertising is a business matter, and no favor. Now who will lead off in a League for Truth?

Musical Chat-Chat.

Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS gives a second Concert in the Music Hall this evening, assisted by Mr. MILLARD and an orchestra conducted by ZERRAHN. She will sing the famous cavatina: Che farò senza Euridice, from Gluck's Orfeo; an aria from Marino Faliero (Donizetti); Non più mesta; an English ballad; and duets from Tancredi and La Favorita. Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture will open the concert. . . . Mrs. J. H. LONG, one of the most gifted and promising of our native singers, has been engaged, it will be seen, for the first of the Orchestral Concerts, which has been fixed for the 24th of this month. See announcement in another column, and make haste if you would secure season tickets at subscription price.

We have had peculiar satisfaction in viewing a statuette of BEETHOVEN, in Paris bronze, by WM. W. STORY. The design is original and striking, and the execution admirable. Intended for a parlor and not a monumental statue in a spacious hall, it differs altogether in treatment from the colossal Beethoven of CRAWFORD. The mighty little man, with the great head, is represented in a sitting posture, leaning over the arm of his chair, his chin resting on his hand, which grasps the ball surmounting the chair, as in the very agony of composition, all knotted up, and laboring with great thoughts, and a mighty, never-yielding will to execute them, as only a Beethoven could labor. The figure is short and rugged, as we have the actual man described, not lifted into any ideal nobility of stature; the dress, too, that of his time, until his latest years, that is, small clothes, open shirt collar, and a large skirted great coat thrown back, with pocket stuffed with music sheets. The head, for which the artist had the aid of a mask taken from the composer's face after death, is bigger in proportion, than in Crawford's statue, and perhaps more literally true, yet not essentially unlike, at least to our observation. It is of the noblest type, thoroughly German in its character, and thoroughly individual; full of fire, of genius, of deep-brooding sentiment and thought, of power and equally of suffering; the forehead covered with knotty protuberances and swollen veins; the face marked and furrowed with the lines of intense thought and emotion. One feels that this is truly Beethoven, and can admire it equally in its way with the colossal erect image designed for the Music Hall. We trust our friend will allow copies, both in bronze and plaster, of this satisfactory statuette, which was modelled while he was abroad, at the suggestion of the poet BROWNING, who is the appreciating possessor of the first copy.

We are happy to learn that Mr. OLIVER DITSON is about publishing the complete four-part songs of MENDELSSOHN, with German and English words, in a handsome volume of some 200 pages. It will be the richest windfall to our hundreds of glee clubs and singing circles, that has occurred for many a year. We only hope that the English words used may be a somewhat fair representation of the German original; for song-writers like Mendelssohn and Franz and Schubert, commonly choose good poems for their subjects. It has been too common here for publishers, on the score of economy, to borrow any English words they might chance to find in London editions of the songs they undertake to reprint. . . . J. A. NOVELLO, (London and New York,) has just issued the theoretic works of ALBRECHTSBERGER, the great contrapuntist, the master of BEETHOVEN and so many other masters, complete in one beautiful octavo volume, at the low price of $2.63, a work which in former editions has cost four times as much. The translation is by SABILLA NOVELLO, and the book contains the treatise on "Harmony and Thorough Bass," and the "Guide to Composition," which may also be had separately, the former in one, and the latter in two volumes. A lawyer would almost as soon be without his Blackstone, as a musician without this foundation work.

At the Academy of Music during the past week Mme. LAGRANGE has appeared in La Sonnambula and Linda. The steamers Hermann and Ariel brought the new artists, whose engagement was mentioned in our last, viz: SALVIANI, first tenor, from Florence; PATANIA, prima donna, from Vienna and Milan; CASPANI, primo basso profondo, from Milan; and Signora VANTALDI, contralto; also Mlle. NANTIER-DIDIE, contralto, who succeeded ALBONI at Covent Garden, and has been principal contralto with GRISI and MARIO for the past three years. The season will now set in in earnest. The Prophète will be brought out early next week, in which SALVIANI will make his first appearance as the Prophet, with Mme. LAGRANGE as Fides, and MORELLI as Zacharias. Les Huguenots, L'Etoile du Nord, Robert le Diable, and Verdi's last, the "Sicilian Vespers," are also promised.

The Philadelphia newspapers notice the performances of Mehul's "Joseph" in much more admiring terms than our spicy correspondent "Veritas."—Surely "Veritas" could have found a happier term to apply to Mr. ARTHURSON's voice than "pretty;" the timidity, or nervousness, we can conceive possible, and without discredit to so good an artist. The Argus says of him:

He has a fine tenor voice, a prepossessing appearance, and a thorough musical education. His notes are pure, and made without any apparent effort. His manners are easy and graceful, and, as far as we could observe, he had but a single fault, and that is a serious one. He has affectations of pronunciation which mar his singing most grievously. As an example of what we mean, take the simple word into. Mr. A. sings it as a word of three syllables, thus—in-a-to.

Of the second performance, on Saturday, the Penn. Inquirer says:

The immense body of voices, and the executants, generally appeared to vie with each other in making the ensemble perfect, and never was a more glorious triumph achieved than on this second performance. Applause followed each successive piece in order, and the discrimination shown by the Conductor, fully convinced every listener present that he fully understood his subject, and the executants under him as fully comprehended the energetic wielding of his baton. The Choruses appeared like one vast piece of machinery, once set in motion, impossible to go wrong. Words and music rolled on in mighty majesty, and for once we heard distinctly the words emphatically given, agreeably to the text and common sense.

We have received a copy of the English version of the text of "Joseph," used on this occasion, made by Prof. CROUCH, who, we are happy to hear, proposes to publish the work by subscription. We are not familiar with the original, but the translation reads well. The week has been a very musical one in Philadelphia: Saturday, 27th, Musical Union, "Joseph;" Monday, Harmonia Sacred Music Society, "Creation;" Wednesday, PARODI, with STRAKOSCH, ARTHURSON, &c., a rich programme; Thursday, Miss C. SHEPPARD, with Messrs. THUNDER, CROUCH, and LA CRASSA, pianist, songs, glees, &c.; Friday, Parodi again; and Saturday (to-night) Arthurson and Crouch.

ALFRED JAEEL was concertizing in the early part of last month, with his usual success, in Hanover, where, says the journal of that place, he had the honor to play before the king, who graciously presented the young artist with a costly ring....OLE BULL has taken up his bow again. He has lately played in Providence, and gave a concert in Salem on Wednesday evening, assisted by Mlle. SOPHIE MARIANI, "favorite young prima donna and great vocalist from the principal theatres of Italy and Germany," Sig. MANZOCCHI, "first tenor of the grand operas of Madrid, Lisbon and Naples," and "the distinguished pianist and composer," FRANZ ROTH.... A Philadelphia paper says of the concert mentioned in our correspondence, alluding to the by no means fair-weather names of some of the leading performers: "A terribly stormy, wet and disagreeable evening—probably an elemental compliment to Messrs. THUNDER, ROHR and RAINER—prevented a very large attendance at Concert Hall to hear Mehul's oratorio of "Joseph and his Brethren."

CHURCH ORGANS. COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

WM. B. D. SIMMONS, Organ Builder,

(Heretofore doing business in the style of WM. B. D. SIMMONS & Co.) and

GEORGE FISHER,

Of Cambridge, have this day formed a Copartnership for continuing the manufacture of Church Organs.

We design to keep in our Warerooms New Instruments for sale at prices from $400 to $1,500 each, and are prepared to build by contract at the shortest notice. Organs, worth from $600 to $12,000. And by prompt and faithful execution of orders hope to merit a like encouragement to that heretofore extended to WM. B. D. SIMMONS, and which has indicated the necessity of this business connection, that his entire attention may be devoted to the more difficult and artistic parts of the business, so that an increase thereof may cause no diminution of the personal attention which is requisite for the maintenance of the CHARACTER of our instruments, upon which we rely for success.

While it will be our aim and ambition to furnish ORGANS OF A PERFECTION OF TONE AND MECHANISM, AND OF AN ELEGANCE OF EXTERIOR UNSURPASSED, we are confident of ability to offer terms MORE FAVORABLE THAN CAN BE OBTAINED ELSEWHERE, for the following reasons: Having ample means, we can purchase in large quantities at first cost, for cash; can always command the most talented assistants, and also do sufficient business to practise division of labor, which, by assigning parts to workmen skilled in their particular branch, necessarily insures better work at less expense. Our Manufactory, by its proximity to Charles river, enables us to receive lumber direct from the vessel at first cost, and having been erected expressly for the business, is in arrangement, size, convenience and its facilities unequalled, being furnished with steam engine, steam-heated drying-house, planing, grooving, matching, moulding, tenoning, boring, and other machines, together with lath scroll, circular and other saws, &c., all operated by steam power.

These facilities are such as are possessed by no other manufacturer of Organs in this country, and of themselves would enable us to furnish instruments, with a fair profit, at a price which those of like quality must cost builders who have work done by hand that can be better executed at half the cost by steam machinery.

Second hand Organs at all times for sale.

Orders for tuning church organs promptly attended to, and contracts taken for tuning by the year.

Orders respectfully solicited.

FIRST PREMIUM MELODEONS, The Very Best now Manufactured.

S. D. & H. W. SMITH respectfully call the attention of the public to their IMPROVED MELODEONS, constantly on exhibition at their Warerooms,

No. 417 Washington Street.

By means of a new method of voicing, known only to themselves, they have succeeded in removing the harsh and buzzing sound which formerly characterized the instrument, rendering the tones full, clear and organ-like. The action is prompt and reliable, enabling the performer to execute the most rapid music without obscuring the tones. The swell is arranged to give great expression.

The manufacturers received the First Premium, over all competitors, at the Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association; also at the Metropolitan Mechanics' Fair, held at Washington, D. C.

For the Parlor, instruments are furnished at prices varying from $45 to $150.
Larger instruments, with two banks of keys, for chapels and small churches, from $150 to $300.

This last instrument, known as the ORGAN HARMONIUM, has been essentially improved by Messrs. Smith, and they have secured a patent therefor.

Persons who wish to hire Melodeons with a view of purchasing at the end of the year, can have the rents credited as part payment of the purchase money.

Life of John Sebastian Bach;

WITH A CRITICAL VIEW OF HIS COMPOSITIONS, BY J. N. FORKEL.

CHAPTER III.

John Sebastian Bach's manner of managing the clavichord is admired by all those who have had the good fortune to hear him, and envied by all those who might themselves pretend to be considered as good performers. That this mode of playing on the clavichord must have been very different from that in use among Bach's predecessors and contemporaries, may be easily imagined; but hitherto nobody has explained in what this difference properly consisted.

If we hear the same piece played by ten equally skilful and practised performers, it will produce, under the hand of each, a different effect. Each will draw from the instrument a different kind of tone, and also give to these tones a greater, or less degree of distinctness. Whence can this difference arise, if all the ten performers have sufficient readiness and practice? Merely from the mode of touching the instrument, which, in playing on the clavichord, is the same thing as the pronunciation in speech. In order to make the delivery (as it may be called) perfect in playing, as well as in speaking or declaiming, the greatest distinctness is required in the production of the tones, as in the pronunciation of the words. But this distinctness is susceptible of very various degrees. Even in the lowest degrees we can understand what is played or said; but it excites no pleasure in the hearer, because this degree of distinctness compels him to some exertion of his attention. But attention to single tones or words ought to be rendered unnecessary, that the hearer may direct it to the ideas and their connection, and for this we require the highest degree of distinctness in the production of single tones, as in the pronunciation of single words.

I have often wondered that C. Ph. Emanuel Bach, in his "Essay on the True Manner of Playing on the Clavichord," did not describe at length this highest degree of distinctness in the touch of that instrument, as he not only possessed it himself, but because in this consists one of the chief differences, by which Bach's mode of playing on the clavichord is distinguished from all others. He says, indeed in the chapter on the style of performance: "Some persons play as if they had glue between their fingers; their touch is too long, because they keep the keys down beyond the time. Others have attempted to avoid this defect, and play too short, as if the keys were burning hot. This is also a fault. The middle path is the best." But he should have taught, and described to us, the means of attaining this middle path. I will endeavor to make the matter plain, as far as such things can be made plain without oral instructions.

According to Sebastian Bach's manner of placing the hand on the keys, the five fingers are bent, so that their points come into a straight line over the keys, lying in a plane surface under them, in such a manner, that no single finger has to be drawn nearer, when it is wanted, but that every one is ready over the key which it may have to press down. From this manner of holding the hand, it follows,—1st. That no finger must fall upon its key, or (as often happens) be thrown on it, but must be placed upon it, with a certain consciousness of the internal power and command over the motion. 2nd. The impulse thus given to the keys, or the quantity of pressure, must be maintained in equal strength, and that in such a manner, that the finger be not raised perpendicularly from the key, but that it glide off the fore part of the key, by gradually drawing back the tip of the finger towards the palm of the hand. 3rd. In the transition from one key to another, this gliding off causes the quantity of force or pressure, with which the first tone has been kept up, to be transferred, with the greatest rapidity, to the next finger, so that the two tones are neither disjoined from each other, nor blended together. The touch is, therefore, as C. Ph. Emanuel Bach says, neither too long nor too short, but just what it ought to be.

The advantages of such a position of the hand, and of such a touch, are very various, not only on the clavichord, but also on the pianoforte and the organ. I will here mention only the most important. 1st. The holding of the fingers bent renders all their motions easy. There can therefore be none of the scrambling, thumping, and stumbling, which is so common in persons who play with their fingers stretched out, or not sufficiently bent. 2nd. The drawing back of the tips of the fingers, and the rapid communication thereby effected, of the force of one finger to that following it, produces the highest degree of clearness in the expression of the single tones, so that every passage performed in this manner sounds brilliant, rolling, and round. It does not cost the hearer the least exertion of attention to understand a passage so performed. 3rd. By the gliding of the tip of the finger upon the key with an equable pressure, sufficient time is given to the string to vibrate; the tone, therefore, is not only improved, but also prolonged, and we are thus enabled to play in proper connection even long notes, on an instrument so poor in tone as the clavichord is. All this together has, besides, the very great advantage that we avoid all waste of strength by useless exertion, and by constraint in the motions. In fact, Sebastian Bach is said to have played with so easy and small a motion of the fingers, that it was hardly perceptible. Only the first joints of the fingers were in motion; the hand retained, even in the most difficult passages, its rounded form; the fingers rose very little from the keys, hardly more than in a shake, and when one was employed, the other remained still in its position. Still less did the other parts of his body take any share in his play, as happens with many whose hand is not light enough.

A person may, however, possess all these advantages, and yet be a very indifferent performer on the harpsichord, in the same manner as a man may have a very clear and fine pronunciation, and yet be a bad declaimer or orator. To be an able performer, many other qualities are necessary, which Bach likewise possessed in the highest perfection.

The natural difference between the fingers in size, as well as strength, frequently seduces performers, wherever it can be done, to use only the stronger fingers, and neglect the weaker ones. Hence arises not only an inequality in the expression of several successive tones, but even the impossibility of executing certain passages, where no choice of fingers can be made. John Sebastian Bach was soon sensible of this; and to obviate so great a defect, wrote for himself particular pieces, in which all the fingers of both hands must necessarily be employed in the most various positions, in order to perform them properly and distinctly. By this exercise he rendered all his fingers of both hands equally strong and serviceable, so that he was able to execute not only chords, and all running passages, but even single and double shakes with equal ease and delicacy. He was perfectly master even of those passages in which, while some fingers perform a shake, the others on the same hand have to continue the melody.

To all this was added the new mode of fingering which he had contrived. Before his time, and in his younger years, it was usual to play rather harmony than melody, and not in all the twenty-four major and minor modes. As the clavichord was still what the Germans call "gebunden," so that several keys struck a single string, it could not be perfectly tuned: people played therefore only in those modes which could be tuned with the most purity. From these circumstances it happened, that even the greatest performers of that time did not use the thumb till it was absolutely necessary in stretching. When Bach began to unite melody and harmony, so that even his middle parts did not merely accompany, but had a melody of their own, when he extended the use of the modes, partly by deviating from the ancient modes of church music, which were then very common, even in secular or chamber music, partly by mixing the diatonic and chromatic scales, and learnt to tune his instrument, so that it could be played upon in all the twenty-four modes; he was obliged to contrive another mode of fingering better adapted to his new methods than that hitherto in use, particularly with respect to the thumb. Some persons have pretended that Couperin taught this mode of fingering before him, in his work published in 1716, under the title of "L'Art de toucher le Clavecin." But, in the first place, Bach was at that time above thirty years old, and had long made use of his manner of fingering; and secondly, Couperin's fingering is still very different from that of Bach, though it has in common with it the more frequent use of the thumb. I say only, the more frequent; for in Bach's method the thumb was made the principal finger, because it is absolutely impossible to do without it in what are called the difficult keys: this is not the case with Couperin, because he neither had such a variety of passages, nor composed and played in such difficult keys as Bach, and consequently had not such urgent occasion for it. We need only compare Bach's fingering, as C. Ph. Emanuel has explained it, with Couperin's directions, and we shall soon find that with the one, all passages, even the most difficult and the fullest, may be played distinctly and easily, while with the other we can, at the most, get through Couperin's own compositions, and even them with difficulty. Bach was, however, acquainted with Couperin's works, and esteemed them, as well as the works of several French composers for the harpsichord of that day, because a pretty and elegant mode of playing may be learned from them. But he considered them as too affected, in the frequent use of the graces or ornaments, so that scarcely a note is free from them. The ideas which they contained were, besides, too flimsy for him.

From the easy, unconstrained motion of the fingers—from the excellent touch—from the clearness and precision in connecting the successive tones—from the advantages of the new mode of fingering—from the equal practice of all the fingers of both hands—and, lastly, from the great variety of his figures of melody, which were employed in every piece in a new and uncommon manner, Sebastian Bach at length acquired such a high degree of facility, and, we may almost say, unlimited power over his instrument in all the modes, that there were hardly any more difficulties for him. As well in his unpremeditated fantasias, as in executing his other compositions, in which it is well known that all the fingers of both hands are constantly employed, and have to make motions, which are as strange and uncommon as the melodies themselves, he is said to have possessed such certainty that he never missed a note. He had, besides, such an admirable facility in reading and executing the compositions of others (which, indeed, were all easier than his own), that he once said to an acquaintance, while he lived at Weimar, that he really believed he could play everything, without hesitating, at the first sight. He was, however, mistaken; and the friend, to whom he had thus expressed his opinion, convinced him of it before a week was passed. He invited him one morning to breakfast, and laid upon the desk of his instrument, among other pieces, one which, at the first glance, appeared to be very trifling. Bach came, and, according to his custom, went immediately to the instrument, partly to play, partly to look over the music that lay on the desk. While he was turning over and playing it, his friend went into the next room to prepare breakfast. In a few minutes Bach got to the piece which was destined to make him change his opinion, and began to play it. But he had not proceeded far when he came to a passage at which he stopped. He looked at it, began anew, and again stopped at the same passage. "No," he called out to his friend, who was laughing to himself in the next room, at the same time going away from the instrument, "one cannot play everything at first sight; it is not possible."

He had an equal facility in overlooking scores, and executing the substance of them at first sight on the harpsichord. He even saw so easily through parts laid side by side, that he could immediately play them. This he often did, when a friend had received a new trio or quartetto for stringed instruments, and wished to hear how it sounded. He was also able, if a single bass part, often ill figured, was laid before him, immediately to play from it a trio or a quartet; nay, he even went so far, when he was in a cheerful humor, and in the full consciousness of his powers, as to perform extempore, to three single parts, a fourth part, and thus to make a quartetto of a trio. For these purposes he used two clavichords and the pedal, or a harpsichord with two sets of keys, provided with a pedal.

He liked best to play upon the clavichord; the harpsichord, though certainly susceptible of a very great variety of expression, had not soul enough for him; and the piano was, in his lifetime, too much in its infancy, and still much too coarse to satisfy him. He therefore considered the clavichord as the best instrument for study, and, in general, for private musical entertainment. He found it the most convenient for the expression of his most refined thoughts, and did not believe it possible to produce from any harpsichord, or pianoforte, such a variety in the gradations of tone as on this instrument, which is, indeed, poor in tone, but on a small scale extremely flexible.

Nobody could adjust the quill-plectrums of his harpsichord to his satisfaction; he always did it himself. He also tuned both his harpsichord and his clavichord himself, and was so practised in the operation, that it never cost him above a quarter of an hour. But then when he played from his fancy all the twenty-four modes were in his power; he did with them what he pleased. He combined the most remote as easily and as naturally together as the nearest; the hearer believed he had only modulated within the compass of a single mode. He knew nothing of harshness in modulation; his transitions in the chromatic scale were as soft and flowing as if he had wholly confined himself to the diatonic scale. His "Chromatic Fantasia," which is now published, may prove what I here state. All his extempore voluntaries are said to have been of the same description, but frequently much more free, brilliant and expressive.

In the execution of his own pieces he generally took the time very brisk, but contrived, besides this briskness, to introduce so much variety in his performance, that under his hand every piece was, as it were, like a discourse. When he wished to express strong emotions, he did not do it as many do, by striking the keys with great force, but by melodic and harmonical figures, that is, by the internal resources of the art. In this he certainly felt very justly. How can it be the expression of violent passion, when a person so beats on his instrument, that with all the hammering and rattling, you cannot hear any note distinctly, much less distinguish one from another?

Letters from a Country Singing Teacher.

No. IV.

M——, Nov. 5, 1855.

JOHN S. DWIGHT, Esq.,

Dear Sir:—I learn that in the cities choristers have full power and their word is law. This is as it must be, to insure any degree of success in the music of public worship. This is well understood, I am told, by the singers, and so long as one has the charge, so long is he implicitly obeyed. Upon my first undertaking the choir here this necessity was fully explained, and I had every reason to suppose that the persons who sang with me fully understood it and were ready to act accordingly; that they saw, even if the leader was wrong in his views, it was better for the general effect and object to be gained to follow him implicitly, than to create confusion by doing, like the children of Israel in the time of the Judges: "every one that which was right in his own eyes." And for a time I had no cause to complain.

Our numbers increased, and every Sunday showed a decided improvement. By the end of the first half year it began to be remarked that our choir was really beginning to sing with the spirit and understanding, and the pastor was beginning to indulge hopes that his favorite plan, one in which I heartily shared, for the music of our Congregational churches, might become a fixed fact.

This plan was as follows:

After the congregation were seated and all was still, a short voluntary upon the organ; then a sentence or two from the Bible, as in the Episcopal church, to be followed by an anthem chant, or in some cases by a piece similar to the fine four, five, six part pieces, and the like, in the book published by Messrs. Baker and Southard a few years since; the sextet from Rossini: "Though the sinner," for instance;—then the usual short prayer, followed by the hymn. The two hymns before the sermon were to be sung to the best and most refined tunes we could compass, while in a short hymn after the sermon, both in the forenoon and afternoon service, the choir was only to lead off the congregation in some choral: "Old Hundred," "York," "St. Ann's," and the like. To accomplish this was the great end and aim for which I was working. I felt sure of soon having a quartet able to begin with, while the choir as a whole was becoming quite reliable for chorus singing. One of my troubles arose from my best bass singer. His voice was really very good, and he knew it. His great defect may be understood from what a neighbor said of him: "God had given X. a capital voice—pity he had not added some brains!" So long as he sang under the direction of another, his assistance was valuable. But as he felt the benefit of study and rigid practice, and saw his way more sure, he began to give himself airs, and took upon himself at times to strike off into the tenor part, to show how he, if he wished, could "drown every body out." The country chorister must put up with such things; he dare not say much, if he would keep his forces. Just at the time when we were thinking seriously of introducing our new order of singing, X. one Sabbath turned the seats actually into a place for display; nothing was to be heard of any body, so to speak, but him. The people below turned round and stared, and a general sensation was plainly visible. Now giving us bass like "the Bull of Bashan," now striking up into the tenor, utterly destroying all balance, by weakening one part and by adding his roar to the other already too strong, and crowning all by giving us a verse or two in the alto in such a falsetto as sets my teeth on edge to think of. After the second hymn, I must confess, with some heat, moved thereto by the smiles and even tittering of some of the younger people, who sat within reach of my eye, I spoke to him sharply. He rose, took his hat and walked off. I have not seen him at church since. I learned from another member of the choir, that he had been engaged previously to sing in one of the other churches at a small salary, and had come to ours once more only to show his vocal powers as a parting souvenir.

So there was an end of our quartet for the present; he had been so fully depended on that none of the other bass singers had met at the meetings for this particular practice, and he who was to have sung a second bass part, had not the necessary depth of voice. However, my two principal trebles, and the best alto, were making famous progress; especially the young lady mentioned in my last. Her voice developed daily, but that was little in comparison to the development of taste and feeling which her singing exhibited. Both the pastor, who often attended our singing meetings and took part in them, both in psalm tunes and glees, and myself, had taken the greatest pains to persuade each singer to think of the words which were to be sung, and I am much in the practice of getting the hymns beforehand and reading them carefully aloud, to show the proper emphasis and to point out the varying sentiment, and corresponding feeling with which the different stanzas should be sung. Our quartet had really made great progress in this respect, and my fine treble in an especial manner. Had she persevered I have no doubt that she would have finally made herself known, as I see by your Journal so many others are doing now. But as people began to notice her, strangers looking round to see the fine singer, and making afterwards flattering remarks, she grew vain. I urged her to the utmost to keep on her present course, that she was still but a pupil, and could she hear the good singers of the city she would see how far she still was from their point of excellence. This was taken as proceeding from merely interested motives upon my part, and though I offered to bring her to last year's Convention, if she would only stay with us, the offer of a small salary and a little dexterous flattery took her away from us long before the year was out. I am told that her singing has become coarse and harsh, as must naturally follow, when one, before she is fully able to go alone, has almost the entire treble to carry in a rather large church against some dozen or thereabouts of rough, unpolished voices, male and female.

This was a severe blow to me. I had depended so much upon her, had begun to cherish such strong hopes, I had taken such a world of pains, altogether the affair caused me a deep and bitter disappointment. I can truly say that my sorrow on her own account was not the smallest item with me.

And now I had again to begin the training of another to take her place; but where was the material?

My next best treble married, and from that moment sat below. My best alto moved out of town, and I found my bass, without X's powerful voice and "brass," feeble. The consequence was that Zeuner's beautiful music, and most of the fine arrangements from great authors,—so often mentioned in the Journal,—which we had learned, had to go by the board, and we were reduced to the easy tunes and simple harmonies of the singing school. For the finer excellencies of singing we had no longer the leading voices, which I now found by experience had penetrated and governed all. The change was so great as fairly to astonish me, and the idea of going over all the labor again, which with such good materials had produced so much of good fruit as there was, was appalling.

But it did not end here. Our singing meetings lost their interest now that the quartet singing had disappeared, and we were forced to fall back upon the poorer music. I found that the taste and power of appreciation of my choir had far outstripped in their improvement their powers of execution; and the singing of poor music had no longer its old charm, while they felt their inability to undertake anything better. We could not always sing "St. Ann's," and "London" and "York," and "St. Martin's," nor could we forever repeat the brainless tunes, whose only excellence is a light tripping rhythm. So scarcely a year had passed before one after another dropped off, and but a scanty number was left as a nucleus around which to collect the best pupils from a new singing school.

We had our singing school. A new set of light, easy tunes was learned, a new set of younger singers brought up into the gallery, and all my last year's labor was to be performed again, but no longer with such materials. I have become rather an old story, and I should not wonder if I should soon have an opportunity to write you an account of the downfall of "a Country Chorister."

I have brought you down to last Spring in my recital, and there leave the subject for the present.

One topic I have omitted entirely, and I will not now waste words upon it. A simple reference to it is enough. Every man in my position, however, can tell you that one of his troubles and not the least either, is the petty jealousies and vanities of his volunteer singers. "This is my place," says one, "I have always sat here." "Yes, but you have been away for the four last Sundays, and Mr. G. said I might take the place." So Mr. G. has to offend one or the other. "Mr. G., did you say that Ann should sing in that duet in the 'Portuguese hymn'?" "I really don't remember; you can either of you sing it. I leave you to settle it; or perhaps it will have a good effect if you sing alternate verses." So both are about half satisfied.

Mine is a small kingdom, but "Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown!"

Respectfully Yours,

P. E. G.

A Rosary of Glee.

[Glee-singers generally, and the members of the "Salem Glee Club" in particular—an institution which has been famous hereabouts—will find amusement and revival of some sweet associations in the following extract from a letter from one of their "chief musicians," in reply to an invitation to a reunion of musical friends, at Salem, Mass., Dec. 1851.]

I shall be delighted to join my friends of the 'tuneful choir,' in undisturbed song of pure consent, and 'harmony divine,' and with 'Glorious Apollo' strike again the lyre, and 'loudly sound the golden wire,' for the dear sake of dear pleasant 'Auld lang syne.'—

Ah, 'Friend of my soul,' whither have fled those 'Happy days,' 'the days we never, never more shall see'? How often 'In this lonely vale of streams' do I think of them, 'In tears, with heart oppressed with grief,' and 'with earnest longings of a sorrowing soul,' again do 'I wish to tune my quivering lyre.' 'Ah! well-a-day!' 'Are those white hours forever fled,' 'that led me up the roseate steep of youth,' when 'all by the shady greenwood tree,' while 'the radiant Ruler of the day,' the 'Sun, was up,' and 'When winds breathed soft along the silent deep,' I heard the 'Foresters sound the cheerful horn,' and bade a 'Welcome to the sons of harmony.'—Ah! 'yes, dear Jack,' how often 'When the moon shines bright, in the clear cold night,' 'Sad memory brings the light of other days around me!' How often, 'As the shades of night appear,' 'When wearied wretches sink to rest,' 'When chough and crow to roost are gone,' when 'Sleep, gentle lady,' or 'Retire, retire, my love,' or 'Sleep on, sleep on,' or 'Love wakes and weeps,' is the 'Song of the Serenaders,'—how often, as I stand 'Alone on the sea-beaten rock,' and 'See our oars with feathered spray,'—or when as a 'Weary pilgrim' I 'roam through the forest,' 'By Celia's arbor,' do I 'Softly sigh,' as 'Slowly tolls the curfew's solemn sound,' 'Return, blest days, return ye laughing hours.' 'Ah! how sad the days appear,' when 'Far from home,' and 'Parted from those I loved,' those whom 'A generous friendship' 'Joined in harmony divine,' I bade 'Farewell to Lochaber,' and like the 'Three poor mariners,' or 'A weary pilgrim,' even 'A grey, grey friar,' who 'From a cheerful home doth part,' I journeyed 'O'er heath-covered mountains,' leaving far behind the 'Friends of my soul,' crying after me, 'Oh tarry, gentle traveller!' No 'Echo Song' gave back 'responsive notes,' for 'Gone was my heart,' and 'Desolate was the dwelling of Morna.'

Now since I am 'come unto these yellow sands,' how often 'Breathes my harp' 'the song of other days,' while memory summons up 'All the delights' that neither 'Dull repining care,' nor 'Crabbed age and youth,' nor 'Old King Cole,' nor the 'Queen of the valley,' nor time, 'the mighty conqueror of hearts,' can 'banish from my heart.'

'Why, sure there never met,' 'a truly jovial set,' 'more prone than we to laugh,

And quaff,

'and drink good sherry.' 'How soft were our delights!' 'How sweet, how fresh our vernal days!' 'How musical the air!' 'How merrily we lived,' and sang 'Hail, smiling morn!' bade 'Health to my dear, and long unbroken years,' and with 'The harp that once in Tara's halls' 'Waked the loud echoes' 'O'er the long resounding shore,' we sang 'How pleasant is the fisherman's life!' 'How merrily' while 'At early dawn' 'Blew gentle gales,' and 'with sighs each sweet rose' 'filled all the ambient air' 'with balmy sweetness' we 'Blest the fairy hours,' gave each to each 'A cup of the grape's bright dew,' danced o'er 'the yellow sands,' and drained 'The social glass.'

Yes, 'Memory pours back its hours,' and 'I call to remembrance' 'The bold, bold outlaws' of 'Our musical club,' who at times, 'With phrase sad and soft,' like 'Nightingales that tune their warbling notes,' sang 'Softly sweet, in Lydian measure,' 'There is a voice of grief,' or 'How sleep the brave who sink to rest,' or who 'Murmured soft,' 'Say, brothers, say,' 'Where shall we make her grave?' Or who again, like 'Tigers crouching in the wood,' or like the 'Bold dragoons' of 'Lutzow's wild hunt,' 'When the ruddy sun had set,' and 'When the fair moon, resplendent lamp of night,' gave forth her 'Beam of light,' beat loud 'The Indian Drum,' struck 'The harp's wild notes,' and 'sang with lusty lung,' in 'Laughing glee' and 'Merry catch,' the 'Wood notes wild' of 'Mynheer Van Dunck,' or 'We soldiers think' that 'Amo amas' is 'As good as a glass,' so 'Away with melancholy.' 'For what have we to do, old Care, with such as you?' 'Yes, 'Ha, ha! ha, ha!' 'What do you want, my cocks?' 'Aint 'Life a bumper,' and 'Here's a thumper,' and since 'Little pigs lie on very good straw,' where 'They're all a noddin', nid, nid, noddin', why then say I, 'Begone dull care!' 'Lille-bulero,' and 'Hey down derry, we'll drink and be merry,' and here's a 'sweet kiss' for 'Dame Durdin's three serving maids,' who will turn 'Each fair cheek,' and 'laugh while they cry': 'Sir, you're a comical fellow!' But enough, enough, 'Of such poor stuff.' 'In sadder strain I cry,' 'When shall we all meet again?' and 'In some cool grot or mossy cell,' 'Awake the Æolian lyre,' as the 'Bright morning star' arises 'From the orient wave,' or as in 'Dull declining day' the 'Shades of night appear,' 'Never, no never,' for 'This world is all a fleeting show,' and 'Time is like a river,' 'bearing us on,' and we shall soon hear the pealing notes of 'The last bugle's distant blast.' Then 'Hushed will be every tuneful voice,' 'Cold be Cadwallo's tongue,' 'The Convent bells' will toll sad 'Requiems o'er our bier.' 'All, all in vain,' that 'loving friends and forms so fair,' shall have 'Smoothed our furrowed cheek,' or have cried in 'Accents wild,' 'Come, come away, Death!' In 'that dread hour,' while 'Sadly thinking and spirits sinking,' may no 'Fatal and dark despair' 'Cloud our sad heart,' but like 'Cerberus fair,' may the bright 'Daughter of Faith awake,' arise, illumine, 'The dread unknown, the chaos of the tomb,' and lead our 'willing souls' to that 'Fair vale, where spring eternal reigns.'

'Peace to the souls of the heroes.' H. K. O.

SOUND DOCTRINE.—The notion that those not "scientifically" musical cannot appreciate or enjoy good music, is well refuted in the following article, contributed a few years since to the Athenæum Gazette, Manchester, England, apropos to the lectures of our townsman, Mr. J. Q. WETTERBEE, who lectured upon music in all the principal English towns and cities.

To the Editor:

There is an opinion very generally prevalent, that for a correct appreciation of the purest forms of Art, something like a commensurate education is essentially necessary. This opinion, which I cannot but consider radically erroneous, arises probably from a want of due discrimination between what may be termed the mechanical or physical processes of Art, and the mental or æsthetical manifestations of it. My meaning in reference to the former may be illustrated by a few examples. In music, for instance, the mechanical or physical processes are those which are referable to the laws of sound, in connection with harmony, discord, rhythm, time, etc.; in painting, to forms, colors, perspective, chiaroscuro, etc.; in poetry, to the structure and powers of language, in connection with rhythm, etc. Now, in all these it is abundantly obvious that education is essentially involved. No one is a competent judge of their degrees of excellence without a knowledge of them, and that knowledge the result of study. But it is otherwise with Art in reference to its æsthetic manifestations. Here the primary feelings, common to human nature, are directly appealed to; and, except an education opposed to the free development of these feelings exist, the highest and purest works of Art are the most powerfully operative on all minds, educated and uneducated.

To suppose otherwise, is to suppose that there exists no natural connection between the mind which creates, and the minds which are addressed by works of Art. But it is not so—the sympathy is perfect; and the only condition necessary to the most perfect enjoyment of the beauties of Art is that we keep our minds open and free to its operation. The existence of national melodies, the most beautiful of melodies,—and popular ballads, the most perfect of ballads,—may be appealed to in support of these views. I therefore repudiate the notion that we must begin with low forms of Art, and gradually ascend to its higher regions. I have heard an advocate for this doctrine remark, that if you begin by giving the people good music, they will never afterwards be satisfied with what is poor and indifferent. Precisely so; and for that reason I would give it them. If you give only the bad, how can they have ideas of any other?

I have been led into these remarks by reflecting on the course of lectures now delivering by Mr. Wetherbee, at both the Royal Institution, and Athenæum, Manchester. The lectures themselves are, of course, not strikingly original, though abounding in good sense, and a pretty accurate knowledge of the historical details; but the illustrations are of the very highest class; they are drawn from the works of the greatest composers, and are sung in a style worthy of the composers, chaste, pure and expressive. Their effect on the large audiences to which they have been addressed—as evidenced by marked and earnest attention, and repeated applause—fully corroborates what I have said. There are no clap-trap embellishments, no trumpery roulades, cadences and trills, but pure and expressive melody, such as will live long in the minds and hearts of those who have heard it.

I trust that the Directors, in reference to the music of the Athenæum, will preserve this high character, so exactly in accordance with the character of the Institution. I am, Sir, Yours, META.

Diary Abroad.—No. 24.

BERLIN, SEPT. 30.—One day last Spring the talk at the Library turned upon overtures, and RELLSTAB related (in substance) the following: Soon after MENDELSSOHN'S return from that visit to England, during which he made the Scottish tour, and the composition of his Hebrides (Fingal's Cave) overture, in which he so beautifully gives utterance to the emotions which the sublime solitudes of those desolate islands and the surrounding waters awakened in his poetic nature, he and Rellstab met. Mendelssohn naturally asked the critic his opinion of the new work. Rellstab spoke favorably of it as a tone-picture, but asked him why he did not employ his powers in the production of works of the higher class of character-portrayal (Schilderung.) Such for instance as BEETHOVEN'S overtures to "Coriolanus" and "Egmont?" "Ah," said Mendelssohn, "that I cannot do!"

Nor could he. His was not a great creative genius. He knew his own strength and weakness, and his simple confession to Rellstab is a key to his own artistic character. "I like the Athalia best of all his overtures, for in this he has to the greatest extent ignored his own feelings and emotions and painted a character foreign to his own."

I do not pretend to remember Rellstab's words, but this was the idea.

To appreciate fully the distinguishing characteristics of Mendelssohn's music, it is necessary to keep in view the character of his mind. Though with but small creative genius himself, few men have lived who possessed talents so great for making all that had been done by others his own. He was not a greater "wonder child" as pupil of ZELTER and BERGER, than as the pupil of his other teachers. No man has lived, whom nature endowed with a higher power of poetic appreciation. His mind was a soil of extraordinary richness, cultivated to the very highest extent. Though he finally devoted himself to music, he was the embodiment of the idea, which we in English convey by the term scholar. The highest efforts of BULWER'S fancy are those in which he exerts himself to paint characters of the stamp of Mendelssohn.

This order of mind is seldom if ever endowed in a high degree with what we call creative talent. I think of but one exception,—JOHN MILTON. Be it that the creative mind is too much occupied with its own creations to dwell upon those of other minds, or that the two orders of intellect are too diverse to often harmonize in one, I think the fact is unquestionable. It is rather the office of the receptive mind, through the high culture and extreme refinement of which it is susceptible, to act as commentator,—translator,—apostle,—of the creative. COUSIN and JOUFFROY interpret KANT and HEGEL; DANA and HUDSON fascinate audiences, who never read SHAKESPEARE; BRYANT holds communion with Nature and echoes her still voice to many a soul which otherwise would never hear it.

I read but little poetry, the gods not having made me poetical. I cannot read it. There are but three poets in all literature, whose works, complete, I have read (unless I count my school-boy task of VIRGIL;) SHAKESPEARE, MILTON, and—LONGFELLOW. Do I class the latter with the two great creative poets? By no means. But as Mendelssohn fascinates me above all other composers, so Longfellow fascinates me above all other poets. Mendelssohn is to me the Longfellow of musicians; Longfellow the Mendelssohn among poets. From the rich treasury of his learning, exquisite taste and refinement. Longfellow enriches me with the wealth of German, French, Spanish and other literatures. Not in servile translations alone, but in poems of his own, transfused with and breathing their spirit. He makes me a partaker in the delights of his scholarly pursuits. He goes into the forest, among rivers and mountains, and there interprets to me in clear and distinct terms the thoughts and feelings, which in my less poetic nature were little more than faint hints at and shadows of ideas and emotions. My "airy nothings" have now "local habitations and names." What if he do not create, and but gives utterance to thoughts and feelings awakened by the creations of others, (if you will have it so;) is it a small thing to be allowed to enter into the sacred places of a mind of such culture, to share in its emotions, to love, admire, pity, sorrow, enjoy with it? To go with it into the past, and the foreign, at home, to look with its eyes upon the spreading chesnut tree, to hear with its ears the noise of the distant city, to fancy with its imagination the presence of the loved and lost? I have found no German who will read "Hyperion;" its Germanism,—to coin a word,—which is its charm for us, ruins it for them; yet they read German works upon America with enthusiasm, which we cannot wade through. What Longfellow accomplishes in verse and poetic prose, Mendelssohn performs in music.

For instance; while still very young and fresh from the study of all that makes Italy the land of pilgrimage, he journeyed thither. His soul drank in her beauty, but sorrowed, almost as one without hope, over her fall and decay. His Italian symphony is but the musical expression of the feelings of the scholar, as he wanders amid the ruins of the world's sometime mistress, and mourns her present degradation.

The "Hebrides" overture is another outpouring of the very soul. We need not the story of its composition to show us this.

"Well, Felix," said his sister, "describe the voyage to us."

"Such does not let itself be described—I will play to you." And he sat down and improvised his recollections upon the pianoforte, and thus arose that lovely composition.

Of all my own journeyings, my visits to the great American lakes have left the deepest and grandest impressions. The wild, sublime solitudes of the waters and shores of Lake Superior have stirred up my fancy and fastened themselves upon my memory beyond all else. Nor am I alone in these feelings. Two years ago I crossed over to the shore north of Isle Royale; upon a steamboat, and marked how the feelings which those forest-covered heights, rich in the most luxurious vegetation and carved by Nature's hand into the most exquisite forms, which those lofty islands rising abruptly, giant-like far into mid air from the gloriously clear, sparkling waters, which those little nooks and bays, worthy to be the chosen abodes of the loveliest water spirits ever born of human imagination,—which the mighty spirits of calmness and silence and peace aroused within my breast, feelings too deep and strong for utterance, gradually painted themselves in the expressive face of a young English nobleman on board, awakening him from his taciturnity, and calling out expressions of the highest admiration, even of astonishment at the world of beauty before us. Yet he was familiar with all that Europe has to offer of the sublime and beautiful. And thus writes a lady of high culture, lofty poetic nature, and with recollections of Switzerland and the ocean in her memory, of a single view upon that lake: "Shut your eyes," writes she, "and see with me that magnificent view from Copper Falls; that point of land with its soft meadows and dark forests running out adventurously into that magic lake, all mirage and fog along the great sweep of the horizon, full of fantastic changes, coldly glittering like Damascus steel, whose waves we see breaking into foam upon the dark, distant rocks, and upon whose surface lies couched Isle Royale, like a gigantic watch-dog. I suppose you have walked about through the woods as I did, listening to the mysterious confidences between the winds and the tree-tops, and wondering what the glistening brooks were laughing about." Yes, yes, that have I! And I have walked hours upon the pebbly beaches and sought in vain for evidence of another living thing on earth than myself, save when that most solitary of all sounds, the wail of the loon, came sweeping across the lake's motionless bosom.

The thoughts and feelings of those hours come rushing like a flood upon my memory, whenever the first still, half-melancholy notes of Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" overture strike my ear. Those hours cannot be described, they can only be depicted in music, and Mendelssohn has done it.

HANDEL, like MILTON, treated of the sublimest subjects; like him, mastered them and satisfies us fully. MOZART, like SHAKESPEARE, dealt with humanity; and his creations, like those of the great poet, are each perfect in themselves and will endure until literature and music are swallowed up in the oblivion of all things. BEETHOVEN gives utterance to the yearnings of the mortal and finite, for that which is immortal and without end. ROSSINI says: "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die!" His music is the voice of our sensual nature, but glorified, refined to most exalted epicureanism. But Mendelssohn, the artist, the scholar, familiar with all that elevates and dignifies, lifted far above and beyond the merely sensual and sensuous, dwelling in a region of crystalline purity, sings—himself! No glow of passion warms his music; its singular fascination lies in something else. The charm is of another kind. May it not be called an intellectual charm?

It impresses me as all that I know of Greek Art and literature impresses me; as the product of the highest intellectual perfection, the very embodiment of refined taste.

The other evening the Antigone was given with Mendelssohn's music. I cannot describe the singular impression that ancient play made upon me; so simple in its structure, yet moving on to its catastrophe with such a measured tread; so grand, so broad in its outline, and withal so cold! Fate brooding over its actors, untouched by sympathy with their woe, unmoved by their horror and despair. Just so simple, just so broadly conceived and executed, just so coldly beautiful and unsympathizing seemed the music of that chorus of aged men. No other composer that has lived could so have entered into and caught that spirit. No other has had Mendelssohn's learning and mental cultivation. In "Elijah" how evident throughout is the effect of his national feelings, in his adaptation of his music to the poetry of the Old Testament. His God the Lord is the Jehovah of the Jews; his angels, spirits above human infirmity, the ministering spirits of the Holy One; his Prophet, the prophet of THE LORD! And yet—and to me therein consists much of the extraordinary charm of that oratorio—it is the product of the Mendelssohn whom I have tried above to describe. His exquisite taste in the use of his ideas is more striking than the ideas themselves. These do not always strike one as new. Look at the very effective allegro con fuoco of half a dozen bars, where "God the Lord passed by," and compare it with the short allegro con brio in the first movement of Beethoven's Sonata Pathétique for instance; and yet how exquisitely chosen for the piece.

It is in his chamber music, trios, duets, solos and the like, that Mendelssohn's lack of creative power is most felt. A thought which will make an exquisite song, may be utterly inadequate when made the basis of a long poem; a musical idea which may be truly beautiful in a song without words, for the piano forte, may become painfully tedious when dwelt upon in the Andante of a Trio. I was recently struck with this in a duet for piano and violoncello by our author, when the slight subject of the Adagio,—very pretty, tender and delicate,—was repeated over and over again, as if for no other purpose than to fill a certain amount of space upon the printed pages. Still it was always Mendelssohnian, though tedious. It is the hearing this class of his compositions within the past year, in greater number and variety than ever before, that has enabled me to understand why he is rated so much lower in the scale by the musical world here than in England or in our own country. When the composer is deprived of orchestral and choral masses he is forced to depend entirely upon the strength of his musical idea. A weak thought may be so embellished by the resources of a full orchestra, that its intrinsic poverty shall escape notice with the multitudes. It is with music as with painting; the mass will crowd a hall to see a diorama by JOHN MARTIN, crowded with figures in all sorts of melo-dramatic action, while only the appreciative few sit down to gaze by the hour upon a Madonna by RAPHAEL, or MURILLO. Yet the single figure or the small group is the test of greatness. Mozart spent more time upon the six quartets which he dedicated to HAYDN than upon his six great operas! and each of Beethoven's last quartets seems to have cost him as much time and labor as either of his last great works, save the second Mass. Chamber music, then, is the touchstone of the composer's creative power. When judged by this test, though few can love and enjoy his works more than I do, I must confess, however, unwillingly, that Mendelssohn did not reach the highest rank.

I have been led into this train of thought by hearing last evening, the work, which is here called his highest effort of genius; the work in which he went the most out of himself, and, having grasped the ideas of another, made them his own, and reproduced them in music; and this work is his overture to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream." Various as are the opinions I have expressed in regard to his oratorios, symphonies, and his other more important works, all with one accord recognize in this not merely a wonderful production for a boy, but the work of a great composer.

Produced almost simultaneously with WEBER's overture to Oberon; both upon fairy subjects; the one the work of an inexperienced boy, the other that of a world-wide known composer; that of the boy towers mountain high above the other. It is possible that Weber may have heard the work of his young rival; but Mendelssohn could never at that time have heard the "Oberon." Yet the idea of "faery" is to a certain and noticeable extent conveyed by both alike.

It is seldom that I have enjoyed a performance more than the beautiful drama of Shakespeare last evening, both for its own sake and for the music. When I first heard it, some four years since, I was astonished to find the music during the play little more than an adaptation of the overture; but hearing it again, I see that it could not be otherwise; for as the overture is the history of the entire drama written in music, no other musical language could be found, certainly by the same composer, for the various situations. How beautiful, how nicely adapted the vocal parts! how superbly comic the funeral music over the dead Pyramus! how delicious the closing strains, as the fairies disperse through the palace of Theseus!

Shall I confess the truth about the famous Wedding March? Few pieces of music, so famous and so generally popular, are so positively disagreeable and offensive to my ear as this! With the exception of two passages of half a dozen bars each, which it is true are repeated several times (in the composer's usual manner) the whole composition affects me in the concert room, or when drummed upon a piano forte, as a piece of mere noise beyond anything MEYERBEER ever wrote. But just this makes it one of the most effective things, and most satisfactory to me, which Mendelssohn ever wrote, when heard in its proper place—upon the stage. It is another evidence of the fine instinct which he had in adapting his music, another proof of his refinement of taste.

We have been listening to the music of elves and fairies—music, every note of which breathed the spirit of SHAKESPEARE, and of TIECK. But now the scene changes. We are carried away back beyond the days of Grecian civilization to the rude and savage times of Theseus and the Amazons. The rough demigod will marry the bronzed Amazon, whom he has conquered in battle.

"Hippolyta, I woo'd thee with my sword,
And won thy love doing thee injuries;
But I will wed thee in another key,
With pomp, with triumph and with revelling."

They hunt, and their talk is of hounds, and the sweetest music they know is the voice of their dogs. The bride remembers how she "was with Hercules, and Cadmus once,

When in a wood of Crete they bayed the bear
With hounds of Sparta."

Fairies no longer, but rude men are before us, and come marching into the great saloon of the palace, with barbaric pomp and splendor, and, as it should be, to the clashing of cymbals, the beating of drum,—to a music barbaric as the court of Theseus. I felt this march, last night, to be one of the composer's triumphs; but deliver me from it out of the play house!

Query.—What modification in the views here expressed may further experience, reflection and familiarity with Mendelssohn's works effect?

Musical Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, NOV. 4.—In accordance with my last week's promise, I hasten to send you an account of "The Creation," as performed on Monday and Friday of last week, by the Harmonia Sacred Music Society. I have already given you some idea of this exclusive association, consisting of two distinct bodies of members, performing and administrative, the former doing the vocal business, and the latter forming the society itself; for be it known to you the performing members have not the least power of interference with the Directors, not even the right to vote. Oddly enough, the number of administrative members, (that is my own name for them,) is precisely sufficient to fill all the offices of the association, and it is a very difficult matter to procure an election into that august body. Rather a close corporation, is it not? However, there is a great deal of talent and enterprise among the Directors; the Treasurer is a real Rhode Island man, careful, pains-taking, and the actual heart of the Society, with the cause of music always in view. The President is one of our oldest, most respected and popular organists, a good musician, and an estimable person. The Secretary we are not acquainted with except by name. The musical profession is ably represented by several organists and composers, among them two young men, whom I have seen noticed in the Journal as having had the honor of playing at the opening of the Tremont Temple organ, last August a year,—I mean Messrs. M. H. CROSS and FRANK DARLEY; the first of these is the organist of the Society; the last the composer of some very clever music that has been brought out by the Harmonia. But I am talking of the Direction instead of "The Creation"; pray pardon me.

The first concert of the season was given on Monday evening at Concert Hall, a very fine room in Chestnut street, somewhat larger than the Musical Fund Hall, though not quite so good in its acoustic construction. Having understood that there would be a crowd, I profited by the hint, went early, and sat for three quarters of an hour, before the commencement, cramped up on a narrow bench, between two very stout gentlemen, the thermometer about 90, and the throng actually frightful. Every cranny and chink was occupied; the avenues choked with extra benches and stools; the private boxes filled; the orchestra, at the north end, overflowing with expectant auditors; and every standing place filled. Even the choir gallery and organ-loft, at the southern extremity of the hall, were invaded by the holders of standee tickets, and I heard that the very staircase outside was used as seats for those unable to penetrate farther.

I had brushed up my critical perceptions, and was prepared to speak out my exact opinions as to the merits, or I should more correctly say, the demerits, of the performance, but my first glance at the choir completely disarmed me, for there I saw—what?—a pretty screen of delicate pink and white lace, extending nearly across the front, thus announcing, in unmistakable terms, that the concert must be considered as an amateur effort, and commanding a certain allowance for the attempts of the singers thus concealed.

I was vexed at first, and with my prejudices in favor of your Boston method, of the chorists facing the public without the slightest description of shelter, I thought the screen an affectation, especially as nothing of the kind had been used by the Musical Union the preceding week. By degrees my objections vanished, and, by the time the performance commenced I really liked the appearance of the thin drapery; it makes a distinction between audience and performers not otherwise obtainable; it gives an air of exclusiveness and gentility, peculiar to the Harmonia's institutions; it also excites curiosity as to the identity of the vocalists, and makes the lady singers look like a troop of misty fairies, although some of those I saw come down at the close of the concert were very substantial and not in the least fairy-like; it is romantic, though it may be unnecessary; it is an apology for defects, and, after all, lends a certain air of charm and mystery that is by no means objectionable in these matter-of-fact days. Another feature, new to me, was a printed libretto of the oratorio, provided with copious notes explanatory of the music, and really quite an interesting, amusing and instructive pamphlet.

The Oratorio was produced with a good deal of care, with a very effective orchestra of an unknown number of musicians, as they were also behind the screen, and I could only see the scrolls of two or three double basses; but without doubt the performers were professional, and of good standing, as they played in first rate style throughout. Mr. Cross presided at the organ, and one of the papers states that he performed the entire oratorio a semitone higher than printed, in order to equalize the pitch of orchestra and organ, the instrument having been stupidly built that much below concert tone. Certainly such wholesale transposition is no slight task, and to have achieved it so successfully is not a little creditable. * * * The exact concord between organ and orchestra was admirable, and occasionally it was a difficult matter to say whether the former was used, so perfectly did the tones blend. The chorus was evidently not so large as that of the Musical Union, but it was well balanced, and very accurate. The difference of tone between this choir and that of the Union could not fail to be remarked, but is easily explained by the fact that the Harmonia is formed of singers in Protestant churches, and the other chiefly of Roman Catholics, a distinction that also applies to the audiences, and management. The fugues were given with great spirit, and effect, particularly "The Heavens are telling," although the final portion was taken more rapidly than I like, or than is usual.

The lady vocalists, who performed Gabriel and Eve, were evidently accomplished musicians; and the full tone and clearness of the upper C in "The Marvellous Works" betrayed the identity of the singer, there being but one amateur in our city able to sustain that note with such power and truth. The same voice gave "With verdure clad" most tastefully; it was a pleasure to hear the music rendered with such fidelity. "On mighty pens," was sung by the lady who assumed the part of Eve, and in its performance she evinced the possession of a beautiful organ, not as yet fully cultivated, but susceptible of receiving the highest finish.

The music of Uriel was divided among several tenor voices, among them being easily discernible that of Mr. T. BISHOP, formerly of the Seguin troupe, but for two seasons the primo tenore of the Harmonia, and one of its most admired members. A German gentleman sang "Now vanish before the holy beams," but it was rather too low for his register; his pronunciation I forgot in the tasteful way he sang. Adam appeared to have a cold, but was otherwise good. Were it not for the screen I should criticize the performance of Raphael's music, particularly the recitatives; the solos were passable; it was also divided between two basses. The concerted pieces were the least commendable portions of the oratorio, and can only be passed over on the score of that lace curtain; how I wish it had not been up, that my tongue could be loosened. Mr. LEOPOLD MEIGNEN conducted the oratorio, and certainly as an amateur performance it was decidedly creditable, fully equal to some professional trials I have heard; most undeniably it gave satisfaction, as it was repeated on Friday for the public, and was greeted by another full room, in spite of the rain, and PARODI's concert at the Musical Fund Hall.

I wish I had space to tell you about Parodi's Marcellaise, and the excitement her agents are creating by advertisements and free tickets. She sings for the Philharmonic Society's first Concert this evening. I shall go and report. The Musical Union gives Mozart's Twelfth Mass on Tuesday week at Concert Hall. Miss PRYNE is expected to concertize soon, and on the whole we are more musical than ever.

BOSTON, NOV. 10, 1855.

Concert of Miss Adelaide Phillipps.

The skies frowned a second time upon the feast prepared for us by our young Boston cantatrice, and told more sensibly in a diminished audience, than the first time, when, in spite of weather, all went forth so eagerly to welcome her. This time there was a smaller, yet goodly number of listeners, who felt well rewarded for having braved the storm. The programme was made up of about the same kind of elements, in the same proportions, as before, with the addition, for the better, of an air by GLUCK.

BEETHOVEN's ballet overture, "Men of Prometheus," (which, though composed for a ballet, has more meat in it than the overtures to twenty "grand" operas,) was played with more effect than one would have anticipated by a mere skeleton of an orchestra of twenty, under Mr. ZERBAHN. Had the quantity (of strings especially) been equal to the quality, there would have been nothing to complain of. Mr. HARRISON MILLARD followed with an English ballad, to wit: BALFE's "Then you'll remember me," and sang it very sweetly; indeed we soon forgot the hand-organ and almost forgave the writer.

And now for the queen of the evening. Dio clemente, an aria from Marino Faliero, is one of the more interesting specimens of DONIZETTI melody, when you seek beneath the uppermost and hack-nied pieces in the pile. The worst of it is, the style of Donizetti altogether has grown hack-nied; and singers, we fear, choose it not so much to lend their voices for the illustration of good music, as for that they find it a convenient music to illustrate their voices. This is generally the public's fault, and not the artist's, who is so dependent on that public. People will go to the theatre to see BOOTH or MACREADY, and not Hamlet; RACHEL, and not RACINE, (in which case they are wise;) to the opera for GRISI, rather than for MOZART or ROSSINI; and why not to the concert for the voice, and not for what that voice interprets,—for the person representing, and not for the music, or the author represented? So people will do, and it will be the last and highest triumph of good taste, when we shall all do otherwise. Then, and not before then, we may perhaps have earned the right to call ourselves a really musical people. But we did not intend this digression. The piece was beautifully, artistically sung. We are more and more charmed with the quality of Miss Phillipps's voice. Some think it not so powerful as it was once; we think it is only that crude sound has been refined into tone; it is ten times more musical, more smooth and even, more expressive, than in her Museum days. GARCIA and Italy have not been lost on her. Her tones are powerful enough for any hall, and if the ear, the sense does not own their full power, the mind, the inner sense, the feeling does. Her execution, in ornate passages, is superior, but not faultless. There was always a certain thickness in her articulation, which she has not quite got rid of,—an affair of organization, it is likely,—and which causes a little indistinctness in her rapid running passages. Her sostenuto and her trill are good; her phrasing large and style in general satisfactory. We should think her forte, however, lay in the larger, simpler, nobler forms of melody, in oratorio and the like, (and what music so well worthy of the greatest artist?) rather than in florid operatic music. Of the simple ballad style too, she is mistress; witness the two little pieces, which she sang to her own accompaniment in the second part: "The Village Bells," by FEED, and that pretty version of "Home," which so charmed everybody at her first concert, and with which she this time answered the encore. Mr. Millard followed with VERDI's gay, gallant La Donna è mobile, which he tossed off with considerable grace.

A piece by GLUCK, the great master of dramatic music, was, strange to say, a novelty in Boston concerts. That a piece so famous as the Cavatina from "Orpheus:" Che farò senza Euridice; a melody so exquisite and so purely expressive, as the delight of that whole fresh audience bore witness, should now invite our hearing for the first time was indeed strange. Those who heard it, were, we trust, convinced that there is noble and effective melody outside of modern Italian opera, even in the oldest works which it is fashionable to let alone as "classical." Miss Phillipps gave the introductory recitative in a chaste, distinct, artistic manner, and the large, full-flowing periods of the melody seemed just suited to her voice. She sang it finely, only we would have preferred to hear it in its naked simplicity, without certain modern adornments, elaborate cadenzas, and here and there hurried tempos, which we suppose we are to credit to her teacher. As it was, it proved the great "hit" of the evening, and encouraged the hope that those famous operas of Gluck, so full of the music of character and nature, without any nonsense, or passages for mere display of singers—so simple, too, in their construction, and so easy in comparison with modern operas, may some day be introduced to an American audience. This very Orfeo, for instance: what could be more practicable or more charming? It has but three solo characters, Orpheus, Euridice and Amor, all of which are usually sopranos, although the music of Orpheus in the French editions is set for a high tenor. In Germany it is sung by contraltos or mezzo sopranos, like JOHANNA WAGNER. For the rest a series of simple, but most impressive choruses, of mourning friends, of shades and furies in Tartarus, of spirits in Elysium, &c., with instrumentation wonderfully expressive for the simple means employed, a few ballets, &c., are all that is required. Yes, one thing more,—a real mastery of recitative; for Gluck, like Handel, studied the significance of words and thoughts in every tone. We might have it in Italian or English. If the manager of our Boston Theatre is contemplating the production of English opera, with the aid of Miss Phillipps and other native artists, why not do a good thing for Art, as well as what must, if well done, also prove a popular and pleasing thing, by getting up the Ritter Gluck's lyrical representation of the beautiful old tale of Orpheus and Euridice? Turn back to our Journal of Dec. 23, 1854, and read our Berlin correspondent's description of it as performed by Johanna Wagner and others.

The First Part closed with the spirited duet from Tancredi, in which, as well as in the yet more brilliant and ornate Non più mesta (from "Cinderella") in the second part Miss Phillipps confirmed our first impression of her as an excellent singer of the ROSSINI music. She was well seconded by Mr. Millard.

Part Second consisted of FLOTOW's overture to Martha, of which the first bars promise somewhat, but which soon runs into the most shallow, hum-drum prettiness; the English ballads before-named; a romanza, La Domanda, composed and sung by Mr. Millard,—a melody which well hits the average style of current Italian melody, and of course well suited to his own voice; Non più mesta; the "Anvil chorus," which it is enough to have heard once, and by not stopping to renew the ringing whereof in our mind's ear, we also lost the duet from La Favorita. Upon the whole it was a very pleasant concert of its kind, but made us all the more desire to hear the fine voice and dramatic talent of ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS in concerts (that is to say in music) of a higher kind, as well as in opera.

Foreign Musical Intelligence.

LEIPZIG.—A correspondent of the London Musical World gives the following account of the first Gewandhaus Concert:

I have endeavored to trace back the history and origin of the Gewandhaus Concerts from their very commencement, but have not been able to gather more than a few particulars. Their origin is ascribed to Sebastian Bach, at that time Cantor, or music director at the St. Thomas Church here. The first took place, not in the present spacious building, but in the house of a private gentleman, and was considered a private undertaking, with the limited number of sixteen subscribers, each to pay twenty thalers for ten concerts to defray all needful expenses; on the 11th of March, 1743, the number of applicants to become subscribers, however, increased to such a degree, that the room was found to become too small; it was enlarged in consequence, and about eighty years ago the concerts were removed to the present Gewandhaus Hall, where, through the influence of Mendelssohn and other eminent musicians, they have since attained a name among the best series of musical entertainments in Europe. Perhaps it might not be uninteresting to mention the names of the conductors of these concerts since Mendelssohn's time. They are in the following order:—Ferdinand Hiller, Gade, Riets, David, Gade, and, at present, Riets again conducts. This year's series commenced on Saturday, 30th September, to an unusually crowded audience. On entering the hall, we were surprised and delighted on seeing the comfortable change which had taken place in its appearance. The seats have been fresh covered over and almost all ticketed as reserved. Another chandelier has been added in the middle of the hall, and the whole has undergone a new painting, while conspicuously over Mendelssohn's likeness may be seen the appropriate motto, "Res secura est verum gaudium." The programme was as follows: Part I.—Overture to Genovefa, R. Schumann; Recitative and aria from Haydn's Creation, sung by Mme. von Holdorp, "And God said;" Concerto, by Mendelssohn, performed by Herr Henri Wieniawski; Recitative and Duetto, from Mozart's Entführung, sung by Mme. von Holdorp and Professor Götz; Fantasia for the violin by Paganini, performed by Herr Wieniawski. Part II.—Symphonia Pastorale, by Beethoven.

At the Opera Meyerbeer's L'Étoile du Nord was given Oct. 4th: the principal parts by Mlle. Bartel, Mme. Richter and Herren Behr, Marloff, Schneider and Brassin. It was rather coldly received. The operas given in September were Die Zauberflöte, Lucresia Borgia (twice), Montecchi e Capuleti (twice), Auber's Maçon (twice), and Don Juan, with Fräulein Grosser as Donna Anna.

PARIS.—The Théâtre Italien has opened with the Moïse of ROSSINI. The Grand Opera repeats also the same work. The managers of the rival houses have each pressed the great composer to assist at the production of the opera, but he refuses. "I beg you," he said, in reply to further solicitations, "not to compel me to leave my 'attitude.' I wish to be like Austria." The only musical performances in which Rossini has shown an interest in Paris, have been those of the Cologne Männer-Gesang-Verein, to whom he wrote a note of warmest acknowledgment, thus showing that his tastes have not swerved from the new direction which they took in "William Tell." Moïse failed at the Italiens, but Cenerentola, with Mme. BOROHI-MAMO in the place of ALBONI, was a great success.—CARRION, the Spanish tenor, does not sustain his Vienna reputation. SALVI, as manager, seems to have already got into trouble, VERDI having withdrawn from the theatre the liberty to perform his works. Paris is but too glad to fall back on Rossini.—The Duke of Saxe-Coburg's new opera, Santa Chiara, is not a little praised; but for a fuller account we hope to find room next week.

Musical Chat-Chat.

Miss LOUISA PYNE and company, it is rumored, are soon to give one or more concerts in Boston.... The first of the cheap people's concerts, given by the Artizan's Recreative Union, took place in the Music Hall on Wednesday evening. We have to gather all our information from the other papers. It appears that the songs of Miss PHILLIPS and Mr. ARTHURSON were greatly admired, especially the ballads and comic songs; so too the pieces by the Germania Serenade Band. The audience was large, but the tone thereof somewhat noisy, the mistake having been committed of inviting the firemen in a body to occupy the galleries. Of course they brought with them firemen's habits, which are well enough in the street, but scarcely suited to a concert; cat-calls and cock-crowings, &c., being not particularly inspiring either as accompaniments or interludes to good music. The consequence can only be that the music must come down to the Bowery boy standard, and so the end of this in itself excellent movement, the elevation and refinement of the people, be utterly ly defeated. This need not be. Rightly managed, the experiment of refined amusement for the people must succeed; witness Mr. Barnard's concert in the same place a few weeks since. Let the firemen go and mingle socially and naturally, as quiet citizens, and not as firemen, and it will work much better.

The Classical Matinées of WILLIAM MASON and CARL BERGMANN in New York are definitively announced to commence on the 27th. They have the aid of Messrs. THEO. THOMAS, (first violin,) J. MOSENTHAL, (second violin,) and G. MATKA, (viola.) The later quartets of Beethoven, (so rarely heard—never in this country,) the works of Schumann, Schubert, Frank, Volckmann, Brahms, Rubinstein, and Berwald, will form the leading features of the programmes. The model followed is the celebrated matinées of LISZT at Weimar. Here will be something to gratify the newest curiosity of those who would keep the run of musical composers, and we heartily wish the plan success in such full measure as to overflow some day into our smaller city.

A Dublin paper states positively that SIMMS REEVES, with a soprano, baritone and basso, is on the point of sailing for this country, to give whether English operas or concerts it is not said, under the management of Dr. JOY.... We are disappointed in our New York correspondence and get no account of the Prophète at the Academy. From the tone of the newspaper notices the success, as regards the numbers and enthusiasm of the audience, has been moderate. All agree that it is put splendidly upon the stage, that the choruses are well drilled and the orchestra effective for its size. Mme. LAGRANGE, Miss HENSLE, and Sig. MORELLI are highly complimented, and the critic of the Courier says the new tenor, SALVIANI, has one of the sweetest and purest of not very robust tenor voices and is a very graceful singer.... OLE BULL is giving concerts in Canada.... The committee on piano-fortes at the American Institute awarded the highest prize to a German manufacturer in New York by the name of STEINWAY, of whom, the Review says, it never heard, as he does not advertise.... Mme. LAGRANGE has received an offer to sing in opera at Rio Janeiro forty-eight times, at the rate of one thousand dollars for a single performance, and expenses all paid.... REMINY, the Hungarian patriot, and a thorough Wagnerite, has received the appointment of violin solo to the Queen's band, London.

The Hartford Times (Oct. 16) has the following notice of two of our promising young native musicians:

Mr. LOUIS T. DOWNES, who has been for several years the admirable and efficient organist of Christ Church, in this city, and under whose direction the fine choir of that church has attained such a wide-spread reputation—has gone to Providence to act as organist in the church in which Bishop Clark officiates. Mr. Downes's eminent talent as an organist, and his well known efficiency in drilling a choir, will be appreciated in Providence.

Mr. HENRY WILSON, who was formerly an organist at Greenfield, and more recently at Springfield, succeeds Mr. D. as organist at Christ Church, and played for the first time last Sunday. Mr. Wilson has been studying music in Germany, for the past eighteen months, and by the way, is said to be the writer of those excellent letters which appeared, from time to time, in the Springfield Republican, over the signature of W. With one or two exceptions we have never heard an organist whose style of playing was so perfectly satisfactory in all respects. He plays most admirably, and moreover, what is most extremely rare in this country, though almost universal abroad, he accompanies instead of leading the choir, and his accompaniments are expressive.

NEW COURSE OF HARMONY, BY L. H. SOUTHARD.

The Publishers call the attention of the musical profession to this work, as one eminently calculated to lighten the labors of the teacher, and rapidly advance the pupil. It is emphatically a PRACTICAL work, serving both as a Manual of instruction on the one hand, and a Text-book on the other; and it is believed that the peculiar arrangement of the work, together with the very large number of exercises and examples, presents great advantages, to both scholar and teacher, over any similar work of the kind. Teachers highly commend the work. Mr. WILLIAM MASON says it is a work unsurpassed in the language. Mr. GEORGE J. WISE says that it is a work perspicuous in diction, methodical in arrangement, and sufficiently copious to embrace all the essentials of the general doctrine of accord. It can be ordered through any respectable Music-seller, and will be sent through the mail on the receipt of the price, ($1.75,) postage prepaid.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

CHURCH ORGANS. COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

WM. B. D. SIMMONS, Organ Builder,
(Heretofore doing business in the style of Wm. B. D. SIMMONS & Co.) and

GEORGE FISHER,

Of Cambridge, have this day formed a Copartnership for continuing the manufacture of Church Organs.

We design to keep in our Warehouses New Instruments for sale at prices from $400 to $1,500 each, and are prepared to build by contract at the shortest notice, Organs, worth from $600 to $12,000. And by prompt and faithful execution of orders hope to merit a like encouragement to that heretofore extended to Wm. B. D. SIMMONS, and which has indicated the necessity of this business connection, that his entire attention may be devoted to the more difficult and artistic parts of the business, so that an increase thereof may cause no diminution of the personal attention which is requisite for the maintenance of the CHARACTER of our instruments, upon which we rely for success.

While it will be our aim and ambition to furnish ORGANS of A PERFECTION OF TONE AND MECHANISM, AND OF AN ELEGANCE OF EXTERIOR UNRIVALLED, we are confident of ability to offer terms MORE FAVORABLE THAN CAN BE OBTAINED ELSEWHERE, for the following reasons: Having ample means, we can purchase in large quantities at first cost, for cash; can always command the most talented assistants, and also do sufficient business to practise division of labor, which, by assigning parts to workmen skilled in their particular branch, necessarily insures better work at less expense. Our Manufactory, by its proximity to Charles river, enables us to receive lumber direct from the vessel at first cost, and having been erected expressly for the business, is in arrangement, size, convenience and its facilities unequalled, being furnished with steam engine, steam-heated drying-house, planing, grooving, matching, moulding, tenoning, boring, and other machines, together with lath scroll, circular and other saws, &c., all operated by steam power.

These facilities are such as are possessed by no other manufacturer of Organs in this country, and of themselves would enable us to furnish instruments, with a fair profit, at a price which those of like quality must cost builders who have work done by hand that can be better executed at half the cost by steam machinery.

Second hand Organs at all times for sale.
Orders for tuning church organs promptly attended to, and contracts taken for tuning by the year.
Orders respectfully solicited.

FIRST PREMIUM MELODEONS, The Very Best now Manufactured.

S. D. & H. W. SMITH respectfully call the attention of the public to their IMPROVED MELODEONS, constantly on exhibition at their Warerooms,

No. 417 Washington Street.

By means of a new method of voicing, known only to themselves, they have succeeded in removing the harsh and buzzing sound which formerly characterised the instrument, rendering the tones full, clear and organ-like. The action is prompt and reliable, enabling the performer to execute the most rapid music without obscuring the tones. The swell is arranged to give great expression.

The manufacturers received the First Premium, over all competitors, at the Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association; also at the Metropolitan Mechanics' Fair, held at Washington, D. C.

For the Parlor, instruments are furnished at prices varying from $45 to $150.

Larger instruments, with two banks of keys, for chapels and small churches, from $150 to $300.

This last instrument, known as the ORGAN HARMONIUM, has been essentially improved by Messrs. Smith, and they have secured a patent therefor.

Persons who wish to hire Melodeons with a view of purchasing at the end of the year, can have the rents credited as part payment of the purchase money.

Life of John Sebastian Bach;

WITH A CRITICAL VIEW OF HIS COMPOSITIONS, BY J. N. FOKKEL.

CHAPTER IV.

What we have said of J. S. Bach's admirable performance on the clavichord, may be applied, in general, to his playing on the organ. The clavichord and the organ are nearly related; but the style and mode of managing both instruments are as different as their respective destination. What sounds well, or expresses something on the clavichord, expresses nothing on the organ, and vice versa. The best player on the clavichord, if he is not duly acquainted with the difference in the destination and object of the two instruments, and does not know constantly how to keep it in view, will always be a bad performer on the organ, as indeed is usually the case. Hitherto I have met with only two exceptions. The one is John Sebastian himself, and the second his eldest son, William Friedemann. Both were elegant performers on the clavichord; but when they came to the organ, no trace of the harpsichord-player was to be perceived. Melody, harmony, motion, &c., all was different, that is, all was adapted to the nature of the instrument and its destination. When I heard William Friedemann on the harpsichord, all was delicate, elegant, and agreeable. When I heard him on the organ I was seized with reverential awe. There, all was pretty; here, all was grand and solemn. The same was the case with John Sebastian, but both in a much higher degree of perfection. William Friedemann was here too but a child to his father, and most frankly concurred in this opinion. Even the organ compositions of this extraordinary man are full of the expressions of devotion, solemnity, and dignity; but his unpremeditated voluntaries on the organ, where nothing was lost in writing down, are said to have been still more devout, solemn, dignified, and sublime. What is it that is most essential in this art? I will say what I know; much, however, cannot be said, but must be felt.

When we compare Bach's compositions for the harpsichord with those for the organ, we perceive that the melody and harmony in both are of an entirely different kind. Hence we may infer that, to play properly on the organ, the chief point is, the nature of the ideas which the organist employs. This is determined by the nature of the instrument; by the place in which it stands, and lastly, by the object proposed. The full tone of the organ is, in its nature, not adapted to rapid passages; it requires time to die away in the large and free space of a church. If it is not allowed this time, the tones become confounded, and the performance indistinct and unintelligible. The passages suited to the organ, and to the place, must therefore be solemnly slow; an exception from this rule may be made, at the most, in the use of single registers, as in a trio, &c. The destination of the organ to support church singing, and to prepare and maintain devout feelings by preludes and voluntaries, requires, further, that the composition and connection of the tones be effected in a different manner from what is practised out of the church. The common, the trite, can never become solemn, can never excite a sublime feeling; it must, therefore, in every respect, be banished from the organ. And who was ever more strict, in this point, than Bach? Even in his secular compositions he disdained everything common; but, in his compositions for the organ, he kept himself far more distant from it; so that here he does not appear like a man, but as a true disembodied spirit who soars above everything mortal.

The means which he employed to attain such a sacred style lay in his management of the old church modes, as they are called, in his divided harmony, in the use of the obligato pedal, and in his manner of using the stops. That the church modes, on account of their difference from our twelve major and twelve minor modes, are peculiarly adapted to strange, uncommon modulations, such as are fit for the church, may be seen by any one who will examine the simple four-part psalm tunes (Choral Gesänge) of John Sebastian. But what an effect divided harmony produces upon the organ will not be easily imagined by those who have never heard an organ played upon in this manner. By this means, a chorus, as it were, of four or five vocal parts in their whole natural compass is transferred to the organ. He produced with the pedal not only the lower notes, or those for which common organists use the little finger of the left hand, but he played a real bass melody with his feet, which was often of such a nature, that many a performer would hardly have been able to produce it with his five fingers.

To all this was added the peculiar manner in which he combined the different stops of the organ with each other, or his mode of using them. It was so uncommon, that many organ-builders and organists were frightened when they saw him use them. They believed that such a combination of stops could never sound well; but were much surprised when they afterwards perceived that the organ sounded the best so, and had now something peculiar and uncommon, which never could be produced by their mode.

This peculiar manner of using the stops was a consequence of his minute knowledge of the construction of the organ and of all the single stops. He had early accustomed himself to give to each of them a melody suited to its qualities, and this led him to new combinations of them, which, otherwise, would never have occurred to him. In general, nothing escaped his penetration which had any kind of relation to his art, and could be improved for the discovery of new advantages. His attention to the effect of great musical compositions, in places of a different nature—his very practised ear, by which he could discover the smallest error in music of the fullest and richest harmony—his art of perfectly tuning an instrument in so easy a manner may serve as proofs of the penetration and comprehension of this great man. When he was at Berlin in 1747 he was shown the new Opera-house. Whatever in the construction of it was good or faulty, as it respected the effect of music, and what others had only discovered by experience, he perceived at the first sight. He was taken into the great saloon adjoining: he went up to the gallery that runs round it, looked at the ceiling, and said, without first examining any further, that the architect had here introduced a piece of ingenuity, perhaps without intending it, and without anybody's knowing it. If a person at one corner of the saloon, which was in the form of an oblong parallelogram, whispered a few words against the wall, another, who stood with his face turned to the wall, at the corner diagonally opposite, could hear them distinctly, but nobody else in the whole room, either in the centre or in any other part. This effect arose from the direction of the arches in the ceiling, the particular nature of which he discovered at the first look. Such observations could, and naturally did, lead him to attempt to produce by the unusual combination of different stops of the organ, effects unknown before and after him.

The union and application of the above-mentioned methods to the usual forms of organ-pieces, produced John Sebastian Bach's great and solemnly sublime execution on the organ, peculiarly adapted to the church, which filled the hearer with holy awe and admiration. His profound knowledge of harmony—his endeavor to give all the thoughts an uncommon turn, and to let them have the smallest resemblance with the musical ideas usual out of the church—his entire command over his instrument, both with hand and foot, which corresponded with the richest, and most copious, and uninterrupted flow of fancy—his infallible and rapid judgment, by which he knew how to choose, among the overflow of ideas which constantly poured in upon him, those only which were adapted to the present object—in a word, his great genius, which comprehended everything, and united everything requisite to the perfection of one of the most inexhaustible arts, brought the art of the organ to a degree of perfection which it never attained before his time, and will hardly ever attain again. Quanz was of my opinion on this point—"The admirable John Sebastian Bach (says he) has at length, in modern times, brought the art of the organ to its greatest perfection: it is only to be wished that, after his death, it may not decline, or be wholly lost, on account of the small number of those who still bestow any pains upon it."

When John Sebastian Bach seated himself at the organ when there was no divine service, which he was often requested to do by strangers, he used to choose some subject and to execute it in all the various forms of organ composition, so that the subject constantly remained the ground-work of his performance, even if he had played, without intermission, for two hours or more. First he used this theme for a prelude and fugue, with all the stops. Then he showed his art of using the stops, for a trio, a quartet, &c., always upon the same subject. Afterwards followed psalm tunes (choral), the melody of which was intermingled in the most diversified manner with the original subject in three or four parts. Finally, the conclusion was made by a fugue with all the stops, in which either another treatment only of the first subject predominated, or one, or according to its nature, two others were mixed with it. This is the art which old Reinken, at Hamburg, considered as being already lost in his time, but which, as he afterwards found, not only lived in John Sebastian Bach, but had attained, through him, the highest degree of perfection.

The office which John Sebastian filled, and partly also the great reputation which he enjoyed, caused him to be often requested to examine young candidates for places as organists, and also to give his opinion of new organs. He proceeded, in both cases, with so much conscientiousness and impartiality, that he seldom added to the number of his friends by it. The late Danish music-director, Scheibe, once in his younger years submitted to his examination on the election of an organist, but found his decision so unjust, that he afterwards, in his "Critical Musician," sought to revenge himself by a violent attack on his former judge. In his examinations of organs he was not more fortunate. He could as little prevail upon himself to praise a bad instrument as a bad organist. He was, therefore, very severe, but always just, in his trials of organs. As he was perfectly acquainted with the construction of the instrument, he could not be in any case deceived. The first thing he did was to draw out all the stops, and to play with the full organ. He used to say in jest, that he must first of all know whether the instrument had good lungs. He then proceeded to examine the single parts. His justice to the organ-builders went so far that, when he found the work really good, and the sum agreed upon too small, so that the builder would evidently have been a loser by his work, he endeavored to induce those who had contracted for it to make a suitable addition, which he, in fact, frequently obtained.

After the examination was over, especially when the instrument had his approbation, he generally, to amuse himself and those present, showed his skill in performing as above described; and, thereby, always proved anew, that he was really "the prince of all players on the harpsichord and organ," as the late organist, Sorge, of Lobenstein, once called him in a dedication.

Letters from a Country Singing Teacher.

No. V.

M——, Nov. 12, 1855.

JOHN S. DWIGHT, Esq.,

Dear Sir:—I am afraid that I have taken up too much space already in your valuable and interesting paper, in recording the trials and troubles incident to the insignificant position which I occupy. But I have felt as if it was necessary for some one to speak plainly upon the subject. I am very decidedly opposed to the present fashion of leaving the singing to be done in the churches by a quartet as is now so much the case. The great end of church music in my opinion cannot be so obtained, and equally unsatisfactory have been the results, so far as I have learned, of attempts to abolish choirs and trust the congregation to supply the want. Yet the ill success that has attended my efforts shows that something must be done for the cause of our Protestant church music. I will not go into the details of what has taken place in our singing seats since last Spring. Toil and labor and discouragement have been my share, and yet every Sabbath has left me more dissatisfied than the last. We are all weary of the tunes we sing and so is the congregation. A quartet of good singers added to our numbers would put new life into all, and something might again be done. If I could be but sure that those whom I have had with me during the Summer could be persuaded to take hold in earnest, come with a single eye to doing their duty, and be willing to go on for two or three years, I should be encouraged. Some of them might do well, make really very good singers, and in that space of time acquire both a reasonable amount of skill and taste.

For the last two weeks a great revival of religion has been in progress in our society, and the other evening I attended one of the meetings in our vestry. The excitement is strong, the feeling deep, and nothing else is thought of but religious exercises.

Accordingly, when our pastor gave out the hymn:

"Come, Holy Spirit, heavenly dove," and led off to the tune of 'Cambridge,' the feelings of the crowded assembly found vent in joining in the well known melody, and it went splendidly. Among the young people particularly interested were the sweet singers of the Fair, of whom I wrote, and with their sweet and powerful voices penetrating every corner of the room, it was surprising to see with what new talents my feeble singers could join in. I am afraid my feelings at the contrast between this evening's singing and ours upon the Sabbath did not much partake of the nature of Christian humility and love. 'Squire Jones's daughter had no scruples now to sing with the poor sewing girl, not she! why should she have at other times? It is not to be supposed that the two young women educated so differently, possessing such entirely different modes of thought, moving in such different circles of society, and being surrounded by different influences, could enjoy each other's society, as friends and companions. But are they not equal in the sight of Him whom both profess to serve? Is it not the duty of the favored one to share her gifts with the other? However, I cannot very well argue the moral point. I do feel as though all who have had superior advantages of any kind are bound to do what good they can, and as several young ladies in our society have had every opportunity to cultivate their musical talents, upon the principles which they profess to have made the guidance of their lives, they are bound to exert those talents in divine worship. I can state the point, if not argue it, and it seems to me the statement is sufficient to carry conviction. I had a talk the other day with our minister, and told him plainly that when certain young ladies in the society could humble themselves so far as to sit, not only at his communion, but in the singers' gallery with Miss A., Miss B., and the others, I would begin to believe that some of the feeling they exhibited was more than a temporary excitement. Mr. — looked grave.

"Now I know," said I, "that you look upon music in the church precisely as I do myself, as a part of the worship of the Most High, and that for us to stand up there Sunday after Sunday and make a noise called singing, which in a shilling concert would draw a shower of rotten apples, is turning off the Deity with pretty poor sacrifices."

"Don't speak so lightly, almost profanely," said he. "But isn't it just so?" I asked. "You rise in the pulpit and say: 'Let us sing to the praise and glory of God—'"

"No," interrupted he with a sad smile. "If you will bethink yourself, it is some time since I said anything about the praise and glory of God in connection with our singing, or indeed with any in any church where I exchange, now-a-days. All I say is, 'Let us sing so and so,' but whether I am not wrong in using the word sing, (with another smile) you can judge as well as I."

"That's a fact," returned I, "but you know I have done my best, and last year we were going on swimmingly. Too bad that we were so broken up."

"That has cost me many a sad hour," said Mr. —, "and I sometimes think that the leaving of the — girls was a proper punishment for a feeling of pride which was growing up in my heart. To confess the truth, I liked to exchange last year just that other clergymen might hear my choir and say afterwards, Brother —, you have beautiful singing in your church; there is nothing else like it in our entire conference. But what were you going to say when I broke in upon you?"

"Oh, I was only about to say that when the minister rises and says let us sing to the praise and glory of God and we get up and sing some galloping tune, hitching along, with full organ behind us to make us do even that, that people must think that such praise and glory are no great shakes."

"Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings, you know," replied he good naturedly.

"When the 'St. Cecilians,' as they called themselves, came here last winter and gave their concert at twelve-and-a-half cents admission, some of our society were there and helped hiss them for singing so shabbily. Their singing was not good enough for them at that price; but they seem to think ours good enough for God!" "Hush, hush! don't speak so irreverently. You are right though. It is wicked to call that worship, which I am condemned to hear, wherever I go, but feeble as it is in our church, I assure you it is no better any where else where I exchange, except at Mr. B——'s church in N., where they hire a quartet; but that does not seem to have the feeling in it. Sometimes you do very well; if you could only sing that beautiful devotional music, which we had last year! That used to do my heart good. I could preach after that. Whatever effect it might have had upon my hearers, I can truly say, that I rose in my pulpit a different man. Before you came, when all was at sixes and sevens, and I could not tell whether anybody but Smith with his two-penny trumpet voice, would pretend to sing, I used to rise and give out the first hymn with a heavy heart, fearing the torture my ears might be exposed to. Do you remember singing, the Sunday after Miss S. was buried, 'Time is winging us away,' by Zeuner? It made me weep like a child, and I think the marked solemnity, which pervaded the church all that day was owing to that hymn. I know not when I was in so heavenly a frame of mind."

"I remember that occasion very well," I said, "and the pains I took the evening before to impress upon my singers the full beauty of the words. I remember Miss — was so affected, I was afraid she would not get through her duet the next morning, but after the first few notes her voice grew strong and her very emotion added a charm to her voice, such as I had never heard before. I hear that her singing is growing very coarse and screechy, and that the — folks are getting tired of her."

"Her leaving was a great loss to herself as well as to us," said the minister. "I am afraid we cannot make her place good."

"How happens it, sir," returned I, determined to put an idea into his mind, which had long haunted me, "that those young women who sang so beautifully at the Fair last year, and who make such a show of their voices at the evening meetings, that they who so loudly profess themselves ready to give up all and follow Christ, cannot be induced to praise him a little in the church. You know my faith differs in some points from yours, but if I am capable of arguing from your point of view I should say, that if it is "a cross to be taken up," this sitting in the singers' seats; they have only to feel it a duty to sit there, to be forced by their consciences to join us or not join at the communion table. Whether it be their duty I don't undertake to decide."

The pastor looked at me very hard for a few moments, and then simply said: "That is something to be thought of!"

He is a man that fears nobody. He will do what he thinks right, let come what will come, and knowing his intense love for good music, I made up my mind as he left with his face full of a certain look, which his people know well, that we shall hear from him when the signs come round right.

Respectfully Yours,

P. E. G.

THE AUTHOR OF "SANTA CHIARA."—We find the following in the Paris correspondence of the New Orleans Picayune, dated Sept. 27.

To-morrow, or Saturday night, the opera Santa Chiara, by the Duke de Saxe Cobourg will be given, and as I shall probably have to analyze it in my next letter, I must find room to-day for a sketch of the ducal author, Ernest IV. Augustus Charles John Leopold Alexander Edward, Duke of Saxe Cobourg Gotha, who in the special line of the Dukes of Cobourg is styled Ernest II., is the eldest son of the Duke Ernest III. (1st) and of the Duchess Louisa, daughter of the Duke Augustus of Saxe Cobourg and Ellenbourg, who died in 1831. This prince, like Prince Albert, his brother, who married the Queen of England, received a solid education, and after having well disciplined his mind by these studies turned his attention to Art. Both of the brothers are good painters, but Prince Albert has especially devoted his attention to the arts of drawing, and at the Exhibition several model farm houses planned by him were erected in Hyde Park; while the Duke Ernest turned his mind to music. In 1836 both brothers visited England and France, and resided at Brussels for a year at the court of their uncle, King Leopold. Thence Duke Ernest went to Bonn and studied law and philosophy, until he took the degrees of that celebrated university. He then entered the army as captain in the Saxon light horse.

Having made himself master of an extensive and serious curriculum of studies, and of the theory of the military profession, he abandoned himself almost entirely to the art of music, to which he has always been passionately attached. Dresden, which possesses one of the best theatres of Germany, was a good place to study, and he commenced his musical education with M. Reissiger, the accomplished chapel-master, who soon initiated him into the secrets of the art. After completing these studies, the Duke made another excursion abroad, visiting Spain, Portugal, Italy and Africa, determined to see everything before he settled definitively at home. He quitted the active service of Saxony, where he was Major General, and lived with his father. He married, in 1842, the Princess Alexandrina Louisa Amelia Frederica, daughter of the then reigning Grand Duke of Baden, who was in her twentieth year. His father dying in 1844, the Duke Ernest ascended the throne.

Having visited and studied Europe, and being a warm partisan of progress, his first efforts were directed towards ending the long conflict which existed between his father's Government and the States of the Duchy of Cobourg. He soon succeeded in introducing salutary reforms, which made the political institutions of his duchy conform to the liberal ideas which pervaded all the world, except Germany, which was chilled by the influence of Russia and Austria. In 1846, he spontaneously presented at the opening of the Diet of his States a common constitution for the two duchies, which abolished the old feudal customs and abuses. He had the satisfaction of seeing the storms of 1848-49 pass over his calm and happy States. The Arch Duke John of Austria having made him Lieutenant General of the Empire, gave him the chief command of a division of the army in the war against Denmark, and he distinguished himself at the battle of Erchernforde. After this battle the plans for the re-establishment of a German Empire having signally failed, he adhered to the "Three King's Alliance," and recommended a congress of sovereigns at Berlin.

There he sustained ideas too generous to succeed, and overmastered by reaction he returned home and practised what he had had in vain inculcated elsewhere. In the midst of deserved domestic calm he again resumed his musical studies, and in the course of time he composed four operas: "Zaire," whose "book" is arranged after Voltaire's play by M. Tenelli (the anagram of Millened's name, who is the private secretary of the Duke,) which was represented in 1846 at Berlin, with considerable success; "Tony," whose book is by M. Eishor, has been represented at Dresden, Prague, Hanover, &c., with a popular success; "Casilda," whose book is by M. Tenelli, has been played in all the German theatres, and at Brussels and London. The book of the new opera ("Santa Chiara") is by Mme. Birch Pfeiffer, and is put into French by M. G. Oppel.

Halevy's Eulogy on Onslow.

The Paris correspondent of the Atlas, "Spiridion," sends a rich budget of musical matters in his letter of Oct. 11th. Among other things the following, which will interest our Chamber Concert goers. How will they like, though, to be told that a string Quartet never should be played in the presence of more than ten persons!

We have had the annual meeting of the Academy of Fine Arts, which was presided over by M. Thomas, the composer. The audience was unusually large and brilliant, and was composed of painters, sculptors, literary men, engravers, composers, architects. A symphony opened the meeting, and when it was over, M. Gilbert, the architect, read a criticism on the works sent home by the pupils of the Government School at Rome, which was deservedly severe. The prizes won at the Fine Art School, here, were then distributed; and afterwards M. Halevy, the composer, read an éloge on the late George Onslow. "There is, in the United States, in North Carolina, a county which bears the name of Onslow. The amateur of music, reading that name, dear to him, inscribed on those once distant shores, will rejoice to find the reputation of the author of the 'Quintets' already so profoundly established on the other side of the Atlantic. But this homage, this pious souvenir is not addressed to the artist. It dates from another age. There several generations of this family lived and died, and public gratitude sought to preserve the memory of old services and old affections." He gave some curious details about the establishment of the family of Onslows in France, and the marriage of the composer's father with a Mlle. Bourdeille de Brantome; he exhibited how difficultly and how slowly Onslow comprehended and felt music in his youth, though he afterwards attained eminent rank as a composer. A man of fortune and an amateur, Onslow was born about the period when the clavecin was being metamorphosed into the piano; and M. Halevy told us how young Onslow became fascinated by the piano, and how, absorbed by the material resources of the art, he long remained completely insensible to the pure and elevated sentiments of music. Mozart's finest productions left him cold and indifferent. He reproached himself for his indifference, and suffered cruelly by it, until he heard Stratonice, an opera by Mehul. This opera raised emotions in his breast it had never known, and initiated him into the mysteries of the art. Then he took Reicha as his master of harmony, and became a skilful composer of "chamber music." M. Halevy explained what this term means. He told the audience how, in a trio or quatuor written for stringed instruments, the great composers establish and maintain a sort of musical dialogue, where the theme, the subject, is at first presented simply, and then soon varied in its form and robed in the thousand shades furnished by harmony. These delightful reciprocations between three, four, and even so many as seven instruments (for there are some admirable septuors by Mozart,) delight those who really love music, as they are carried away and charmed when a poet or an orator, master of his subject, full of ideas, and with a felicitous diction, seems to prove himself right a thousand times as he presents his thought under striking and varied forms. M. Halevy said besides that this music has another, a singular charm; it is not composed for the multitude, and should be executed in a small room, a chamber, before a select and small audience; care should especially be taken to allow none of the profane, no musical gluttons, nor ill-timed flatterers to enter the sacred chamber; the audience should never exceed eight, or at most, ten in number, and even they should be introduced as it were into a sanctuary—then, and then only, that sympathetic satisfaction is established between the performers and the listeners which produces a masterpiece which leaves an impression time never effaces. I have with difficulty resisted the temptation of quoting the passage at length to you; I cannot refuse to lay before you his eulogy of the piano, which every cold wit lays hold of as an object for his dullness—the patient, good natured piano, which cheers so many winter's nights at so many hearths.

"The piano, on which all the sounds of the musical scale, arranged beforehand, await nought but the pressure of a practised hand to vibrate in sheaves of harmonious accords, or to sparkle in rapid gamuts, would be first of instruments, if the organ was not in existence. But the organ haunts lofty regions; it conceals itself in the dim religious light of the temple. To force it to utterance, we must penetrate its severe envelope, conceal ourselves there from every eye, breathe the air which gives it life. The piano, on the contrary, the guest of home, covered with holiday attire, opens to all its willing envelope, and as it is ready for the most frivolous pastimes, as well as the most serious studies, as it contains in its breast all the treasures of harmony, it is of all instruments, that which has most contributed to diffuse musical taste and to facilitate the study of music. Made popular by great artists, it is found in every house, it forces under its varied forms, every door. If it is at times a disagreeable neighbor, at least, it offers easy vengeance and always ready reprisals. It is the confidant, the friend of the composer, a rare and discreet friend, which never speaks except when spoken to, and knows how to keep silent at the right moment."

Diary Abroad.—No. 25.

BERLIN, SEPT. 28.—Dwight's Journal of Sept. 8th, just came to hand. "An unpublished opera of C. M. von WEBER, called Silvana, was recently performed for the first time in Dresden." "An Oratorio by HANDEL entitled 'The Passion,' hitherto unknown, as well as an opera called Silla."

Another mare's nest found in London. Pop! here goes one of the eggs.

"I composed," says Weber, "the opera, Das Waldmädchen, written by RITTER von STEINBERG, which was given there (Munich) in November, 1800, and which spread farther than I could wish (it was given fourteen times in Vienna, in Prague it was translated into Bohemian, and performed in St. Petersburg with much applause), since it was in the highest degree an unripe work, a weak production, with here and there perhaps some signs of a creative talent, and the second act of which I wrote in ten days." On the 18th of December following the performance of this work Weber completed his fourteenth year.

"Silvana, opera in three acts, in pianoforte arrangement. Schlesinger [publisher]. Completed Feb. 23d, 1800, in Stuttgart."

Weber's own catalogue of his works.

"Here (Stuttgart), being encouraged and excited by the friendly sympathy of the noble Danzi, I wrote an opera, Silvana, upon the subject of my early Waldmädchen, rewritten by Heimer";—also Weber's words.

Silvana was given under the composer's direction, for the first time, so far as I know, on the 10th July, 1813, at Berlin, and repeated several times within the next ten days with ever increasing success. In the Leipzig Musik Zeitung for August 26th, 1812, four and a half quarto pages are devoted to the work, and the notice of its publication by Schlesinger is contained in the next volume of that work.

Whether the opera Silla, by Handel, is a mare's egg I cannot say—but here is a stone to smash the other.

The only oratorio written to German words by Handel was entitled Der für die Sünde der Welt gemarterte und sterbende Jesus. When Haydn was in London he was greatly interested in the collection of Handel's original scores, and the Queen made him a present of this, the original, of which Härtel, (firm of Breitkopf & Härtel) afterwards obtained a copy. In 1832 that firm gave notice in the Musik Zeitung that this work was never printed, but any one could have the privilege of copying it who wished. Perhaps this was not the "Passion" to which reference was made in the Journal. Well then, Handel wrote a cantata which was called "The Passion," on occasion of the death of some member of the royal family. This was published by Breitkopf & Härtel about half a century ago.

Fétis says, speaking of "The Passion," "the manuscript, not in the hand of Handel, is to be found in the collection of the Queen of England."

I should really like to know from what English paper the above paragraphs were taken. I should say the London Musical World—there is no mistaking the cockney character.

Speaking of Weber reminds me of a paragraph in the London Athenæum (Jan. 6, 1855), which stated that the doubt as to the composer's birthday had been removed, and it was now proved to be Dec. 18, 1786. An excellent thing to have doubts removed—but who had doubted?

I opened Gassner's Lexicon (1819) at Art. Weber, born at Eutin, Dec. 18, 1786; turned to the same article in Schilling's Lexicon (1838),—born Dec. 18, 1786; opened Marx's Berliner Zeitung (1826), no month given, but the year 1786; then looked into a sketch of his life, published at Gotha, 1829, still Dec. 18, 1786; and finally looked at his own account and read: "I was born at Eutin in Holstein, Dec. 18, 1786—"

NEW YORK, NOV. 13.—The Prophète has never had anything very attractive for me. Whenever I saw it in Europe it always had the same effect, a severe headache. A week ago last Monday it was produced at the Academy; but I was much too busy then to think at all about music. But now the rush is over and I can again frequent our beautiful opera house. Here the Prophète has been produced with several, what seem to me, great improvements. First of all I will mention that it has been immensely cut and thus brought down to a decent size. Secondly, the sun in the third act, (which in Paris cost 10,000 francs, while the music cost 5), is banished, to the great benefit of weak eyes.

The two new scenes, the one with the frozen lake, the snow-covered trees, and Munster in the distance, and the interior of the grand cathedral, are really superb, and show what a true artist we have in ALLEGRI. But I would suggest to the stage manager that an Italian city scene, where the balconies, the atmosphere and every thing else reminds the spectator of the "sunny South," will hardly do for a Munster market-place, with its surroundings of lofty peaked houses and quaint gabel ends. And how came Fides to be imprisoned, in the last act, in the same dungeon in which we were accustomed to see VESTVALI and BRIGNOLI in the Trovatore? But, on the whole, the putting on the stage pleased me much; the procession was fine; the choir of boys execrable, the skate-dances good and choruses excellent. LAORANGE makes a capital Fides; HENSLEY a charming Bertha, and Sig. SALVIANI, (the new tenor), a passable Jean of Leyden. His voice is pleasant, but weak, and his manner may please me more when I have heard him oftener. To-morrow is the last night of the Prophète, and on Friday Lagrange takes her benefit in I Puritani, in which the new basso, CASPIANI appears; on which occasion also RACHEL will play in "Racine's Italie," as the card has it.

Manager ULLMAN is out in a card, in which he threatens all kinds of awful things against MARETZER's book, which is severe upon him. He is also going to prosecute those that sell it. The Musical Review finds fault with me because I gave the on dit that Vestvali was not going to Mexico. It of course should have been "going to stay" in Mexico. But when a person writes at one or two o'clock in the morning, in a crowded newspaper office, he can't always avoid a slip of the pen. However, I believe I never repeated the same anecdote three several times within a few months, and each time with the same misprint. Can the Review perhaps tell us about that?

Another improvement at the Philharmonic rehearsals. The last took place in Niblo's theatre, (instead of Concert room) last Saturday. And yet it was hardly an improvement. For the stage was not built out far enough, so that the music did not sound well. And besides, in the theatre you can see the audience (which is difficult in the concert room); and there were a plenty of pretty faces to be seen.

A new English opera company is announced to be here before long. It is to consist of Mr. and Mrs. SIMS REEVES, Miss JENNY BAUER, Mr. MANVERS, Mr. WEISS and others. Further particulars are not yet known.

At the Academy, next Monday, we are to have Semiramide, with the new contralto, Mlle. NANTIER DIDIER, from London, as Arsace. It is auspicious for a début, as our New York favorite, Vestvali, first presented herself in this country in that rôle.

The Huguenots is also promised before long.

EISEL's Quartette Soirée comes on Saturday, and that of MASON and BERGMANN on the 27th. The Musical Fund Concerts, I am sorry to say, seem to have been abandoned.

PHILADELPHIA, NOV. 10.—You have heard PARODI in Boston, and know how well she sings; you have seen her fine face, have heard her rich tones. In Philadelphia she has given several concerts since September, and all with success, owing to her "liberal and enterprising agent," who has distributed tickets, like the blind goddess, lavishly and without regard to persons. Well filled rooms have been the result, for the fact is acknowledged that the holders of free tickets do not mind the rain, or any such trifle. She gave half a dozen concerts on her first visit; then went to Boston; returned to give a "farewell" night, found that it paid very well, so said "good bye" again two evenings after, and took her leave, finally, at the Philharmonic concert on Monday. The Philharmonic is one of the old societies, almost coeval with that ancient fog, the Musical Fund. It has an orchestra, principally amateur, but on Monday the professors outnumbered the tyros, and Dr. CUNNINGTON presided as conductor. Parodi sang, as she always sings, with animation and expression, giving as much pleasure to her hearers as if they had not paid to come in. The Marseillaise caused something like an enthusiasm, though I can find no beauty in this hymn, unless sung by a strong male voice. Madame STRAKOSCH seems to have a taste for singing Scotch and English ballads; it does not remind one of the times when she was "pretty PATTI," and all the young men went to see her play Maffeo Orsini. "Alas, those days come not again!"

At some of Parodi's concerts a little boy has played some solos, on the violoncello, with skill and considerable promise of future proficiency. His name is CHARLES SCHMITZ; it deserves record, though as yet his playing is boy-like.

The "third" concert of the Musical Union is to be given on Tuesday next at Concert Hall, the repetition of "Joseph" having counted as the second in the promised series of twelve. The Twelfth Mass of MOZART is to be done, and this time I believe it will be a concert worth hearing, for every member of the Union must be familiar with this inspired work. ROHR is conductor, vice CROUCH, resigned. Miss G—t, the lady amateur who sang for the Harmonia, is to sing for the Union, and is to introduce ROSSINI's anthem: La Charité, as an offertory. She is PERELLI's best pupil, and a teacher herself, at present, nearly equal to her instructor.

My first letter seems to have irritated some of the Union, for in to-day's Argus it is reprinted, with an answer signed by Mr. Crouch. I am sorry that truth is unpleasant. In one point I am willing to acknowledge an error. The celebration of Mozart's birthday is not taken in hand by the German societies, but by the "trio of musicians" with musical names; pray correct my mistake.

Next week you may look for the Twelfth Mass.

One of the first-fruits of the Limited Liability Bill has been the project of a "National Opera Company," to be started on a capital of 10,000l. in 10l. shares. From the prospectus which is before us, we take a paragraph or two of direct interest:

"The promoters of this undertaking, viewing the state of the lyrical drama in England as compared with that of even the smallest of Continental principalities, propose to establish a permanent English Opera for the performance of works of British composers and such foreign operas as may seem most appropriate for the English stage. * * A provisional agreement has been entered into with the proprietor of the Lyceum Theatre for a lease of that establishment. * * The operatic department will comprise the best vocal and instrumental talent. It is proposed that the season consist of forty weeks, and that there be six representations per week."

—The establishment is to be conducted by a Committee of Management, consisting of Mr. A. Mellon (Conductor), Mr. Henry G. Blagrove (Leader), Mr. G. A. Macfarren, Mr. J. Palgrave Simpson and Mr. A. B. Vyse.—Athenæum.

GRAND OPERA.—The London Athenæum seems to express the opinion of intelligent and free-thinking people about the Duke of Saxe-Coburg's new opera, as follows:

"Sainte-Claire" would hardly have been produced had the score not been penned by the brother of the Consort of her Majesty; and its production, therefore, must be recorded as a mistake, however delicate the courtesy which dictated it. The story is one of those violent Russian stories, which, for awhile, bid fair to supersede the crime and romance of Venice as set forth in drama and opera. It was written by Madame Birch-Pfeiffer, and has been "imitated and adapted" for the French stage by M. Oppelt. How the Czarevitch Alexis (M. Merly) maltreats his wife, Charlotte of Wolfenbuttel (Madame Lafon),—how the Lady is beloved by Victor de St. Audron, an officer in the service of Russia (M. Roger),—how the Czarevitch wishes to poison her, but is circumvented by Aurelius, a benevolent physician (M. Marié), who saves the Lady, and contrives her escape to the kingdom of Naples, where she lived (so tradition says) under the name of Clara, and was canonized as a saint;—all these things are told and shown in a forcible-feeble style,—of which the force is German and the feebleness French. The second act, however, which is devoted to the lying-in-state of the Princess, contains one of those situations and occasions for dismal effect which imitative musicians will continue to seek for many a day to come. A new eight-bar melody is as hard for them to find as tee Koh-i-noor;—but who cannot make witch-music, or fairy-music, or (with trombones à discrétion, and an organ behind the scenes) funeral music?

The book, then, of 'Sainte-Claire' is not a good one. The music is little better than the book:—no advance on the music of 'Casilda,' from the same source, which was given in the Haymarket under Mr. Lumley's management. No trouble has been spared:—the scenery is superb—the dresses are magnificent—a ballet has been introduced to lengthen, strengthen, and brighten the third act—the Press has done its duty (as Press-duty is understood "under the Empire,")—the claque is peculiarly uproarious and enthusiastic; but all is in vain—'Sainte-Claire' is a failure, and a failure on which it would not have been worth while to bestow a line, but for the place and circumstance of its occurrence.—A word on pleasanter matters:—the new prima donna, Mlle. Lafon, is not undeserving of favor; she has a handsome presence, a soprano voice sufficient for the Grand Opéra, and the voice is fairly produced and has been fairly exercised.—M. Merly, too, impressed us agreeably both by his acting and singing. The next opera to be given, we believe, will be M. Biletta's,—after that, perhaps, 'L'Africaine.'

We take the following summary of musical matters in Paris from the correspondence of the Atlas:

The famous Cologne singers, the Manner-Gesang-Verein, have quitted us. I am afraid they have reaped more fame than fortune. They sang once at the Grand Opera. Rossini applauded them in a most flattering letter. Nevertheless they did not "take" in Paris; the select and instructed "few" applauded them, but the "many" (whose mite is fortune) kept away.

M. Offenbach, some time leader of the orchestra of the French Comedy, has resigned that post, and is now the manager of a little theatre, which in the summer, will be placed in the Champs Elysées, and in the winter, in the Theatre Comte, in the passage Choiseuil. It is patronized by none but the aristocracy. The range of its performances is a sort of vaudeville-opera, and consists of short lively pieces with two or three characters, supported by a very small orchestra. It is an agreeable place to spend the evening; and it promises to be a useful nursery of artists for the Opera Comique. M. Offenbach has cleared $2500 a month by his theatre since its opening.

Paris now contains two artists of considerable merit—M. Stein, a German, long resident at Revel, whom the prospect of a bombardment scared from his Finnish home, an artist of great merit as a pianist, and an improviser; and M. Schwenke, the son of an organist of Hamburg, who has recently attained considerable rank here as an organist. Mme. Pleyel is here, and has given one concert with a good deal of success. We shall probably hear a good deal from her this winter, as she is introducing to the musical public her daughter, Mlle. Marie Pleyel, a young and beautiful girl, whose musical education is, however, not sufficiently advanced to warrant her mother's attempt to force her into the front rank of artists. Mlle. Marie Pleyel is destined for the lyric stage. Concerts generally this year have proved disastrous to their givers. Vieuxtemps and Servais announced a series of ten concerts at the Hotel d'Ormond; they gave one—nobody came to it, and they did not attempt to give another. Sivioli, better advised, gave up the idea of giving a concert, although he had come here expressly to do so. M. Felicien David has been executing his works to empty houses. I may add, what I forgot to say in the proper place, Mr. Mitchell has lost $3,000 by bringing the Cologne singers here. M. Perrin has resigned the management of the Theatre Lyrique, which has been given to M. Pellegrin, the manager of the theatres of the Camp of Boulogne. This change carries Mme. Cabel, the popular light singer, to the Opera Comique after January. The new manager has engaged Mme. Miolan. Mme. Lauters to appear in a few days, in a new piece by M. Gevaert, and Mme. Cabel will appear in all of her parts successively until Mme. Miolan makes her appearance. The composers will be benefited by this change, as they will receive a larger per centage than they received from M. Perrin.

Our composers are in a rather bad humor that the government should elect Rameau, Gretry, Cherubini and Paër for the honors of statues in the Louvre. They urge that Monsigny, Deleysac, Boieldieu, Nicolo and Hérold are much better entitled to these marmorean honors, since they were Frenchmen, their talents were French, their fame is French; whereas the former have nothing French about them. M. Berlioz has gone to Vienna, to bring out several of his works there. M. Meyerbeer is here, and, I am sorry to say it, in very delicate health. I must not forget to record that the Duke de Saxe-Coburg Gotha sent to M. Crosnier, the manager of the Grand Opera, the Commander's Cross of the Order of Saxe-Coburg Gotha, and to M. Girard, the leader of the orchestra, the cross of officer; to M. Leroy, scene manager, the cross of chevalier, and to MM. H. Potier and Dietrich the gold medal of the order, with the right of wearing the ribbon. He sent also to MM. Roger, Belval and Marié splendid snuff-boxes; a costly ring to M. Merly, and valuable bracelets to Mmes. Lafon, Marie Dussey, Rosati and Plunkett. Smaller recompenses were distributed to every person who had a part in it—even the machinists received $100 a piece. M. Th. Lebarre has written an opera buffa, in two acts, for the Grand Opera. Mme. Fanny Cerrito has gone to St. Petersburg, where she has an engagement for five months.

BOSTON, NOV. 17, 1855.

Handel's "Solomon."

By the enterprise of our old HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY, we shall to-morrow evening have an opportunity of listening to a famous oratorio never before produced in this country, and indeed but comparatively seldom heard abroad. "Solomon," composed in 1749, was the last but three of the twenty-six oratorios of HANDEL, all of which were composed in England. It was succeeded by "Theodora" in 1750, and by "Jephtha" and "Time and Truth" in 1751.—"Esther," the first of the series, bears date 1720;

"Israel in Egypt, 1738; "The Messiah," 1741; "Samson," 1742; "Judas," 1746. Less uniformly sublime, in subject and in treatment, than the "Messiah," or "Israel," it has all the noble Handelian characteristics; choruses ranging through a great variety of expressions, from the most grand and solemn, or triumphant, to the most graceful, pleasing and descriptive; songs, duets and recitatives, which, though they must be somewhat tedious if given entire and by any but the very best of solo-singers, are yet full of character and beauty; instrumental accompaniments, limited to the orchestral resources of those days, and somewhat homely in their lack of richer modern coloring, yet always apt, and strong by the pure force of musical ideas. In England and Germany it has been customary for some competent musician to fill in new orchestral parts, whenever "Solomon" has been performed; but we shall be glad for once to hear a work of Handel in its simplicity, precisely as he wrote it. It will at least gratify a worthy curiosity.

For a text in this case Handel resorted neither to the Bible, nor to a great poet like MILTON. Who furnished the libretto we are not informed. But it is cleverly suited to the subject, which is treated in three distinct parts. (As given here, the indispensable cuttings have led to a two-fold division.) Part First celebrates the wisdom, piety, wedded love, happiness and splendor of Solomon. It is a sort of royal religious Idyl. Part Second is dramatic; its theme is justice, and it relates at length in recitative, solos, duet and trio, the judgment of the wise king in the case of the two mothers claiming the same infant. Part Third introduces the Queen of Sheba, and is mainly lyrical in its character, being largely occupied with a series of choruses, somewhat a la Dryden's Ode to St. Cecilia, illustrating the power of music in describing various passions.

A brief sketch of the contents of the work, gathered from a somewhat hasty perusal of the vocal and organ score, may interest our readers, at least those who do not mean to lose the chance of hearing "Solomon."

First we have an overture in the manner of the day, with its spare instrumentation, (chiefly strings, with flute, oboe and bassoon, and trumpet when needed)—vigorous and quaint, as Handel always is, forming a homogeneous prelude to the whole, and not an abstract of it, like our modern overtures: a simple Largo movement leads into a fugued Allegro, (4-4 measure,) which winds up with a few Adagio chords, and is followed by a moderate movement in 3-4, suggestive of coming pomp and majesty.

No. 2 is a double chorus, of priests, a spirited movement, commenced by the basses of both choirs in stately unison: Your harps and cymbals sound, to great Jehovah's praise. The voices cease, there are ten or twelve bars of lively instrumental symphony, and then the phrases: Your harps, &c. and, Sound, sound, are passed from chorus to chorus in light and joyous harmony; then while the tenors on both sides give out the syllables: To great Jehovah's name, in long, majestic notes, the sopranos of one choir introduce a new theme, with florid accompaniment by the altos: Unto the Lord of hosts your willing voices raise; the different phrases alternate from part to part, and the whole is worked up with great brilliancy and majesty, with all a Handel's learning, all the eight voices coming together upon long notes of plain harmony at the end. It is truly a sublime chorus, and the echoes take some time to spend themselves in the instrumental symphony, after the voices have ceased.

No. 3, rather a dull and lengthy bass air: Praise ye the Lord, &c. (sung in what character does not appear,) is wisely enough omitted. So too is No. 4, a double chorus in very laboriously prolonged notes (Grave): With pious heart and holy tongue, resound, &c., leading into a very difficult fugue, with short answers and long rolling passages;—an imposing piece it must be, well performed, but easily dispensed with.

No. 5 introduces us to Solomon, a part for baritone. It is a recitative, with beautiful, slowly flowing, pensive introductory symphony, in which he invokes God's presence in the "finished temple." No. 6, Zadoc, the priest, (tenor,) recites: Imperial Solomon, thy prayers are heard, fire from heaven lights the altar, &c., and then sings an animated, florid air:

Sacred raptures cheer my breast,
Rushing tides of hallowed zeal;
Joys too fierce to be expressed,
In this swelling heart I feel.

It has all the mannerism of Handel, the roudades, &c., but is full of expression, especially the second strain, in the minor, to the very ardent stanza:

Warm enthusiastic fires
In my panting bosom roll, &c.

which however is separable, and will be omitted on account of the great length of this and other solos.

No. 8. Four-part Chorus: Throughout the land Jehovah's praise record, in uniform, quick-stepping Alla Breve time; a model of simple, noble fugue; as the emulous voices become heated they finally divide into double chorus. The whole is grand and solemn.

Nos. 9 and 10. Recitative of thanksgiving and air by Solomon:

What tho' I trace each herb and flower,
That drinks the morning dew;
Did I not own Jehovah's power,
How vain were all I knew:

An exquisitely sweet, chaste, tender melody, with reeds prominent in the accompaniment, which has hitherto been sung so acceptably in several miscellaneous concerts by Mr. ARTHURSON. There is a sort of appendix strain to this, too: Say what's the rest but empty boast, &c., which is well enough dispensed with.

Now comes what we have called the Idyllic portion, of which the key-note is the bliss of wedded love. Solomon recites:

And see, my Queen, my wedded love,
You soon my tenderness shall prove:
A palace shall erect its head,
Of cedar built, with gold bespread.
Methinks the work is now begun,
The axe resounds in Lebanon.
And see, bedecked with canvas wings
The dancing vessel lightly springs;
While Ophir's mines, well pleased, disclose
The wealth that in their bosoms glows.

To this the Queen replies in a 6-8 Allegro, in A, quite fantastical in its rhythmical divisions, a sort of quaint and florid Pastoral, blessing "the day when first her eyes saw the wisest of the wise," and subsiding into a slower and more emphatic strain at: But completely blessed the day, when I heard my lover say, &c., which leads back into the Allegro.

Nos. 13 and 14 are among the parts omitted. The first a recitative in which Solomon addresses his queen as "Thou fair inhabitant of Nile" and knows "no joy beneath the sun, but what's comprised in Solomon" (there's a decided naïveté in the words;) the second a tranquil and affectionate duet between the happy pair, of which the melody is certainly quite delicate. In the Recitative, No. 15, Zadoc moralizes on the transiency of mere outward beauty, and sings a sweet, pure, flowing 6-8 melody, in F sharp minor, still after the old cut, however, to the words:

Indulge thy faith and wedded truth,
With the fair partner of thy youth;
She's ever constant, ever kind,
Like the young roe, or loving hind.

Omitting Solomon's softly fervent, wooing air: Haste to the cedar grove, which is full of "pleasing gloom," "fragrant spices," "amorous turtles," and "tinkling rills," and which is really one of the most graceful of all the melodies, with an oriental luxury of quiet feeling about it, we come to No. 20, Air by the queen: With thee th' unshelter'd moor I'd tread, . . . Thy lovely form alone I prize, &c., a charming Larghetto, in 3-4 measure, simple, sweet and pensive. After which a single line of recitative, in no particular character—at least there is none named, informs us that: never yet was seen so wise a monarch, or so chaste a queen; and then comes what we apprehend will prove the most popular among the choruses; (No. 22)—not a grand chorus, but a delicious summer night's affair, with a prelude full of flute imitations of nightingales, and strings murmuring like breezes in the trees, to the words:

May no rash intruder disturb their soft hours,
Your odors around them diffuse, O ye flowers;
Ye zephyrs soft breathing their slumbers prolong,
While nightingales lull them to sleep with their song.

Truly a charming epithalamium! The soprano part at times separates into first and second voices taking up the strain, catch-wise. The syncopated rhythm seems to have caught the nightingale character from the outset; the light, buoyant harmonies, now soft, now swelling, spread over the broad surface of some hundreds of voices, have a fine breezy, all-pervading effect; while the occasional duet strain in thirds, first by all the female, then by all the male voices, gives you the sensation of listening through the night air to dainty sounds.

This in the original sweetly closes the First Part; but in our necessarily abridged performance, there is no occasion yet for any respite. So sleep shall seem to occupy no time in such a summer night, and we wake at once to the full morning splendor of the double chorus, No. 23:

From the censer curling rise
Grateful incense to the skies;
Heaven bless David's throne.
Happy, happy Solomon,
Live, forever, pious David's son, &c.

An exceedingly splendid, trumpet-tongued chorus, with a smart orchestral prelude and accompaniment, full of ringing exclamations and responses on the words "happy," &c., upon which a fugue sets in in the basses, with a very quaintly marked, emphatic subject, on the words: live, live forever, which is wrought out at considerable length and winds up magnificently with a repetition of the commencing strain. This is in the key of D major, like the Hallelujah and so many of the most brilliant and triumphant choruses. If well done, as it doubtless will be, it cannot but have a most inspiring effect.

—And here for the present we must halt, having travelled at a slower rate than we anticipated. Another day's journey must take us through.

CONCERTS.

MISS LOUISA PYNE.—This very favorite singer, with her sister and other members of her opera troupe, after a season of unprecedented length and uniform success at Niblo's theatre in New York, has started upon the grand concert tour through the States, West and South, with even California in the remote prospect. As usual on such tours, the party have commenced with making a little detour toward Boston, and on Thursday evening gratified a very numerous audience with one positively only farewell concert.

After a Glee: "When winds whistle cold," by way of overture, well begun, but not so well finished, by six male voices, came Part First, consisting entirely of selections from Mr. BRISTOW's new opera of "Rip Van Winkle," which has proved so successful in New York. These were altogether songs, ballads, and one duet, a string of seven of them, with mere piano accompaniment. Of course—without the orchestral parts, (for Mr. Bristow's instrumentation is said to be one of his strong points,) and without hearing any of the concerted pieces or choruses—we could get but a very imperfect idea of the music of "Rip Van Winkle." These songs, however, were decidedly pleasing and expressive in their different characters, the melodies well turned, natural and unforced, with a musician-like style about the whole. If they do not show original creative genius, they certainly do not sound hacknied, weak or common-place, not nearly so much so as the melodies of BALFE, for instance, nor would it be easy to trace the imitation of any particular model. In listening to them you might think sometimes of AUER, sometimes of the best English composers, sometimes of a host of clever German song-writers; once even for a little while we thought of MENDELSSOHN,—in the symphony rather than the song; it was the second piece, if we remember rightly, the ballad: "When circled round," sung with such true expression by Miss PYNE, the sister, whose contralto seems richer than before. Certainly it was good evidence of the merit of these songs, that so many of them in succession did not become tedious. Much of the credit of course was due to the singers.

The first song: "The tears of the Vine," was sung by Mr. STRETTON, the Rip Van Winkle of the troupe, a robust, jovial-looking John Bull specimen, with a mellow, resonant baritone, and a finished style. Mr. HARRISON was really in tune for once, and gave occasionally such fine high notes and artistically finished passages, that we could imagine he has been at some time a superior singer. His ballad: "Nay, do not weep," was a tender lover's farewell, with a spirited patriotic close. The "Vivandiere Song" is a very sparkling affair, and was keenly relished in the bright, sunshiny, silvery tones of Miss LOUISA PYNE; she sang it with exquisite playfulness and grace. The duet by Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. Harrison was a delicious piece of smoothly flowing vocal melody; and the air and variations: "Hark, the merry bells," afforded her flexible, light voice an opportunity to revel in the most intricate mazes of vocal embroidery. She is one of the most complete mistresses of this art, infallible in all she undertakes of the sort, as indeed in everything she is a perfectly finished and artistic, if not a great singer, always pleasing, always natural and tasteful.

The Second Part, consisting of songs, duets, &c., from the "Crown Diamonds," the "Enchantress," Rode's variations, and other light pieces, we did not hear. The Variations could not have been more wonderful than those we did hear, and everybody knows how admirably LOUISA PYNE sings all these things. We wish her success everywhere and shall welcome her return always, especially in opera. Could she and her sister only join forces with SIMS REEVES and others who are coming, would there not be English Opera worth hearing!

ARTISANS' RECREATIVE UNION. We were present during a portion of the second of these cheap and popular concerts. The Music Hall was almost entirely filled, by as intelligent looking, well-mannered and attentive audience, apparently, as one often sees where so many are together. The firemen, with their families, sat in the galleries, and looked like other people, as if they understood and entered into the spirit of a quiet, musical occasion. Never have we witnessed heartier applause than followed the pieces that were particularly well played or sung. The Germania Serenade Band, expanded to an orchestra of twenty, with WILLIAM SCHULTZE for leader, played some sparkling pieces, a la JULLIEN, with rare precision and euphonious blending. Mr. MOZART sang a German bass song (in English): "Fairest Maiden," by WERNER, admirably, with most satisfactorily rich bass tones; this and the Quartet: "Morning Hymn," by Miss BOTHAMLY, Miss TWICHELL, Mr. ADAMS and Mr. MOZART, were justly applauded. The solos by the ladies we did not hear. Both instrumentally and vocally, in all its materials, the concert was a choice one of its kind, and it is a public benefit to bring such music at a low price within the hearing of so many, who have been strangers to the concert room.

Extra Cadenzas.

We ventured last week to remark upon the manner in which a fine classical aria, otherwise admirably sung, was injured by the addition of ornaments after the Italian fashion of the day. A friend sends us the following extract from his readings, which happens to be exceedingly pertinent to this very case, and backs our comment by an authority from which there can be no appeal. As a good lesson to public singers generally, we are happy to present it:

"Having been one of the audience at Miss PHILLIPS's second Concert, in which she sang Gluck's exquisite aria: Che furo senza Euridice"—an aria whose simple, pure melody needs no more adorning than gold needs gilding—although much pleased with the general rendering, I was struck with the want of good taste shown by the introduction of certain ornamental passages. In afterwards reading Schmid's Life of Gluck, I came across the following passage, in the dedication of the opera of 'Paris' to the Duke of Braganza, which shows what Gluck himself thought of such 'painting of the lily.' He says: 'Slight variations of outline do not materially affect the expression of a caricature, but they entirely destroy the meaning of a noble countenance. As an example I will cite the aria from 'Orpheus': Che furo senza Euridice. The slightest change either in the style of delivery or in the movement, will render it an aria fit for a puppet-show.'"

Cheap Concerts and the Firemen.

MR. EDITOR:—In your notice of the Artizans' Recreative Union concert of last week, there is a complimentary mention of the Firemen and their behaviour at the said performance. I do not seek to palliate their offence, nor to justify their conduct; perhaps it is an honor to them to be spoken of at all in your polite Journal; but I would like to ask as a member of the fire department, if we are the ones alluded to as "cheap people," for whom perhaps these concerts are given with the philanthropic view to ameliorate our condition and ultimately to enhance the value of the class. And, if not too much, allow me to inquire if in your opinion the cheap people may, in the course of human events, be worthy to attend concerts that are given for the dear people, editors, "the appreciative few," &c., &c. FIREMAN.

Thursday, Nov. 15, 1855.

Cheap Concerts, friend, and not "Cheap people!" In other words, cheap concerts for the people. We found the concerts announced everywhere and spoken of as 'People's Concerts,' and much stress laid upon their being cheap, so that the people could go to them. We know of no "cheap people," unless it be about election time, nor need a "fireman" appropriate the epithet, unless the Bowery boy conduct referred to makes him feel cheap. Of "the dear people" we say nothing, since our patriotism never yet was warmed up to the office-seeking temperature.

Musical Chit-Chat.

Our Boston concert tide is now setting in in good earnest. Three of the more important serial courses commence during the coming week. To-morrow evening the HANDEL and HAYDN SOCIETY, with a noble chorus of over two hundred voices, the same excellent conductor and organist as last year, and a goodly array of solo-singers, some of them new to a Boston audience, give us a first taste of Handel's "Solomon," which we doubt not will draw crowds for several Sunday evenings in succession.... On Tuesday evening the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB give the first of this season's classical Chamber Concerts in the delightful Chickering saloon. All the faithful will be there. Among the principal features of the programme will be a Quartet of MOZART, not before played; a Quintet by BEETHOVEN; the second Trio of MENDELSSOHN, and smaller piano pieces, played by OTTO DRESEL.... Next Saturday will come off the first of the ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS, with an uncommonly choice and brilliant programme, which may be found below. The rehearsals of the orchestra of fifty-four of our very best musicians have been very promising; there is a better balance, a greater number of violins, fuller and richer middle parts, (violas, &c.), and a more substantial, glorious body of basses, than we remember in any of our previous orchestras. The vocal selections are choice. We expect to see once more in the Music Hall the crowds and the enthusiasm of the best "Germania" nights.

We are glad to learn that subscription lists, privately circulated, for another series of Chamber Concerts by the "German Trio," (Messrs. GARTNER, JUNGNIKKEL and HAUSE,) are filling up well, and that the first Concert will be given early in December, at the Piano-forte Warerooms of Messrs. Hallet & Davis. Three new pieces will be introduced to the audience, viz: a Trio for violin, 'cello and piano, composed by one of the youngest wonders of "Young Germany," JOHANNES BRAHMS;—a famous Duo Concertante, for piano and violin, by LISZT; and a Duo for violin and 'cello, on themes from Les Huguenots, by VIEUXTEMPS and SERVais, which German musical papers pronounce one of the most effective concert pieces, that have recently appeared. We suppose full particulars will soon be duly announced.

It will be most welcome intelligence to a large circle of lovers of the choicest kind of music, that OTTO DRESEL, who kept his rare artistic talent so studiously private all last winter, is contemplating another series of his delightful Soirées.

Dwellers in Florence have been enjoying there a series of classical Concerts in the house of FREDERIC TENNYSON, brother of ALFRED, and himself a poet. M. ADOLPH ADAM gives the following praise to the artists engaged by M. Boudousquié for the opera in New Orleans this winter: "JUNCA and COLSON quit the Theatre Lyrique at the end of this month; they are engaged in New Orleans with ROUSSEAU DE LA GRAVE and CHAMBADE, who also belonged to the company of the Theatre Lyrique, and with Mme. Colson, who went to the Opera Comique, where she created with distinction an important part in the Cour de Célimène, by Ambroise Thomas, and in the Pré aux Clercs. Junca will be replaced with difficulty; his creations in Si j'étais Roi, and in Le Roi des Halles, and La Promise, and in Jaguarita, made him a distinguished character, which his person suited with admirably."

NEW COURSE OF HARMONY, BY L. H. SOUTHARD.

The Publishers call the attention of the musical profession to this work, as one eminently calculated to lighten the labors of the teacher, and rapidly advance the pupil. It is emphatically a PRACTICAL work, serving both as a Manual of instruction on the one hand, and a Text-book on the other; and it is believed that the peculiar arrangement of the work, together with the very large number of exercises and examples, presents great advantages, to both scholar and teacher, over any similar work of the kind. Teachers highly commend the work. Mr. WILLIAM MASON says it is a work unsurpassed in the language. Mr. GEORGE J. WEBB says that it is a work perspicuous in diction, methodical in arrangement, and sufficiently copious to embrace all the essentials of the general doctrine of accord. It can be ordered through any respectable Music-seller, and will be sent through the mail on the receipt of the price, ($1.75,) postage pre-paid.

CHURCH ORGANS. COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

WM. B. D. SIMMONS, Organ Builder,
(Heretofore doing business in the style of Wm. B. D. Simmons & Co.) and

GEORGE FISHER,

Of Cambridge, have this day formed a Copartnership for continuing the manufacture of Church Organs.

We design to keep in our Warerooms New Instruments for sale at prices from $400 to $1,500 each, and are prepared to build by contract at the shortest notice, Organs, worth from $600 to $12,000. And by prompt and faithful execution of orders hope to merit a like encouragement to that heretofore extended to Wm. B. D. Simmons, and which has indicated the necessity of this business connection, that his entire attention may be devoted to the more difficult and artistic parts of the business, so that an increase thereof may cause no diminution of the personal attention which is requisite for the maintenance of the CHARACTER of our Instruments, upon which we rely for success.

While it will be our aim and ambition to furnish Organs of A PERFECTION OF TONE AND MECHANISM, AND OF AN ELEGANCE OF EXTERIOR UNSURPASSED, we are confident of ability to offer terms MORE FAVORABLE THAN CAN BE OBTAINED ELSEWHERE, for the following reasons: Having ample means, we can purchase in large quantities at first cost, for cash; can always command the most talented assistants, and also do sufficient business to practise division of labor, which, by assigning parts to workmen skilled in their particular branch, necessarily insures better work at less expense. Our Manufactory, by its proximity to Charles river, enables us to receive lumber direct from the vessel at first cost, and having been erected expressly for the business, is in arrangement, size, convenience and its facilities unequalled, being furnished with steam engine, steam-heated drying-house, planing, grooving, matching, moulding, tenoning, boring, and other machines, together with lath scroll, circular and other saws, &c., all operated by steam power.

These facilities are such as are possessed by no other manufacturer of Organs in this country, and of themselves would enable us to furnish Instruments, with a fair profit, at a price which those of like quality must cost builders who have work done by hand that can be better executed at half the cost by steam machinery.

Second hand Organs at all times for sale.

Orders for tuning church organs promptly attended to, and contracts taken for tuning by the year.

Orders respectfully solicited.

FIRST PREMIUM MELODEONS,

The Very Best now Manufactured.

S. D. & H. W. SMITH respectfully call the attention of the public to their IMPROVED MELODEONS, constantly on exhibition at their Warerooms,

No. 417 Washington Street.

By means of a new method of voicing, known only to themselves, they have succeeded in removing the harsh and buzzing sound which formerly characterized the instrument, rendering the tones full, clear and organ-like. The action is prompt and reliable, enabling the performer to execute the most rapid music without obscuring the tones. The swell is arranged to give great expression.

The manufacturers received the First Premium, over all competitors, at the Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association; also at the Metropolitan Mechanics' Fair, held at Washington, D. C.

For the Parlor, Instruments are furnished at prices varying from $45 to $150.

Larger Instruments, with two banks of keys, for chapels and small churches, from $150 to $300.

This last instrument, known as the ORGAN HARMONIUM, has been essentially improved by Messrs. Smith, and they have secured a patent therefor.

Persons who wish to hire Melodeons with a view of purchasing at the end of the year, can have the rents credited as part payment of the purchase money.

Chat with Rossini.

BY FERDINAND HILLER.

Translated for this Journal from the Zeitung of Cologne.

I.—PREFACE.—TROUVILLE SUR MER.

Trouville holds a medium position between a fashionable sea-bathing place and a quiet country residence. Enterprising heads will make of it in time an important harbor; but the sea will have to wet the beach and let it dry again a great many times, before it comes to that. Not a small number of noble French families have made here their retreat, some of them on the very edge of the sea, naturally only for the fine summer months—the autumn calls these much-afflicted ones away to the chase and to their festivities,—and in the winter there is of course no life outside of Paris. The oft-named eighty-six year old Chancellor Pasquier comes here every year, and the saloon of the Countess B., his ancient friend, is perhaps one of the most interesting in France. Wealthy and respectable families from Caen and Lifieux consider Trouville their Campagna, and twice a day the steamer brings in visitors from Havre. A sort of ocean-house, called the Saloon, unites a portion of the bathing guests, especially during the afternoon and evening hours. It is quite pretty, but furnished without great luxury. You find there a great number of French and some English newspapers, a billiard room, a dancing hall, which is used twice a week for balls and keeps the company assembled in the later hours of evening; chambers too, in which music and dancing are taught, but nothing like a restaurant. One pays for the privilege of frequenting the saloon—a necessary arrangement, since in immoral France there are no gambling hells at these watering places. A covered terrace, with the finest prospect toward the sea and Havre, runs in a crescent round the building, and here is sewing, tattling, whist and domino, reading, smoking, lounging, and all such other useful occupations. Moreover the nearer and remoter environs of Trouville afford opportunity for drives and little excursions of an historical, restorative or natural-historical interest. If one brings with him here an uncertain state of health and a various correspondence, he can spend his time excellent well. * * *

But the lion among the guests stopping here was the "swan of Pesaro," GIOACHIMO ROSSINI. For a quarter of a century with the French he has been unconditionally the greatest musical name, and neither his absence from France nor his inactivity have caused any change in that opinion. The so-called musical revolution dates from his arrival in Paris, and in its praise both ultra royalists and Red Republicans unite.—Meanwhile in all lands, where the music of western Europe is cultivated, there is no more widespread name than his, and a more popular opera than the "Barber of Seville" never has existed. With all the love and reverence which we Germans cherish for our own great masters, the most inveterate classicist will not be unjust enough not to recognize the great genius of Rossini; and the objections which we make to him, partly from the national and partly from the ideal standpoint, are very much weakened, if we judge him as an Italian composer compared with his predecessors and countrymen. But it is not the purpose of these lines to follow out such considerations; their design is simply to tell what an extraordinary attention the illustrious man excited here;—an attention in which curiosity and reverence were mingled, and which with all, who came nearer to him, increased to a really affectionate sympathy.—His heart-winning individuality, together with his suffering condition, subdued great and small to him. Persons newly arrived or passing through waited for the moment when they might see him; the settled visitors conversed of nothing more than of him, and if he chanced not to let himself be seen for half a day, they inquired for him with as much interest as they would for the latest news from Sebastopol.

There has been a frightful deal of fabulous report about Rossini's health during the summer. His taking four weeks' time and his own carriage and post-horses, to travel from Florence to Paris, furnished occasion for all sorts of comments. His finding it more than he could bear there, at a time when all Europe was rushing to the French capital, made many actually believe that they had got to give him up. The simple explanation of these eccentricities is, that Rossini's nervous system is much shattered, and that the noise of the locomotive is as unendurable to him as that which reigned this summer in the streets of Paris. When one has written operas for twenty years continuously, and for five and forty years has been continually worshipped, it is really no wonder if he feels somewhat unstrung. But a nabob, who loses a couple of thousand dollars, remains still a nabob, and so Rossini's mind is what it ever was; his wit, his memory, his communicative vital gifts are unimpaired. Because for twenty years past he has ceased to compose, he has at least given nobody the right to maintain, that his musical genius has waned;—the last work that he wrote was "William Tell."

Rossini is now sixty-three years old. His features are tolerably unchanged. You will hardly see a more intelligent countenance than his, a more finely cut nose, a more eloquent mouth, more expressive eyes and a more noble brow. His physiognomy has the Southern vivacity, really speaking, in joke and in earnest, irresistible in the expression of irony, moody humor, or roguishness. His organ is as agreeable as it is flexible; no South-German can appear more genial to the ear of a North-German, than Rossini, when he wishes. It is the most social nature one can possibly conceive of. I believe he never will grow weary of having men about him, of talking and telling stories and—what is much more meritorious—of listening. In all this he shows that habit of adaptation, which one only finds in Southerners; for children and old people, for noble and for simple he finds always the right word, without altering the style and manner of his deportment. He is just one of those happy natures, in which everything is inborn, and in which all modifications take place of themselves by an organic process. Neither in his music nor his character is there anything violent;—that is what has won so many hearts to both.

The veneration, that was shown to him here, expressed itself in every possible way. At concerts and so forth they always made room for him in the middle seat of the front row; when he seated himself upon the terrace, the most beautiful and elegant ladies gathered about him, and petted him. A high official personage from Caen asked me very seriously for my opinion as to which of the newly laid out streets of Trouville was the fittest to be adorned with the name of Rossini. Truly comical is the story of a tailor, M. Cuiller, who had the honor to make for Rossini a pair of pantaloons. When he brought them home to him, he timidly begged permission to put upon his sign the honorary title: "Tailor to Sig. Rossini." "What in the world?" said the latter; "look at me! I look like a butter merchant. You will ruin your artistic calling, if you do that."

But the tailor would not be diverted, he begged and entreated, the maestro laughed, the tailor was victorious, and the traveller now sees on the main street of Trouville a hanging sign with the inscription :

Coutiller,
TAILLEUR DE MR. G. ROSSINI.

I had been first introduced to Rossini, when as a very young man I came to Paris. There as well as afterwards in Milan I have seen very much of him, and he has everywhere and always shown himself in the highest degree kindly disposed and full of sympathy to me. During the two or three weeks I spent in Trouville, I passed the greatest part of the time in his society. We walked for hours together up and down the little terrace, by the sea-side, and this lounging at the most was interrupted only now and then to take part in a game of Domino. Even in this serious play the conversation hardly ceased, and Rossini was as inexhaustible in his communications, as he was insatiable in his inquiries about facts and persons of whom I could give him any information. Although I only a few times came to the point of making music, owing to the want of a good instrument, yet music and musicians furnished the principal matter of our conversation. Rossini's memory is, as I have before remarked, uncommonly strong; his knowledge of the most various kinds of works and composers much greater than most German musicians would suppose; his judgment from of old has seemed to me sharp, intelligent and impartial; he knows how to enter into everything and be just to all. That he has seen, heard and experienced infinitely much that is interesting, is natural in a career like his. I believe I shall be giving pleasure to many artists and friends of music, if I sketch down upon paper, while it is still floating fresh before me, what has particularly interested me and edified me in the communications of Rossini. I shall be pardoned if I introduce myself, although as little as possible, as a party to the conversation. They were no lectures that the maestro delivered to me; one word gave the other; and the unrestrained, aphoristic, discursive chit-chat I can only render in the same form, unless it is to become an altogether formless medley. For one thing I pledge my word, and that is the main matter, namely that I have put nothing essential of my own invention into the mouth of the maestro.

Life of John Sebastian Bach;

WITH A CRITICAL VIEW OF HIS COMPOSITIONS, BY J. N. FÖRCKEL.

CHAPTER V.

There was a peculiarity in the melody of Sebastian Bach, which was owing to the peculiar mode of his treatment of harmony and modulation. Where several concurrent melodies are united, each equally smooth and expressive, none can so predominate as to be distinguished by the hearer apart from the rest. The attention must, as it were, be divided among them, so that sometimes one, sometimes another shall appear the most attractive, though its beauty may seem in some degree obscured by the accompanying parts. I say seem to be obscured, because it is not really so, but is rather relieved by them, when the ear is sufficiently experienced to listen to and comprehend the whole in one. There is another reason why Bach's melodies are so strikingly dissimilar to those of other composers, which is this—such a combination of several parts compels the composer to make use of certain turns in each single melody which are not required in single-part composition. No single part need ever force itself into notice, but each must in turn, with art and ingenuity, be made to bend and yield, in order to the harmonious combination of the whole. And this necessity it is, which, by producing these new, singular and before unheard effects, distinguishes Bach's melodies from those of another master. This originality is not calculated to please the taste of the multitude, but will, by the true connoisseur of the art, be reckoned a distinguishing merit, when it does not interfere with the smoothness and flowingness of the composition, and is not suffered to run into extravagance. All Bach's melodies, however, are not of this intricate description. What are called his free compositions, though all bearing the stamp of originality, have melodies so clear, so simple, that, however different to the melodies of other masters, they may be comprehended and appreciated by the most untutored ear. Such are the preludes in his "Well-tempered Clavichord," and most of the pieces in his greater and smaller "Suites." His "Passages" in themselves bear the same stamp of originality as do his melodies. They are at once so new and so varied, so unexpected and so brilliant, such indeed as are not to be found in any other composer. Examples of this kind abound in all his compositions for the clavichord, but are more strikingly distinguishable in the "great variations" in the first part of his "Practice for the Clavichord," in the "English Suites," and in the "Chromatic Fancy." As all passages are made up of dismembered chords, so their richness, newness, and variety must depend on the quality of the materials of which they are composed.

Bach's wonderful talent and judgement in the treatment of harmony and melody is sufficiently illustrated by his successful attempt to compose a melody of such a construction that it could not be harmonized by setting any part to it likewise containing a melody. It was at that time an established rule that every union of parts must make a whole, and use up all the notes necessary to the most complete expression of the contents; that no deficiency should anywhere be felt, which would render another part possible. This rule, till Bach's time, had only been applied to compositions in two, three, or four parts, and that but imperfectly. Bach applied this rule not only to two, three, or four-part compositions, but also extended it to those in a single part; and by this bold attempt produced six solos for the violin, and six others for the violoncello, which are without any accompaniment, and admit of none: for he has in a single part combined all the notes necessary to complete the modulation, so that a second part is neither requisite nor indeed possible. In consequence of these peculiar qualities, Bach's melodies never grow old. Whatever he has intermingled in his earlier works conformable to the taste of the times has grown antiquated; but in his later works, where he has suffered the deep resources of his art to develop themselves unshackled by the dictates of fashion, his melody is as fresh and new as if it were but the creation of yesterday, and this can be said of few compositions equally old. Even the works of Reinhard, Kaiser, and Handel, have grown antiquated sooner than might have been expected, or than the composers themselves would have credited. Composing for the public in general, they were obliged in some degree to comply with the public taste, and nothing is more capricious and variable than popular taste or fashion. Handel's fugues, however, are not yet become antiquated, while few perhaps of his airs would now be found to win the public ear.

To Bach's extraordinary management of harmony and melody was united a very great and varied use of rhythmus. The composers of that period had ample opportunities of acquiring the perfect and easy management of different kinds of rhythm, by what were called the "Suites," which then held the place of our Sonatas. In these pieces there were between the prelude and the concluding jig many very characteristic French dance tunes, in which rhythm was the most important point. Composers were then obliged to be very well versed in time, measure, and rhythm, and to make use of a great variety of them (now for the most part unknown) in order to give to every dance its proper character and rhythm. In this particular also, Bach far outstript his predecessors and cotemporaries. He acquired such a mastery in this branch of the art, that he was able to give even to his fugues a rhythm as marked, as easy, and as continuous as if they had been minuets.

The greatness of Bach's genius is shown in his constant and easy application of all the above named means. Whatever the style he chose, his treatment of his subject was always equally simple and felicitous. Nothing appears to have been difficult to him; and he never missed what he aimed at. No one would desire to have a single note other than is written. I will illustrate what I have said by some single instances. C. P. Emanuel in his preface to his father's Psalm tunes for four voices (Vierstimmige Choralgesänge) says, the world expected from him none but masterpieces. And this praise is not exaggerated (though some reviewers seem to think so) when it is restricted to the productions of his maturer years. In many species of composition others have written pieces which may compete with his. For instance, there are Allemandes, Courantes, &c., by Handel and others, which are not less beautiful, if less rich, than those of Bach: but in fugue, and counterpoint, and canon, as relating to it, he stands entirely unrivalled and alone. There never yet was a fugue of any composer that could compare with his; indeed, he who knows not Bach's fugues, knows not what a true fugue is and ought to be. In fugue, in general, there is one set routine. You choose a theme, then put to it a second, gradually transpose both into the keys relating to the first, and make the other parts accompany them through all these transpositions with thorough bass chords. This is a fugue; such a one does not require much labor or art to compose or comprehend; and they who are only acquainted with such can necessarily form but a very poor opinion of the whole species. How different are the fugues of Bach! fulfilling as they do all the conditions which we commonly look for only in free compositions. A characteristic theme, from which is derived an unbroken and distinct melody equally characteristic from beginning to end; the other parts not mere accompaniments, but independent melodies harmonizing throughout with the rest. The whole progressing with perfect freedom, lightness and facility, combining the most perfect purity with the richest variety of modulation; not a superfluous or unnecessary note admitted, and a unity and diversity of style, rhythmus and measure; and, lastly, a vigor infused throughout the whole, that makes it seem to the hearer, or the player, as if every note were indued with life.

These are the excellencies of Bach's fugues—excellencies which excite astonishment and admiration in all who know what intellectual vigor is required for the composition of such works. And should not a work uniting in itself all the various excellencies which are found separately and singly in other works, according to their kinds, excite our especial admiration? But more than all this, though all the productions of Bach's mature years possess in common these distinguishing qualities, all are replete with excellencies of various kinds, yet each fugue has its separate and distinctive character; its own peculiar forms of harmony and melody. To know and play one of Bach's fugues is literally to know and play but one, whereas with the fugues of other composers it suffices to comprehend and familiarize the hand with one, and you may play and comprehend whole folios. To such powers and to such excellencies do the arts of counterpoint lead when rightly employed, that is to say, employed as Bach employed them. It was by them he learned to develop from a given subject a whole succession of resembling yet different melodies in every kind of taste and figure. Through them he learned not merely to begin but to continue and to end well; and through them he acquired such a knowledge of harmony and its endless transpositions, that he could reverse whole pieces, note by note, in all their parts, without in the slightest degree impeding the flow of the melody or the correctness of the harmony. Through them he learned to make the most artificial canons in all intervals and in all movements, so light and flowing as entirely to conceal the art employed in their construction, and to make them sound like freer compositions; and finally through them he was enabled to bequeath to posterity a great number and variety of works, which are and will remain models of Art till time shall be no more.

ECHO AND SILENCE.

In eddying course when leaves began to fly,
And Autumn in her lap the store to strew,
As mid wild scenes I chanced the muse to woo,
Through glens untrod, and woods that frown'd on high,
Two sleeping nymphs with wonder mute I spy!
And, lo, she's gone! In robe of dark green hue
'Twas Echo from her sister Silence flew,
For quick the hunter's horn resounded to the sky!
In shade affrighted Silence melts away.
Not so her sister—Hark! for onward still,
With far heard step, she takes her listening way,
Bounding from rock to rock and hill to hill.
Ah, mark the merry maid in mockful play,
With thousand mimic tones the laughing forest fill!
Brydges.

A Cantata at short notice.

The following from the Paris correspondence of the New Orleans Picayune:

I have been a good deal interested in the account M. Ad. Adam (the well known composer) has given of the history of the cantata he composed for the gratuitous performances of the Opera Comique and Theatre Lyrique in honor of the fall of Sevastopol. They were given at 2 o'clock on Thursday. At noon Wednesday he was at the rehearsal of an opera of one of his friends, when the manager of the Opera Comique sent for him on pressing business. He went at once and found the manager busy sketching scenes and costumes. "I say" said the latter, "Are you a fellow who can give me a cantata on the fall of Sevastopol, to be executed to-morrow at the Opera Comique and Theatre Lyrique?" "Why not?" "Because there is not much time." "Then we must lose none. Where are the words?" "Michael Carré is writing them." "Who will sing them?" "At the Opera Comique, Faure, Jourdan, Bussine and Ricquier." "At what time will you be ready?" "It is now 1 o'clock; if I begin at once I shall have finished it by 6 o'clock; but when will it be copied?" "In the evening. We rehearse at the Opera Comique to-night after the performance, and at the Theatre Lyrique at noon to-morrow before the performance, which begins at 2." "All right. I am off for Michael Carré's." "Be in a hurry; I have two scenes and eight costumes to have made—no trifle." M. Adam posted to M. Carré's, expecting to find the cantata ready. He saw a person very much embarrassed, with half a sheet before him. "See here," said he, "I have written a dozen lines for a grand chorus, which will precede the strophes." "What, malheureux; twelve lines! a grand chorus! Why, it would take a whole day to write that, two days to copy it, and two days to learn it. I want three or four lines at furthest, and them not too long! I say, an idea strikes me! Take Gretry's La Victoire est à nous! which everybody knows, and imitate it at once. Ah! to imitate poetry takes a good deal more time than to write new lines which one may cast in any measure he pleases. Yes, but it is easier learnt; write it at once, I am going to make the arrangements with the copyists of the two theatres, and I shall return in a half hour. I take with me what you have written, and cutting it down by two thirds, and adding to it the words you are going to write on La Victoire est à nous! we shall have the first chorus."

M. Adam returned at once to the Opera Comique, reading the words as he went. Before he got to the theatre he had found the measure and melody of the introduction. He went to the copyist's room and wrote the chorus on detached sheets, which were transcribed as fast as he wrote, that he might carry the rough sketch home with him; he made arrangements with the copyists that they were to come for the MS. score at 6 o'clock, and he returned to Carré's. Here, said the latter are the chorus and the first stanza. Very well, I'm going to set to work; send me the other three as you write them. That's easy enough said, but I have no servant, and don't intend to open my door to anybody. Oh! then I'll call by the theatre and tell them to send you a boy, who will come here every half hour until all has been sent off; he will ring three times and you will open to him. M. Adam then went to the theatre and gave instructions to the servant, and at 3 o'clock sat down at his piano and began to write the first note of the cantata, whose instrumental score consists of not less than twenty pages. It was completed before 8 o'clock. He went at once to the Theatre Lyrique, where he made the actors rehearse their parts. At 10 o'clock he went to the Opera Comique to make the artists there rehearse; Jourdan and Ricquier sang that night in L'Etoile du Nord, when they were on the stage, he took Faure and Bussine in hand, and quitted them when their comrades left the stage. At midnight all the parts were known; the copyists declared they could not be ready. The leader of the orchestra was sent for, and asked if the orchestra could not rehearse in the morning. Impossible, said he, at 8 o'clock we must rehearse the Te Deum at the Conservatoire, and be at Notre Dame at 11 o'clock. Oh! the orchestra can rehearse between the Te Deum at the Conservatoire and its execution. Then the chorus had to commit their parts to memory, and they were not crammed before 1 o'clock at night. After all these labors M. Adam went home to bed, but he could not sleep a single instant. At 10 o'clock A. M. he was at the Opera Comique; the orchestra were at their posts, but the singers had not come; the rehearsal took place without them, and the faults of MSS. were corrected at once; then the mise en scène took place without the singers who were at Notre Dame. At noon, he rehearsed the same mise en scène at the Theatre Lyrique; the chorus had received their parts only that morning, and they were obliged to learn them before thinking of making the orchestra rehearse—here a new difficulty presented itself: the performance would commence in half an hour, and the entrance to the theatre was so encumbered by the throng anxious to obtain places, the musicians could not get up at the door; police and soldiers had to be sent for to open a passage to some of them, and besides, all the wind instruments were out with the National Guard. All these difficulties were overcome, and the cantata had great success. This glimpse behind the curtain exhibits to you one scene of the fevered life of Paris, which wears and tears body and mind in a frightful way. They say all literary men, and composers here die of ossification of the heart, or softening of the brain; can it be wondered at?

Diary Abroad.—No. 26.

BERLIN, OCT. 27.—The Tribune brings me nearly four columns upon BRISTOW's opera. Nobody can hope that it is a success more heartily than I, but this article I must read with a running commentary.

"Operas with spoken dialogue are termed comic, to distinguish them from grand operas."

Hem! Hem! Hem! So Fidelio is a comic opera!

"At the first go off we have some masterly modulations of the school in which VOGLER inducted WEBER and MEYERBEER, and which MOZART denounced."

When did Mozart denounce the school into which Vogler inducted Weber and Meyerbeer? Vogler's school was that of Padre MARTINI and Padre VALOTTI.

I suppose the above assertion rests upon this:—When Mozart was about twenty-two years of age he was in Mannheim, where he found Vogler holding the offices of court chaplain and vice kapellmeister. At this time Mozart, writing home to his father, reports a Miserere, composed by Vogler, "which every one tells me is perfectly intolerable to listen to, the harmony being all wrong." As every one who makes any pretension to musical knowledge has—or should be ashamed of himself if he has not—Holmes's Life of Mozart, I will simply refer to that book, (Harper's Edition), pages 122 and 124, for Mozart's estimate of Vogler. Now who was this Vogler? A young man of twenty-eight years, who accomplished no fame until long years after this period, when he had the works of MOZART and HAYDN as models.

The above 'fling' at Mozart is just as contemptible as it would be if HANDEL's opinion of an early work by GLUCK, long since forgotten, had been introduced for the purpose of insinuating that Handel condemned the 'Orpheus,' 'Alceste' or 'Iphigenia.'

"That [the drinking song] of 'Don Giovanni' has not a single bibulous or rollicking element to commend it."

Let expressive silence speak the praise of that assertion! The world has had many great inventors and discoverers, but the Tribune surpasses them all. It is a fortunate thing for a musical man to live in the age of that sheet which so ably sweeps away the world for sixty odd years back.

"Even on the continent of Europe, where every musical city has its firmly established opera house, in which native singers give habitually works in the native language—besides its Italian opera house, wherein the, &c., &c."

"Besides its Italian opera"—false, Mr. Tribune, utterly false. Here are some of the musical cities of the continent which have not their Italian opera house. Amsterdam, Rotterdam, Antwerp, Cologne, Mayence, Frankfurt, Strasburg, Cassel, Hanover, Leipsic, Dresden, Berlin, Prague, Vienna, Munich, Augsburg, Stuttgart, Weimar, Bremen, Hamburg. Italian opera has for 160 years been ruining successive managers in London, and lives in Paris and St. Petersburg only by direct government assistance, and has died out (in the Italian language) everywhere else.

"Even there [on the continent of Europe], the young composer who, after years of laborious studies to qualify him for the task, has finally achieved it and holds his first opera written and ready for the stage, finds that his toils and trials have not even commenced."

The Tribune sees all Europe within the walls of Paris—or rather it can never see beyond those walls—it is a most rare thing that that paper has a musical article in which any allusion is made to opera out of Paris, that has not a blunder or two in it. Now no one will dispute the Tribune, if it avers that the Grand Opera at Paris is a Canaan into which an unknown, and especially an American composer can hardly penetrate; but when the averment is extended to every principal city on the Continent—pshaw, it is perfectly ridiculous!

Here is a report of the Royal Opera in Berlin for the year 1847, lying before me. In that one year were produced:

"Condemnation of Faust," by BERLIOZ. Damned.

"William of Orange," by CARL ECKERT. Semi-d'm'd.

"The Pretender," by KUCKEN. Damned.

"Zaire," Anonymous. Damned.

"Just Right," by SCHAFKE. Damned.

"Anette," O. TIEHSEN. Semi-damned.

"Rienzi," WAGNER. Damned.

In spite of the ill success of that year, during the next were produced:

"Martha," by FLOROW. Successful.

"Diamond Cross," by SALOMON. Disappeared at once.

"Rothmantel," by R. WUERST. ditto.

Besides these I find in the year 1849 the following works of, at that time, young or unknown composers introduced to the public of Germany: "Gitana," by BALFE, at Hamburg; "The Two Princes," by ESSER, at Berlin; "Forester," by FLOROW, at Hamburg; "Gutenberg," by FACHS, Hamburg; "Conradin," by HILLER, at Dresden; "Brant von Kynart," by LITOLFF, at Brunswick; "Waffenschmidt," by LORTZING, at Dresden; "Undine," Lortzing, at Frankfurt; "Grand Admiral," Lortzing, at Leipsic; "Prince Eugene," GUSTAVUS SCHMIDT, Frankfurt; "Girl from the Country," by SUPPE, at Vienna.

Of course there is no golden road by which the composer can walk at once to fame; but that the Tribune's Paris experience is to be considered conclusive as to the prospects of a young composer all over the continent, is nonsense.

"The early struggles of MEYERBEER and VERDI are but the type of those of nearly every composer who has achieved renown through the opera houses of Continental Europe."

Let us look a moment at this Meyerbeer business. On the day he was admitted member of the Berlin Sing Akademie as alto singer, that society sang a psalm of his composition. Before he was twenty a cantata, "God and Nature," by him was produced by the same association. His first opera, "Jephtha," which Weber said had extraordinary beautiful pieces, written in a thoroughly German and regular form, was produced about the same time in Munich, without success. In his 23d year his "Two Caliphs" was damned both in Stuttgart and Vienna. Three years later his "Romilda e Costanza," written in the ROSSINI style, met with a brilliant but short lived success at Padua. "Margaret of Anjou," and "Emma of Roxburg" followed and gained applause, on several Italian Theatres. The latter he produced at Berlin, and it was most unequivocally damned, though the opera house was filled with his friends and connections. Did any reader ever hear of Meyerbeer's "Exile of Granada?" That is another of his works at that period—produced at Milan in the winter of 1821-2. Another forgotten work was the "Semiramis," which was written for the Court Theatre in Turin about 1820. Then came "Il Crociato d'Egitto," which succeeded in Italy and Paris—and was damned generally elsewhere. In Berlin the Royal Opera had lost too much money by his previous attempts, and would not touch it. The Königstädtisches Theatre of that city took it up in 1832, and ran it some six or seven times, since which it has disappeared entirely. Then came "Roland the Devil"—he did have to buy its performance, that is true, and any manager, who would risk the enormous expense of putting such a work upon the stage,—the production of a man who had been so many times weighed and found wanting, would be a fool. It succeeded because Rossini, to win a bet, appeared at the grand rehearsal and applauded one or two numbers.

"The early struggles of Meyerbeer"—bah!

"In the production of Oratorios and Symphonies he [the English or American composer] encounters peculiar obstacles." Here follow two extracts from the London Athenæum. I agree with the first one freely. If I subscribe to a Singing Society without knowing beforehand that it will produce works not yet stamped as good, or to a Philharmonic Society with the expectation of hearing established Symphonies, and they palm off trash upon me for my money, I shall look out next time about subscribing.

It is the custom here for young composers to have a hearing thus: some society gives its gratuitous services for the vocal parts, an orchestra is hired, and the new oratorio is sung in a church, the proceeds being devoted to a charity. I have suffered the affliction of two such oratorios this month. But none of the established societies think of cheating their subscribers by taking their money and using it for the benefit of a young 'struggling' composer. And this I think is right. Symphonies get a hearing at Festivals where two or three of the best offered are tried and the best gets a prize. So GADE made himself known. I have heard some four or five such works—for after a work of this kind gets a prize, LIEBIG 'sandwiches' it between a Beethoven and a Haydn work, and we listen to the one for the sake of getting the others. Liebig sometimes gives us symphonies, which have not had prizes. Nobody thinks of demanding the productions of fledglings at our Royal Orchestra soirées, or at the Sing Akademie—and I hope for one that the New-York Philharmonic will always remain as exclusive as it is now—and in fact cut off what trash still gets into its programmes. Stop; let us go a little more at length into this matter, taking the articles copied by the Tribune as our text.

First, a correspondent of the Athenæum complains that as a subscriber to a series of concerts—his money being paid for the quid pro quo of works by Handel, Haydn, and Mendelssohn, whose excellence he knew—he was cheated by having served upon him a music of which he knew nothing, and which he did not wish to hear. Now unless the "Sacred Harmonic Society," which is for the purpose of producing standard oratorios, gives notice beforehand to the public that they shall also give such and such untried works, so that the public may subscribe knowingly, it is a fraud. If I subscribe to the four concerts of a society for instrumental performances, which advertises that it will give four symphonies in the four concerts composed by masters of established reputation—or in other words "classical works"—and I am put off with the composition of some new man, I am cheated, and will not subscribe next time unless they give me a list of the works to be given. And yet I will pay not only as much but even more to another series of concerts, at each of which a new book shall be given, for the sake of bringing out talent. The Athenæum's correspondent was right in spite of CHORLEY, and of the Tribune.

The Sing Akademie here, and the Boston Handel and Haydn Society are honest and honorable in this respect.

Secondly. So long as the press of London and New-York are unanimous in damning with faint praise every thing that is not BELLINI, DONIZETTI, and so on, and make all their criticisms (!) little more than puffs of this, that and the other singer, male and female, and so long as opera is only a something depending upon stars at enormous prices, who sing in an unknown tongue, so long must it continue an aristocratic affair, ruining managers as it has now done in London for 150 years, and never getting down to the real public. And so long as this is so, so long will it remain the height of folly for managers to spend $20,000 to 30,000 in bringing out new and unknown works, except in case of men who have given in some way proofs that they have genius and talent. The Paris Opera was perfectly right in refusing "Robert the Devil;" and so was that in London in refusing Smart's, or Fry's works.

Thirdly. The reference to the case of the painter who has but to hang up his picture to be seen and judged, tells on the other side—on my side. Just see. A paints a picture, B composes an opera; A invites his friends to see it in his studio, B invites his friends to his rooms to hear his work. Now unless A can find means of exposing his picture in public, he cannot sell it, as a general thing, that is if it be a large work—if it be in painting what an opera is in music. So artists and friends of artists found a society and collect funds for an exhibition, where the work is to be seen. To see it the public pays money. So A gets fame, and then his pictures sell. A's picture is not bought at a high price and put into the Boston Athenæum, or any permanent gallery—nothing of the sort. It is not the business of the great galleries any where in the world to buy the works of unknown men, nor do they do it. Make the application yourself to B's opera, which he wishes to publish and sell.

Fourthly. Let the musical artists do as the pictorial artists have done. Let them form a good chorus and orchestra, get good masters of scenic effects, (painters, &c.), employ some of the fine American singers and songstresses, and then give a series of operas like Cherubini's 'Water Carrier,' Weigl's 'Swiss family,' Bellini's 'Sonnambula,' Stora's 'Iron Chest,' and at reasonable prices, and it would not be long before an audience would be formed to whom two or three American operas might be annually presented. But do not find fault if the Grand Opera at Paris, or the Italian Opera in London, is unwilling to risk 'Robert the Devil,' Fry's 'Leonora,' or Smart's 'Berta.'

"The first opera by an American was Leonora." "It was a grand opera in the technical sense of the term—that is, without spoken dialogue."

So Leonora had all her woes to relate in recitative. Now the recitatives in this opera may be the best ever made—that is not what I am going to touch upon. I am simply going to say that nearly all the recitative I ever heard is the most intolerable bore—if in a language I can understand. If it is in Italian it makes no difference whether the dialogue is spoken or recited, as I am engaged at the time in studying the text book to find out what it is all about, though recitative has this advantage, that it gives me more time for study. But the moment recitative upon the stage (except in cases where it is fully accompanied and is in close connection with airs as in Gluck, Mozart, Weber and Beethoven, as here performed) takes the dialogue in English or German, my thermometer sinks to zero. Now, look here.

Every language has its peculiar rising and falling inflexions of the voice, its peculiar accents and means of strong expression through the tones in which the words are spoken. Porter gives a single question in which the accent, as it falls upon each word in succession, changes the nature of the answer which must follow.

Do you ride to town to-day? No, Mr. Brown.

Do you ride to town to-day? No, I walk.

Do you ride to town to-day? No, away from it.

Do you ride to town to-day? No, over to Dover.

Do you ride to town to-day? No, to-morrow.

Do you ride to town to-day? Yes, spite of the cholera. Put No. 5 into German.

Ride you, to-day, to town?

Suppose you translate a Grand opera from the German into English, and you see at once that the recitative meant for No. 5 will give the expression of No. 2. Now this is ten times more when you translate from Italian. What is true of translations is equally true of recitatives written to German or English words upon the Italian model. It requires the very finest ear to detect the inflexions of spoken sentences, so as to give them in music. Purcell and Handel set English words to English recitative. Such recitatives are to us what Italian recitatives are to Italians. I feel continually the disagreeable—disagreeable? the abominable sensation of hearing German words and sentences recited to Italian inflexions. Nearly all the recitative I hear both in English and German produces about the same effect as it would to hear a broad Scotchman, a London Cockney, or a wild Irishman, declaiming Shakespeare. Now I never heard a single recitative in Leonora—nor can I aver that every one is not a hundred fold better than any Purcell or Handel ever composed;—but if they are nothing but imitations of the Italian inflexions and cadences—if they are all cut out after the regular pattern—they must be enough, unless the other music is superlative in its excellence—to damn the thing forever.

In conclusion, I know not whether I shall have the greater pleasure in hearing that the next attempt at establishing an Italian Opera after the manner of London and St. Petersburg in New York has broken down, or in hearing that "Rip van Winkle's" success is preparing the way for something rational. I hope, however, that Italian Opera performed by enormously expensive troupes will be at length completely crushed out, as it is in nearly all the cities of the continent of Europe—spite of the Tribune's assertion—and that opera in the native language will take its place.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, Nov. 19.—Our festival days have commenced, and were worthily introduced on Saturday night by the first "Classical Soirée" of Mr. EISFELD. You will observe that the "Quartette" is left out, as the entrepreneur (it wouldn't do to say undertaker, would it?) proposes to introduce some quintets among the quartets this winter, for which purpose Mr. JOSEPH BURKE has promised his valuable aid. The first step towards carrying out this plan was made the other evening by the performance of MOZART's Quintet in G minor, which closed the concert. We here in New York have never heard it before, and now certainly heard it to advantage, for it was very well played. How fresh, sparkling, and lovely it is, now reminding one a little of its brethren, as for instance of its namesake, the G minor Symphony, and then almost attaining to the loftier spirit of BEETHOVEN's earlier works. The remaining instrumental pieces were CHOPIN's Trio, op. 8, with HOFFMANN at the piano, and Quartet Concertante, op. 12, of MENDELSSOHN. The gem of the latter, which, as a whole, did not altogether please me, is the charming Canzonetta, which we have heard on previous occasions, and always with great delight. But this time it was not played with very much spirit, and failed to elicit, as always before, a unanimous encore. I am sorry to say that in this number, as well as in the Trio, we were disturbed by that harshness and out-of-tune playing of the first violin, which was so frequently complained of by my predecessor of last winter. It is unfortunate that Mr. NOLL cannot learn to remedy this, almost his only fault, for, apart from this, there is so much character and vigor in his playing, that he could easily attain the highest rank among our resident violinists. As it was, every one felt it a relief to hear Burke's sweet, clear tones take the lead in the quintet. Yet Burke, on the other hand, lacks much that Noll possesses—the two would just complete each other;—pity that we cannot blend them into one.

Hoffmann continues to gain a firmer footing, in the esteem of the "appreciative few" with every appearance in public. His playing is really wonderful. Such vigor, such flexibility of finger, yet marvelous accuracy, such a calm, easy, and yet dignified demeanor at this instrument, it is seldom our good fortune to observe. His earnest striving to render himself a true interpreter of Chopin, whom so few can interpret, deserves the success which crowns it, is worthy of the highest praise. And that he is by no means one-sided, or entirely absorbed in this one composer and his peculiar style, to the detriment of his comprehension of others, was amply proved by the masterly manner in which he rendered Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata last winter. I must not omit to mention that, with the exception of the above mentioned defect in the violin, Mr. Hoffmann was very ably supported in the Trio. This composition did not appear to me as characteristic of Chopin as his latter works. It smacked a little, a very little, of KALKBRENNER. This does not apply, however, to the Scherzo, which was wild, stormy, restless Chopin throughout—nor hardly to the commencement of the finale. The Adagio disappointed me; it was entirely devoid of that deeply romantic spirit which pervades all the composer's similar compositions, and was decidedly uninteresting.

The singing I regret to say, was, as is too often the case in these entertainments, the weakest part. Mrs. BRINCKERHOFF, whose voice is quite fine in its upper notes, but who sings too much from her palate and has very little school, rendered WEBER's "Und ob die Wolke," with tolerable precision and feeling; but gave us, for her first piece, a most common-place song: "The Tear." Why choose this song, when there were so many of MENDELSSOHN's or SCHUBERT's, to say nothing of other composers, to choose from? Whose the fault?

PHILADELPHIA, NOV. 9.—Do not start when I tell you that the Union is dissolved! for I mean the Musical Union. There were three; an agreeable tetra-chord, but it was soon found that there was a superfluous third that disturbed their harmony; therefore the three became two at the expense of the Composer of "Kathleen Mavourneen." Yes, the sad truth is that the C. K. M. has accepted an invitation to retire into private life, and that the remaining concerts will be given by Ireland and Germany, in other words by Messrs THUNDER and ROHR, who announce the Stabat Mater of ROSSINI for the eleventh of December.

The Twelfth Mass was sung on the 13th inst. at Concert Hall, previous to the breaking up of the Union, and was listened to by a good audience. A few flower pots in front of the organ, apologized for the absence of the screen, and stood as a sign-board for the amateurs who sang the solos, so I am tongue-tied for the second time; I flattered myself that the horticultural show was for the purpose of shutting 'Veritas' up. I am very willing to praise, where praise is deserved, and am ready to praise the performance of the Mass, sincerely. The piece worst sung was the only one honored with an encore,—the fugue: Cum Sancto Spiritu; it was fairly done on the repeat, but was bad at first, the middle portion being weak and confused; it was taken too slowly by the conductor, Mr. ROHR. The Benedictus was sung complete; it is always curtailed in the Catholic church, as it is too long for the service at the altar. The chorus sang with correctness and in tune, but now and then the time was neglected. The distinctness with which the words could be heard, was something new in a chorus performance. It was an error not to repeat the Mass, as it drew a better house than "Joseph" did, either night, and pleased more generally.

The Stabat Mater is to be given at the Musical Fund Hall with orchestra, to ensure a full attendance.

No announcement has been made by the Harmonia for that Society's next concert, and so, I suppose, it will be one of their old fashioned miscellaneous concerts, one half sacred, and one half secular,—for this, read opera.

GOTTSCALK played on Thursday night for a concert given by J. S. BLACK, formerly an agent of the New York Musical World, and was warmly applauded in his different pieces. He is the best pianist of the hammer-and-tongs school since DE MEYER. The vocalists at this concert, were from New York; perhaps, as they were volunteers, they should not be criticized, so I will only say that they were both very indifferent. Mr. Black, who is a bass singer himself, did not perform, but rolled the pianos about, and made himself useful in that way. The room was good; at least two thirds filled.

The next musical treat is to be a classical soirée at the Assembly Buildings, given by one of our oldest professors, Mr. CHARLES HUFFELD, for the improvement of his pupils. It is the first of a subscription series.

COLLINS was here last week at Concert Hall, with his company of singers; success only moderate. The Pyne troupe has postponed its visit until the 29th. Miss LOUISA PYNE has many warm friends here, and admirers by the thousand.

VERITAS.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, NOV. 24, 1855.

Handel's "Solomon."

[Concluded.]

The Second Part begins and ends with a grand chorus, the first of which (From the censor, &c.) we have already noticed. All between is dramatic, a, for this day at least, somewhat tedious stretch of recitative, song, trio and duet. Solomon, in a page of recitative, ascribes the praise of wisdom, which has just been sung to him, to God, and "bows enraptured to the King of Kings," alluding also to some of his stern acts of justice. This leads in a lovely song of praise, perhaps the best of all the airs in the part of Solomon, a flowing Larghetto, in G minor, with a mellow sunset tone of quiet, blissful, thankful feeling:

When the sun o'er yonder hills,
Pours in tides the golden day,
Or when quivering o'er the hills
In the West he dies away—
He shall ever hear me sing
Praises to th' eternal King.

The triplets into which the three-four melody divides as he rapturously repeats "he shall ever, ever hear me sing," are full of fervor and of beauty. This pious resolution is commended by a Levite, who intervenes here for the first time, and after a brief recitative, sings a spirited bass air (Nos. 26-7), in A minor, common time, quite a patriotic sounding melody, to the words:

Thrice blest that wise, discerning king,
Who can each passion tame;
And mounts on virtue's eagle wing,
To everlasting fame.
Such shall a mighty pattern stand
To ages yet unborn;
To honor prompt each distant land,
And future times adorn.

You will readily imagine that Handel's melody does "mount on eagle wing," and that this bass voice vigorously scales up through its whole compass, from its lowest depth, to reach those heights of "everlasting fame," and that there are plenty of old-fashioned, long-spun roulades, when the word "everlasting" last occurs. The only fault of the song is its length, which would not be felt, however, were it the only song, since the development of the melody is really interesting and not a monotonous protracting of one thought. With richer accompaniment it would be highly effective.

No. 28 opens the long dramatic scene of the two women claiming the same infant. Ushered in by an attendant (tenor recitative, here given to Zadoc), the first, the real mother recites her wrong. Song after this would seem unnecessary, but Handel has improved the situation to introduce a lengthy Trio, (No. 29), in which the first woman begins to plead, with simple pathos, and as she grows more earnest, repeating: "my cause is just, be thou my friend, she is cut short by the second woman: False is all her melting tale, in a vixen and accusing strain; these two characteristically distinct melodies are then mingled and alternated piecemeal, while Justice holds the lifted scale, in a long-drawn note, now on the key-note (A), and now on the dominant, in the low baritone of Solomon, who simply reiterates these words, by way of fundamental bass, as it were, to the Trio.

No. 30. Recitative. After hearing the second claimant, Solomon pronounces judgment: Divide the babe. And then breaks in the strangest air—more strange than interesting, though there is no telling what a great dramatic singer might make of it,—in which the second woman exults after the following amiable and motherly manner:

Thy sentence, great king, is prudent and wise,
And my hopes, on the wing, bound quick for the prize;
Contented I hear and approve the decree,
For at least I shall tear the lov'd infant from thee!

The sneering, syncopated melody, choking as it were with hate, and always with contrary accent to the bass accompaniment, has reference, we suppose, to the amiable state of mind of the singer; but it wants more instrumental background, and a little of that tigress stinging tone and action of RACHEL to render it effective. Here are the first notes, which we give as a curiosity; the words are to the king, but the music, the real meaning of them, is addressed to the other woman:

Quite in contrast with this is the air of the real mother, who hereby proves herself such, singing (to odd words enough), after springing forward to "withhold the executing hand":

Can I see my infant go'd
With the fierce, relentless sword?
Can I see him yield his breath,
Smiling at the hand of death;
And behold the purple tides
Gushing down his tender sides?
Rather be my hopes beguiled,
Take thou all, but spare my child.

It is really a song of great dramatic capabilities, and the closing phrases: spare my child, may be conceived of being sung so as to be full of pathos. No. 34, a recitative by Solomon, is of course necessary to set all right again, by giving virtue its reward. And by this time we may fancy that our audience has got pretty well weary of so long a stretch of solos, all so much after the old Italian cut, and destitute of all the stimulating richness of the modern orchestration. The truth is, this old melody, (that is the average of it, sung by average voices), though one may find meaning and character in it all, has a monotony to most ears, about as great as that experienced in reading those old conventional classic dramas of Corneille and Racine,—not that these are for a moment to be mentioned in the scale of greatness with a genius like our Handel. They need some rare Rachel of a singer to create them anew and bring out their meaning. The beautiful songs of the "Messiah" and some others are more agreeable, or have become so by frequent hearing, and through great singers. Besides they are incomparably finer. The songs of "Solomon" are by no means the best of Handel. It is the choruses which save the work; the life of it resides in them. Massive, elaborate and complex as they are, nobody fails to understand them, nobody listens to them with a vacant mind. The charm of personality, which makes solos and duets so popular, is outworn in these songs, and we await each chorus like refreshing rain in drought.

Our Handel and Haydn Society therefore do well to omit Nos. 35-40, including: a duet between Solomon and the mother; a chorus: From the east unto the west, who so wise as Solomon?; an aria in extenso for tenor, in which Zadoc, in such majestic, florid melody as you can fancy, compares Solomon to "the tall palm, its towering branches curling spread;" and a simple pastoral air by the first woman, about how: Every shepherd sings his maid, Beneath the vine or fig-tree's shade, which would seem more in place in one of his early love operas; and come directly to the chorus closing the Second Part:

Swell, swell the full chorus to Solomon's praise,
Record him, ye bards, as the pride of our days—
Flow sweetly the numbers that dwell in his name,
And rouse the whole nation in songs to his fame.

This chorus, like the opening one of this part, is in D major. Allegro, 6-4 measure; bold, triumphal, in plain harmony, without fugue, but full of grandeur. The last lines: Flow sweetly, &c., make a smoother episode, in 3-4 measure, with a running violin accompaniment, which soon imparts its movement to the bass voices, afterwards responded to by other voices, and after this smooth, gentle sprinkling of harmony, the bolder original movement returns.

Part III opens with an instrumental Symphony, of some length, in broad even-flowing 4-4 rhythm, without fugue, full and strong and joyous, with the usual Handelian quavering figures for the violins, strong up-buoying basses, relieved at intervals by bits of pastoral duet, in reedy thirds, by the hautboys. This by way of prelude to the visit of the Queen of Sheba. Recitative No. 43.

Queen.—From Arabia's spicy shores,
Bounded by the hoary main,
Sheba's queen these seats explores,
To be taught thy heavenly strain—

Solomon.—Thrice welcome Queen! with open arms
Our court receives thee and thy charms.
The temple of the Lord first meets your eyes,
Rich with the well accepted sacrifice;
Here all our treasure free behold,
Where cedars lie o'erwrought with gold;
Next view a mansion fit for kings to own
Surnamed the forest of high Lebanon;
Where Art her utmost skill displays,
And every object claims your praise.

AIR. [No. 44.]

Queen.—Every sight these eyes behold,
Does a different charm unfold;
Flashing gems and sculptured gold,
Still attract my ravished sight—

But to hear fair truth distilling
In expression choice and thrilling
From that tongue so soft and thrilling,—
That my soul does most delight.

The "choice expression" of those last four lines is pruned away in our performance. For shortness the first part only of the melody, which is in G minor, and of not a little beauty, is sung without the major strain before the conclusion. And now comes one of the most interesting portions of the Oratorio:

Nos. 45-51. The monarch calls upon his court musicians to Sweep, sweep the string, to sooth the royal fair,

And rouse each passion with th'alternate air.

And then follow a series of four choruses, of contrasted expression, illustrating the power of music in rousing or soothing the various passions. First a sweetly, richly flowing one in G, 3-8 time, the theme being first sung as solo by Solomon:

Music, spread thy voice around,
Sweetly flow the lulling sound.

Then he sings:

Now a different measure try,
Shake the dome and pierce the sky,
Rouse us next to martial deeds,
Clanging arms and neighing steeds
Seem in fury to oppose,
Now the hard fought battle glows.

Which words are immediately taken up in double chorus, with the same martial accompaniment, in D of course. The full chords have the quick and stately tramp of armies. At the idea of the "hard-fought battle" and the "clanging arms and neighing steeds," the instrumental masses echo each other with more animation, and the voice-parts tread upon each other's heels in uttering the same strong phrases, till the mind is filled with a bewildering yet harmonious image of general onslaught and confusion. The trumpets of course are not idle. The third is one of the finest and most impressive of Handel's choruses, although a short one. We quit the general battle for the sorrows of the private breast. The words are:

Draw the tear from hopeless love,
Lengthen out the solemn air,
Full of death and wild despair.

It is in G minor, a Largo movement, for five voices (there being two sopranos), and as these roll in like wave upon wave at first, you are reminded somewhat of Behold the Lamb in the "Messiah." The union of all the voices on the tonic chord at Lengthen out the solemn air, with the long swell on the word air, is sublime, and the abrupt modulations, diminished sevenths, &c., at Full of death and wild despair, have the romantic character of modern music, and almost make one shudder.—Finally, "to release the tortured soul," we have the air and chorus, in E flat:

Thus rolling surges rise
And plough the troubled main,
But soon the tempest dies
And all is calm again.

Also a chorus for five voices, in one or another of which the rolling surge continually resounds with right hearty Handelian gusto.

No. 52-3. Recitative by the Queen of Sheba: Thy harmony's divine, great king, and so on, in admiring strain, whereat the Levite, like Chorus in Greek tragedies, chimes in with another bass air, in admiration of both. Pious king and virtuous queen,—an air after the usual pattern, now quavering through several bars on the first syllable of glory, and now holding it at even height for the same space.

No. 54. Recitative and Air for tenor. Zadoc celebrates the splendors of the temple, and sings a melody ingeniously wedded to the following words, with instrumental figures corresponding:

Golden columns fair and bright,
Catch the mortals' ravis'd sight;
Round their sides ambitions twine,
Tendrils of the clasping vine,
Cherubim stand there displayed,
O'er the ark their wings are laid;
Every object swells with state,
All is pious, all is great.

No. 56 is another double chorus, in D, of the most magnificent character: Praise the Lord with harp and tongue, which might close the whole, sublimely enough, and without any sacrifice of unity or completeness of the subject. But Handel, writing for Englishmen, famous for strong stomachs and long programmes, must give heaped measure, and so Solomon must sing of "green pastures" and all the outward signs of his most blessed and prosperous reign, which we omit, together with the recitative, which should be very popular: Gold now is common! and the Queen must pray that peace may ever dwell in Salem, and sing a slow and florid air, with obligato flute and otherwise elaborate accompaniment:

Will the sun forget to streak
Eastern skies with amber ray?
When the dusky shades do break,
He unbars the gates of day,
Then demand if Sheba's queen
E'er can banish from her thought
All the splendor she has seen,
All the knowledge thou hast taught.

There is leave-taking, too, and a duet between Solomon and Sheba, which we omit, and now we have really reached the finale in the double chorus:

The name of the wicked shall quickly be past,
But the fame of the just shall eternally last.

A chorus which by no means caps the climax upon the preceding choruses, but is in fact less interesting than most of them, although there is something quite impressive in those little short ejaculations, with pauses between, of the syllables "shall quickly"—"be past." Another good reason for terminating the oratorio with the preceding grander chorus, No. 56.

As a whole we may speak of "Solomon" as an oratorio which contains much of Handel's best music, but too long, wanting in unity, and unusually overloaded with long level stretches of those conventional and ornate solos, which it requires the best of singers to lift into light and interest. The choruses are indeed wonderfully fine, and touch such various chords of human feeling, that they might furnish a complete enough entertainment of themselves. The oratorio as here given is curtailed one third. Why not curtail it still more? Why not abandon its dramatic plan entirely, and retaining only a few of the best solos, just enough to connect the choruses together, or rather to separate the mountains by valleys, reduce it to enjoyable proportions? Handel is himself in choruses, unlike, beyond all others; not always so in his songs. The fashion of their day, which is dross, cleaves to them; and though there be rich ore in the mass of them, it can hardly be apparent to the general listener, at least through uninspired interpreters.

CONCERTS.

I. HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY. The first performance of "Solomon" last Sunday evening was certainly a success, save that the oratorio proved too long—a fault which will be remedied, we understand, to-morrow night, by a still further reduction of the recitatives and airs. Having spoken at such length of the piece itself, we must be brief respecting the performance. The audience nearly filled the Music Hall, the chorus seats were full—over two hundred singers,—the orchestra on the scale of four first and four second violins; and as the conductor, ZERN, took the stand, after a fine organ voluntary by MUELLER, there was a general look of eager expectation.

The overture was played extremely well, and indeed all the accompaniments were as effective as they well could be without the addition of modern instrumentation. The choruses were sung with precision, fair balance of parts, rich and full ensemble of tone, and plenty of spirit, bearing ample testimony to Mr. Zerrahn's thorough training. The more grand and splendid choruses especially, were well done, and the answers in the fugue parts taken up promptly and distinctly. There was room, however, for more light and shade. In that Nightingale chorus the pianissimo should have predominated; the words suggest it, and there was opportunity for the finest of choral effects, a broad mass of sound of many voices subdued to a whisper. Considering, too, the loudness and grandeur of most of the other choruses, it would have furnished contrast and relief.

Turning to the solos, the parts of the two queens were taken by Mrs. LEACH (late Mrs. GEORGINA STUART), a favorite soprano in the concerts of New York. She has a silvery, even, flexible voice of large compass, without any very decided character of tone, but sweet and musical, and cultivated to a very clear and easy execution of the florid, trying melody of Handel. Mrs. REED and Mrs. HILL represented the two women. The former has an agreeable, penetrating soprano, and sang the music with some feeling, but with a tendency to drag, which made what should be pathos seem sometimes like feeble sentimentality. Mrs. HILL has improved since we heard her last, and rendered her part truly and effectively, considering the rather ungracious character of the music. This was still more to be considered with regard to the solos for male voices. Mr. G. W. PRATT, our young townsman, recently from Leipsic, took the part of Solomon. He has a strong baritone, particularly rich and telling in its upper notes, and despite a little hardness and heaviness in the carriage of his tone, delivers his music in a correct, well sustained, clear manner. He has the great virtue of distinct articulation, and has studied well the art of recitative, though he might learn a grace or two, of lightness, elasticity and delicacy, from two such tasteful singers of the English school as Mr. LEACH and Mr. ARTHURSON. The former, new to us here, sang the two airs in the character of the Levite, with admirable taste and finished style. His bass is not ponderous, but musical and clear and flexible. Of Mr. ARTHURSON, as Zadock, there is scarcely need to speak. He is the model, among our present singers, in the delivery of Handel's music, especially the recitative. Style and expression make up for any want of power in his singularly sweet and musical tenor. He touches those old melodic forms and phrases, and at once they lose their sameness, and acquire the electric delicacy of life. In a succession of such solos it is commonly a relief when his turn comes. In his singing you could see the "columns fair and bright."

II. MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—The first Chamber Concert, Tuesday evening, was an auspicious opening of the seventh season. It has really got to be an institution with us. The night was fair; the audience large and eager and appreciative; the Chickering saloon pleasant as ever; the Club (let us name them all: AUGUST FRIES, CARL MEISEL, GUSTAV KREBS, THOMAS RYAN and WULF FRIES,) in good spirits, well prepared; the programme fine and just long enough, to wit:

- PART I.
1. Quartet in G, No. 1, (first time), Mozart.
2. Second Piano Trio, in C minor, Mendelssohn.
Messrs. DRESEL, A. & W. FRIES.

- PART II.
3. Andante Pastorale from Clarinet Concerto, No. 2, Crusell.
THOMAS RYAN.
4. Piano Solos: Chopin — Mendelssohn.
OTTO DRESEL.
5. First Quintet, in E flat, op. 4, Beethoven.

The Quartet in G, which we never heard before, is a cheerful, genial, charming specimen of MOZART, alike admirable for scientific mastery of four-part development of themes, for pure, abstract quartet character, and for free spontaneous expression. If not one of the greatest, it is one of the most genuine, pleasing and wholesome fruits of his fine genius. It was beautifully played, with good accent, light and shade, and smoothness in all the parts.—We have scarcely ever heard Mr. DRESEL to better advantage in a public effort. He played the MENDELSSOHN Trio with such fire and verve and delicacy, such expression and careful proportioning of all its lights and shades, and withal so con amore, that, well seconded as he was, the beauties of the work became more alive to us than ever before. He seemed more self-possessed and quiet in his strength than formerly. The light, fairy Scherzo, was exquisitely played.

The Andante for Clarinet was a charming bit of relief, short and sweet, not trivial, and played in a most rich, delicious tone, by Mr. RYAN. The smaller pieces selected by Mr. DRESEL were two which he was always fond of playing: the exquisite Adagio from one of CHOPIN's Concertos, which was again much admired, although we have heard him thrice through its flowery mazes with a finer delicacy of finger,—the reason being, doubtless, that the piano this time, being an exceedingly brilliant one for larger uses, was less suited to a soft and delicate touch;—secondly, the bright little "Spring Song" of Mendelssohn, which he has his own way, not an uninteresting one, of humoring. It was a rare treat to hear the poetry of the piano-forte again.

The Quintet of BEETHOVEN, of course, was glorious. It was a smoother performance than we have had in past years, but lacked perhaps a little more of fire,—or was it that the listening brain was dulled by long sitting in the furnace-heated room?

III. ARTISAN'S RECREATIVE UNION.—A severe storm on Wednesday deprived many hundreds of the pleasure and instruction of Mr. J. Q. WETHERBEE's historical illustrations of Operatic Melody. By the sprinkling of people in the Music Hall they were highly relished. The entertainment was partly lecture, partly song. But the spoken parts were merely brief connecting links, historical and critical, between the vocal illustrations, which covered, of course at rare intervals, the whole history of the Opera, from its origin about the year 1600 to the present day. Specimens were explained and sung, in the lecturer's rich and finely cultivated bass voice, from Monteverde, Galuppi, Handel, Sarti, Mozart, Weber, Rossini, Donizetti, Meyerbeer and Verdi. Of course, in one evening, and within the limits of a bass voice, there were more names left out than given. GLUCK especially seemed to demand a place.

We were sorry to lose the specimen from the first printed opera, by Monteverde. As we entered, the singer was in the midst of Handel's rousades, in which he is skilled. A sweet and quiet melody by Sarti was sung with chaste expression. But the comic song of Mozart's harem-keeper, from Il Seraglio, gave unusual delight and had to be repeated.—The dark song of Caspar from the Freyshütz contrasted well with Rossini's Largo al factotum. Of Verdi he sang a drinking song, new to us: Mescelemi il vino, and with fine effect. The piano accompaniments were by Mr. H. S. MAY. Mr. Wetherbee's pertinent and modest connecting remarks were in rather too colloquial a tone to be heard well in the great hall. We trust he will give our public further opportunities of learning a little of the history of music in so agreeable a way.

Need we remind our readers of the first ORCHESTRAL CONCERT in the Music Hall to-night? All the omens appear favorable. A richer programme or a completer orchestra we never had. One change has been necessitated in the vocal selections, owing to unexpected difficulty in procuring in season the orchestral parts for the duet from "Tell," before announced. It will be good, however, for another concert. On Monday evening, the MUSICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY commence their annual series of five concerts in the Meionaeon. The programme, similar to those of the last two years, contains choruses from "Jephtha" and the "Messiah," with songs, duets, &c., by Mrs. HILL, Miss TIBBETTS, and Mr. ARTHURSON. Mr. ZERRAHN is their conductor, and MUELLER pianist. These concerts have proved very attractive. They will give the "Messiah" on Christmas night. The "Messiah" is also to be given by the MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY, who after vain negotiations with the other societies about a combined performance, have taken time by the forelock and selected Sunday evening, Dec. 9th, for the purpose. They have a capital quartet of solos in Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS, Mrs. LONG, Mr. ARTHURSON and Mr. WETHERBEE.

CHURCH ORGANS. COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

WM. B. D. SIMMONS, Organ Builder,
(Heretofore doing business in the style of Wm. B. D. SIMMONS & Co.) and

GEORGE FISHER,

Of Cambridge, have this day formed a Copartnership for continuing the manufacture of Church Organs.

We design to keep in our Warerooms New Instruments for sale at prices from $400 to $1,500 each, and are prepared to build by contract at the shortest notice. Organs, worth from $600 to $12,000. And by prompt and faithful execution of orders hope to merit a like encouragement to that heretofore extended to Wm. B. D. SIMMONS, and which has indicated the necessity of this business connection, that his entire attention may be devoted to the more difficult and artistic parts of the business, so that an increase thereof may cause no diminution of the personal attention which is requisite for the maintenance of the CHARACTER of our Instruments, upon which we rely for success.

While it will be our aim and ambition to furnish ORGANS of a PERFECTION OF TONE and MECHANISM, AND OF AN ELEGANCE of EXTERIOR UNPARALLELED, we are confident of ability to offer terms MORE FAVORABLE THAN CAN BE OBTAINED ELSEWHERE, for the following reasons: Having ample means, we can purchase in large quantities at first cost, for cash; can always command the most talented assistants, and also do sufficient business to practice division of labor, which, by assigning parts to workmen skilled in their particular branch, necessarily insures better work at less expense. Our Manufactory, by its proximity to Charles River, enables us to receive lumber direct from the vessel at first cost, and having been erected expressly for the business, is in arrangement, also, convenience and its facilities unequalled, being furnished with steam engine, steam-heated drying-house, planing, grooving, matching, moulding, tenoning, boring, and other machines, together with lathe, scroll, circular and other saws, &c., all operated by steam power.

These facilities are such as are possessed by no other manufacturer of Organs in this country, and of themselves would enable us to furnish instruments, with a fair profit, at a price which those of like quality must cost builders who have work done by hand that can be better executed at half the cost by steam machinery.

Second hand Organs at all times for sale.
Orders for tuning church organs promptly attended to, and contracts taken for tuning by the year.
Orders respectfully solicited.

FIRST PREMIUM MELODEONS, The Very Best now Manufactured.

S. D. & H. W. SMITH respectfully call the attention of the public to their IMPROVED MELODEONS, constantly on exhibition at their Warerooms,

No. 417 Washington Street.

By means of a new method of voicing, known only to themselves, they have succeeded in removing the harsh and buzzing sound which formerly characterized the instrument, rendering the tones full, clear and organ-like. The action is prompt and reliable, enabling the performer to execute the most rapid music without obscuring the tones. The swell is arranged to give great expression.

The manufacturers received the First Premium, over all competitors, at the Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association; also at the Metropolitan Mechanics' Fair, held at Washington, D. C.

For the Parlor, instruments are furnished at prices varying from $45 to $150.

Larger instruments, with two banks of keys, for chapels and small churches, from $150 to $300.

This last instrument, known as the ORGAN HARMONIUM, has been essentially improved by Messrs. Smith, and they have secured a patent therefor.

Persons who wish to hire Melodeons with a view of purchasing at the end of the year, can have the rents credited as part payment of the purchase money.

Chat with Rossini.

BY FERDINAND HILLER.

Translated for this Journal from the Zeitung of Cologne.

II.

—These journalists! exclaimed ROSSINI, one day. Here has one of them been printing how, when I left Paris recently, I manifested almost as great an aversion to the railroad as to German music! What do they mean by that?

—That you would travel a great deal by railroad, dear maestro, were that true, I answered.

—Not only do I love the great German masters; I have made them my especial study in my earliest youth, and have let no opportunity go by to learn to know them more and more. How much delight you have already afforded me through the performance of BACH's compositions!

—I have never played his noble piano pieces with more pleasure, than when I was able to play them before you.

—What a colossal nature, this Bach! In such a style to write this mass of compositions! It is incomprehensible. What to others was hard, nay, impossible, was mere play to him. How is it about that fine edition of his works? I first heard of it through a family from Leipzig, who visited me in Florence, and probably through their mediation two of the volumes came to me. But I should like to have the following ones.

—Nothing is easier. You must subscribe.

—With all my heart!

—Your name among the members of the Bach society—that would be too good!

—Bach's portrait in the first volume is splendid, resumed ROSSINI; there is an extraordinary intellectual power expressed in it. Bach must have also been an eminent virtuoso.

—The most important composers of the present day are happy, when they have learned to play some of his pieces well—he improvised such, said I.

—The like of him is seldom born. Do you bring out many of his works in Germany?

—Not so many as we should—but yet a good many.

—Alas! such a thing is not possible in Italy, and less than ever now, complained ROSSINI. We cannot, as you do in Germany, collect great choirs of amateurs. Formerly we had good vocal forces in churches and chapels—that is all lost. Even in the Sixtine chapel, since the death of BAINI, things have continually retrograded. Apropos, how stands it with the controversy about the genuineness of MOZART's Requiem? Have they arrived, of late, at any sure results?

—No further than you already know.

—No other man but Mozart made that Confutatio, at all events, exclaimed the maestro, singing over the beginning. That is magnificent! And the sotto voce at the end! Those modulations! I always had a special partiality for the sotto voce in chorus—but in this one, whenever I have heard it, I felt the icy chill creep down my back.—Pauvre Mozart!

—In a certain Biography, which concerns you particularly, it is stated that Mozart hardly ever laughed three times in his life. What say you to such nonsense? There are several things said there which you must explain to me. Is it true, for instance, that you asked your old teacher, the padre MATTEI, a short time since, whether you yet knew enough to write an opera, and upon his answering in the affirmative, that you got up and walked away?

—Nothing could be less true! I had studied three years at the Lyceum in Bologna, during which time, however, I had to do my utmost to pay for my instruction and support my parents. I succeeded, but it was in a pretty beggarly manner. I accompanied the recitative at the piano at the theatre, and got six paoli a night for it. I had a fine voice, and sang in the churches. Also I composed, besides the exercises which Mattei gave me, here and there a profane piece for a singer to introduce into an opera or sing in a concert; for example, for ZAMBONI and others, who gave me a trifle for the service. Now when I had toiled through Counterpoint and Fugue, I asked Mattei what he would set before me next. The Plain Chant and Canon was the reply. How much time shall I have to spend on them? About two years. But I was not able to keep on so long, and that I explained to the good Padre, who understood the case very well, and always remained attached to me. I myself have lamented, often enough since, that I had not labored longer under his care.

—You were able to make your way through, even without the canon, said I, laughing. Was Mattei a very able teacher?

—He was excellent with the pen in his hand—his corrections were exceedingly instructive. But he was terribly monosyllabic, and every oral elucidation had almost to be torn from him by force.—Have you seen any of his compositions?

—I have never come across anything of his.

—If you are ever again in Bologna, do not fail to take a look into them at the Lyceum. They are only church music, and the solo passages are not remarkable; but the pleni, as we Italians call it, are excellent.

—I must come back to your youthful days, dear maestro. You certainly composed much before you came under the tuition of Mattei?

—A whole opera, Demetrio e Polibio, which in the series of my works has always been named later, replied ROSSINI, because it was first publicly performed, after some other dramatic attempts, four or five years after it was written. I composed it originally for the Mombelli family, without ever knowing that it was an opera. When I had begun my studies with Mattei, I was unable, during the first months, to bring any thing more to pass; I trembled at every bass note, and every middle part gave me a little shudder. Afterwards I recovered my early confidence.

—That was very fortunate. Had you begun already in Pesaro to learn music?

—I had left Pesaro in my earliest childhood. My father held the situation there in the Commune of town-trumpeter, he played the horn in the theatre, and all that went on decently enough until the arrival of the French, when he lost his place. My mother, who had a fine voice, availed herself of it to help us out of trouble, and so we left Pesaro.—The poor mother! She was not without talent, although she did not know a note. She sang as orecchiante, as we call it; that is, altogether by ear. I may say, en passant, the same is the case with eighty out of a hundred Italian singers.

—That is inconceivable!

—It is strange. To learn to warble a cavatina after another seems an easy affair; but how these people go to work to learn by heart the middle parts in ensemble pieces, is to me quite a puzzle.

—They must be either very musical or very unmusical; but pray, let us come back to yourself, said I, a little impatiently. Where did you begin to learn music?

—At Bologna.

—And with whom?

—A certain PRINETTI, of Novara, gave me instruction on the Spinnet. He was a remarkable fellow. He manufactured some sort of liqueur, gave a few music lessons, and so worked his way along. He never owned a bed—he slept standing.

—What, standing? You joke, maestro.

—It is precisely as I tell you. At night he wrapped himself up in his mantle, leaned against some corner of an arcade, and so went to sleep. The watchmen knew him and did not disturb him. Then he came at a very early hour to me, pulled me out of bed, which I did not relish much, and set me to playing. Sometimes he had not rested sufficiently, and slept while I worked away upon the spinet, all the while standing. I took advantage of the opportunity, and crept back into my feather bed. When he woke up and sought me there again, he was pacified by my assurance that I had played my piece through without mistakes during his slumber. His method was not exactly the most modern; thus, for example, he made me play the scale with the thumb and the forefinger only.

—That seems to have hurt you quite as little as your neglect of the canon. But who, besides him, were your first teachers?

—A certain ANGELO TESEI taught me how to play figured bass, l'accompagnamento, and exercised me in solfeggi. A tenor, formerly of some note, BABINI, gave me the higher instructions in singing.

—You had a charming voice?

—I sang quite finely as a boy. At that time I went once upon the stage and performed the boy's part in the Camilla of PAER. But I did not get beyond that.

—Were any other notable artists among your schoolmates at the Lyceum? I inquired.

—The first year which I passed there was the last year of MORLACCHI's studies, and my third year was the first year of DONIZETTI.

—I thought that DONIZETTI was a pupil of SIMON MAIR.

—He had made all sorts of attempts with him, but he received his real musical culture in Bologna. And that he learned something clever, no one will deny.

—Certainly not. But you must tell me a little more of your earliest youth time, dear maestro.—I am not easily satisfied in such things.

—Another time, caro Ferdinando. There comes my wife; it is our dinner time. After dinner let us smoke a cigar together!

Life of John Sebastian Bach;

WITH A CRITICAL VIEW OF HIS COMPOSITIONS, BY J. N. FÖRKL.

What has hitherto been said refers chiefly to Bach's compositions for the clavichord and organ; but now perhaps the reader may like to hear a few remarks as to his vocal works. It was at Weimar he first found occasion to try his powers on vocal composition. Here he was appointed leader of the band, and as such it was his province to furnish church music for the court chapel. The style of his church music, like that of his organ pieces, was solemn, devout, and such in every respect as church music should be. He also adopted the very right principle of not studying the effect of single words, which is indeed but mere trifling, but sought to give the expression of the whole. His chorusses are throughout magnificent and solemn. He often formed them by choosing a choral melody, and making the other parts accompany in fugues after the manner of motets. They have the same richness of harmony as his other works, only adapted to suit the vocal parts and instrumental accompaniments. His recitative is musical declamation provided with rich basses. In his airs, many of which are full of expressive melody, he seemed to have been shackled by the necessity of conforming to the abilities of the performers, who, nevertheless, made ceaseless complaints of their difficulty. If he had been so fortunate as to have had more able performers of his church music, it would have certainly left deeper impressions of its excellence, and have been like his other works still used and admired. The exhaustless stores of Art which they contain would have been thought worthy of longer preservation. Among many occasional pieces which he composed at Leipsic, I must mention two—one of which was performed at Coethen at the interment of his beloved Prince Leopold, the other at St. Paul's church at Leipsic at the funeral sermon, on the death of Christiana Eberhardine, Queen of Poland and Electress of Saxony. The former contains choruses of great magnificence, and of the most touching expression; the latter has only single chorusses, but they are so charming that he who begins to play one of them will never get up till he has finished it. It was written October 1727. Besides these Bach composed a great many motets, principally for the choir of St. Thomas's school at Leipsic. This choir consisted of fifty singers and sometimes more, for whose musical improvement Bach provided like a father, and gave them such constant practice in motets, for one, two, and more voices, that in time they became both good and correct choir singers. Among them, motets for two chorusses, written with this intent, which surpass everything of this kind in richness of harmony and melody, and also in life and spirit; but like all Bach's works, or rather like all great and excellent works of Art, they are difficult of execution, and must, to produce their due effect, be performed by a full orchestra. These are the most important of Bach's vocal compositions. For the inferior branch of Art contributing to social entertainment, he has done little or nothing; notwithstanding his friendly and sociable disposition. He is said, for instance, never to have composed a song. For this, however, a Bach was not wanted. These pleasing little productions of Art will never become extinct; Nature herself produces them, even without the plan of laborious culture.

CHAPTER VI.

There are many talented composers and clever amateurs of all instruments who are never the less incapable of teaching others what they know either theoretically or practically. Either they have not bestowed sufficient attention on the practice which developed their natural powers, or by dint of good teaching they have attained to a certain degree of technical ability without inquiring of their teacher why such and such things must be done in a certain manner and not otherwise. When such performers are well taught their practice may be very instructive to beginners, but they cannot impart instruction, properly so called. The tedious course of self-instruction, in which the student follows a thousand devious tracks ere he discover the right one, is perhaps the only method of forming a really good teacher. His frequent fruitless efforts and errors bring him gradually acquainted with all the resources of his art; he discovers every impediment to his advancement and learns how to avoid it. This method is the longest, it is true, but he who has the courage to pursue it, will, as the reward of his persevering toil, learn to attain his end by a means which will be more agreeable. All those who have founded a school of music of their own, have accomplished it by such fatiguing means. The new and more pleasing road was that which distinguished their school from others; and such and so distinguished was the school of Bach. He who knows much can alone teach much. He alone, who has made himself acquainted with dangers, and has himself attacked and overcome them, can successfully teach others how to avoid them. Bach did both; his teaching was in consequence the most instructive, sure, and beneficial that was ever known. All his pupils trod, in one or other branch of the art, in the footsteps of their great master, though none ever equalled, still less surpassed him. I will first speak of his instructions in playing. His first aim was to teach his pupils his own peculiar touch, of which we have before spoken. To this end he made them practice, for months together, nothing but simple passages for all the fingers of both hands, with constant attention to a clear and distinct touch. None could escape these exercises under some months constant practice, and it was his unalterable opinion that they should be continued from six months to twelve. But when he found, after some months, any one beginning to lose patience, he obligingly wrote for them little connected pieces in which these same exercises were combined together. Such were his "Six little Preludes for Beginners," and the "Fifteen two-part Inventions." Both were written down during the hours of teaching, in compliance with the momentary want of the scholar, but he afterwards improved them into beautiful and expressive compositions. With this exercise of the fingers, in either single passages or in little compositions of the same kind, he combined the practice of ornaments and graces with both hands. After this he immediately gave his scholars his greater works, whereon to exercise their strength. And to lessen their difficulties, it was his system to play through to them the piece they were about to study, saying, "This is the style," a system combining many advantages. If by hearing a piece played through with its true character the zeal and inclination of the pupil are awakened, this would be in itself no small advantage; but by giving him at once an idea of what the piece ought to be, and what he has to aim at, the advantage is greater still. The understanding is brought into play, and the fingers act much better under its direction than they could do without it; and many a young performer, who, without this aid, would scarcely know how to make sense of such a piece at the end of a year's practice, would learn it very easily in a month, if having it played to him he had been at once enabled to acquire a just idea of its style and character.

Bach's plan of teaching composition was equally excellent and successful. He did not commence with the dry, unnecessary counterpoints, as did other masters of his time, neither did he hinder his scholars with calculations of the proportions of notes, which were in his opinion more useful to the theorist and instrument-maker than the composer. He proceeded at once to pure thorough bass in four parts, insisting particularly that these parts should be written out separately, as the best means of rendering the idea of the pure progression of the harmony evident to the learner. He then proceeded to choral melodies, or psalm tunes, to which he at first set the basses himself, leaving only to the pupils to invent the alto and tenor to them. By degrees he let them set the basses also. He constantly insisted, not only on the greatest degree of purity in the harmony itself, but also on natural connection, and flowing melody in all the parts. It is well known what models he himself produced of this kind; his middle parts are often so smooth and melodious that they might be used as upper parts; he made his pupils aim at the like excellencies in all their exercises, and till they had attained a great degree of perfection in them he did not suffer them to attempt inventions of their own. Their sense of purity, order, and connection in the parts must first have been tried on the inventions of others, and have become in a manner habitual to them, before he conceived them capable of applying these qualities to their compositions. He took it for granted that all his pupils were qualified to think musically, and those who had not this necessary qualification were sincerely and earnestly advised by him not to attempt composition. And accordingly he refrained from beginning with his sons, as well as any of his other pupils, in the study of composition till he had seen attempts of theirs, in which he thought he could espy this musical ability or genius. Then when the before mentioned preparations in harmony were ended, he took up the study of fugues, beginning with those in two parts, and so on. In all these exercises in composition he kept his pupils strictly so. 1st. To compose entirely from the mind, without the aid of an instrument, and those who wished to do otherwise, he termed, in ridicule, "Harpichord Knights." 2ndly. To pay constant attention, as well to the consistency of each single part, in and for itself, as with regard to its relation to the parts connected and concurrent with it. No part, not even a middle part, was allowed to break off before it had entirely and fully expressed all it had to express. Every note was required to have a connection with the preceding. If any one appeared of which it was not clearly evident whence it came, and to what it tended, it was summarily discarded as suspicious. This extreme degree of exactness in the arrangement of every single part, is precisely what marked Bach's harmony a manifold melody. The confusion of parts, by a note belonging to the tenor falling into the counter-tenor, or the reverse; the senseless falling in of several notes in simple harmonies, which, as if dropped from the sky, suddenly increase the number of the parts in a single passage, to vanish again in the next, and having no connection with the whole, is not to be found either in his own compositions or in those of his scholars. He looked upon his parts as persons forming a select company and conversing politely together. If there were three, each could in turn be silent and listen to the others, till he had again something apropos to say. But if in the midst of the most interesting part of the conversation, some uncalled for and importunate notes stepped forward, and attempted to say a word, or even a syllable without sense or propriety, Bach regarded this as a great irregularity, and taught his pupils to consider that it was not allowable.

Notwithstanding his strictness in this point, however, he in other respects, allowed his scholars great license. In the use of the intervals, in the turns of the melody and harmony he permitted them to do whatever they could and would, provided only they admitted nothing which could impair the musical euphony, and the perfectly just and unequivocal expression of the sense, for the sake of which all harmony is sought. As he himself attempted whatever was possible, so he liked to see his pupils do the same. Other teachers of composition before him, Berardi, Bononcini, and Fux, for instance, would not permit such liberties. They feared their pupils might get entangled in difficulties; but they thus, it is evident, prevented their learning to overcome difficulties. Bach's mode is therefore unquestionably better, and leads the pupil farther. Those who desire to become acquainted with Bach's method of teaching composition in its fullest extent, may find it duly explained in Kirnberger's "Kunst des reinen Satzes," or "Art of pure Composition." Lastly, as long as his scholars remained under his direction, he did not allow them to study, or even to become acquainted with any but classical works, except his own compositions. The understanding, through which alone we appreciate the really good, develops itself later than the feeling, and even this latter may be misled and vitiated by being frequently employed on inferior productions of Art. The best plan, therefore, in instructing youth is to accustom them betimes to what is excellent. The due appreciation of it comes in time, and their matured judgment confirms their early taste for none but the genuine works of Art.

How shall the Orchestra or Choir be Placed?

BERLIN, NOV. 2, 1855.

My Dear Dwight:—In your paper of Nov. 6, 1852, is an article from my pen, the text to which is the bad effect of the singing in the New York Tabernacle on the Sabbath, owing to the position of the singers' seats in respect to each other; rising as they do (or did then) at a very steep pitch, bringing the tenors and basses so high above the female voices that in most parts of the house there was positively no blending of the parts whatever. This led to some remarks upon the proper position of the members of an orchestra, or chorus, or of both, when meeting together in oratorio or other grand performance. Your correspondent, "Legato," two weeks later misunderstood me, and spoke of my "Scheme for making harmony depend upon the position of the seats." Now I said nothing about harmony, my subject having been the effect of harmony, or the blending of the instruments or voices from which proceed the different tones of which the composer forms his harmony.

I have never lost sight of this subject, and at all grand musical performances I pay special attention to the point, and that too after reading all I can find which will bear upon the subject in acoustical works and in the long series of English, American and German musical periodicals for the last sixty years. I have never, however, found an article which has this particular point for its topic; but all the laws which regulate the transmission, dispersion and reverberation of sound, bear more or less directly upon it, and lead us theoretically to the conclusion that the effect of a chorus, orchestra, or both combined, does depend, in some measure, upon the position in which the various singers and instruments stand to each other.

I shall not trouble you (at this time at all events) with the theoretical discussion of the matter, as I am devoting my fragments of time to the translation of a new and most admirable German work upon musical acoustics, in which a place, I hope, will be found for a discussion of this particular point by an eminent American scientific and mathematical scholar. I shall content myself now with some results of my observations.

The concert hall of the theatre in Berlin is the place where the royal orchestra give their famous "Sinfonie Soirées." I have also in the same place heard a vocal concert from STERN's Singing Society, and an instrumental concert by RUBINSTEIN. In this hall the main floor, the narrow gallery on three sides of the room and the broad gallery at one end are perfectly flat. The orchestra is ranged upon a perfectly flat platform, all one and the same floor, there being no rise at all from the first violin to the last trombone.

It follows that we, who sit back of the first row of seats in the broad gallery, never see the performers. We are more than paid; for such blending of all parts, brass, wood and strings, you never heard. That this is not entirely owing to the perfection of the artists engaged, is proved by the fact that this blending was almost as noticeable in Rubinstein's and Stern's picked up orchestras, and that it is not so excellent when the royal orchestra play in the opera house.

LIEBIG's orchestra, both at Hennig's garden and at Maeder's saloon, affords an excellent example to the point. Perhaps your printer can give these few lines, rudely representing the hall at Hennig's, or rather one end of it:

A, B and C are the three long rooms of the concert hall, side by side, and made into one by huge arched openings and doors. a and b are the level platform, elevated some four feet from the floor, upon which the orchestra is arranged. a seems to have been originally intended as the stage for small theatrical performances, as c c stand there partly partitioning a from b, as I have represented. Above a is a balcony d, or gallery.

Now the violins are ranged upon b each side of the director, extending quite across the stage, and the other strings as nearly in front as possible. The consequence is that the stringed quartet plays freely and directly into the hall. Behind, come first the reed and wood instruments, and back of all the brass and the drums. I promised not to go into theoretical considerations, so I will only say that the blending is remarkable, and the small body of violins, which this orchestra has, balances the rest of the orchestra far better than oftentimes double the number. In Maeder's Saloon, Liebig has a stage constructed precisely in the same manner. The hall is larger, much better constructed acoustically, and the melting of the brass, wood and strings into each other strikes every American as wonderful.

Now per contra. Our new "Orchester-Verein," under Stern, gives its concerts in a new hall much like Maeder's, but with no such recess. Consequently we have the orchestra ranged along against the wall at one end, with nothing to throw—to force the sound waves of the noisy instruments of the back row into and through the sound waves of the others. Though the number of violins is much larger than at Liebig's, they are much less prominent, and the balance not so good. But the effect of the orchestra as a whole, when accompanying the chorus or the solos in the vocal performances, is very fine. The chorus takes the front place, and the vocal tones of course come out into the hall full and fresh, only supported and inter-penetrated by the sounds from the instruments upon nearly the same level behind. Fortunately, I have had opportunity to renew nearly all the observations which I mentioned in my article three years ago. In the Cologne Cathedral, where I was so ravished last autumn with the mass, the singers' gallery is level, and the vocal and instrumental tones are all thrown out into the church in a single body. But one of the most decisive examples is one I formerly referred to, and which within a few weeks back I have had a chance of verifying. I refer to the Garrison church of this city. This edifice is perfectly rectangular, the length being to the width, I should judge, nearly as two to one. A broad gallery runs round of nearly equal width on the sides and at the ends. The difference of the ends is that the one containing the organ has a steep rise, while the other is in three levels, rising each some three feet above the other. The 'Messiah' was lately sung at the organ end. The female voices were low in front, and crushed by the weight of the men's voices above them. These in turn were almost crushed by the orchestra high above them, and the drums, trumpets and other loud instruments (MOZART's arrangement being used,) stood out from their lofty pedestal high and distinct from every thing else. The effect was abominable. At another oratorio last week the performers took the other end; it was bad enough in this respect, owing to the separation of the whole into several masses, but by no means so bad as before.

Now, last evening, the oratorio was in the Sing Akademie, and the same singers told a very different story.

In this hall the rise of the seats is very gradual.—The chorus, some 250 to 300, filled all the space up to the level platform. On this, Liebig's orchestra, with additional performers, was arranged in lines extending the entire width of the room, and occupying, with the strings and wood, the whole space. Behind the centre of the stage is a room, separated from the main hall by two superb Grecian columns, sustaining heavy curtains. On this occasion the curtains were removed, and, though there was, in fact, no want of space on the platform, yet all the trumpets, trombones, drums, and the like, were placed in this room. Though the work which was given us has little of HANDEL, HAYDN, or even MENDELSSOHN, in it, yet the perfection of the effect of the vocal and instrumental masses rendered it a very interesting concert. This carrying the brass into the space back is a new idea. Five years since an unlucky trombone or two and the trumpets used to have a place on the corner of the platform close by the wall, and every time they entered with their sonorous sounds, I shuddered—because they blended with nothing. It was always so in the old Metropolitan Hall in New York. From the concave wall behind the stage, away up above every body else, the brass used to roar you like any thing rather than Bottom's "sucking dove." All chorus singers know how much easier it is to sing when brought together on a level stage, or upon a floor, so that each feels the influence of the mingling and blending of the different parts and voices; all hearers, who have had opportunity to notice, will recollect also the improved effect when the chorus is thus arranged.

In the summer of 1849, I was present at the ceremony of baptizing the new halls of a Catholic church at Bonn. The choir, on this occasion, took its place in the church choir, in front of the grand altar, and the music of PALESTRINA, LASSO, and other ancient masters, never sounded to me more deliciously than on that occasion, when all came to the ear blended into one compact, harmonious mass.

Tuesday evening, in Mozart's "Idomeneus," the chorus numbered about seventy, and in one place in particular they were grouped together on one side of the stage, looking out upon the harbor of Sydonia, and singing of the stillness of the sea. Here again the blending of the voices was perfect; and, in general, a chorus, (that is, a chorus, and not a little choir of fourteen or sixteen voices, all told) "makes itself out" better on the stage (in the matter of blending) than in most other places; and yet, no one will pretend to deny that hardly so unpropitious a place for choral singing is to be found as among the scenery and flies of a theatre.

Sounds and tones are delicate things to handle.—And you may rely upon it that voices and instruments depend very much upon their position to each other for the perfection of the general effect—taking all the auditors of a large room into account—notwithstanding the article in your Journal three years ago was the first ever written to call attention to it. The expense of deciding the matter by full experiment, before the great organ comes into the Boston Music Hall, might be defrayed by a concert or two for the purpose, and Boston might have the honor of not only building the best large hall in the world, but of deciding a question which, in these days of large choral societies, is one of importance.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, Nov. 27.—Our Philharmonic, under the intelligent and indefatigable drill of CARL BERGMANN, has made rapid strides, so far as light and shade, careful pianissimo, crescendo, and diminuendo, are concerned, and the rendering of Gluck's Iphigenie overture, at the first concert for Saturday last, was quite satisfactory, while the Tannhäuser also came well out; but the Pastoral Symphony was wanting, strange to say, even in the mechanical part. There was great confusion in the Adagio and the storm scene, especially among the basses, and inaccuracies, which could only result from carelessness on the part of the performers. This may have been owing, in part, to their familiarity with the work, and to a fatiguing rehearsal so recent as the morning of the day of performance. However this may be, the performance of the Pastoral, although well-directed, and a decided improvement in the pianissimo passages, was still far from satisfactory. Our Philharmonics must be somewhat less democratic, and more studious; there is no government suited for an orchestra but an absolute one. The solos of the evening were Mr. OTTO FEDER, vocalist, and the Brothers MOLLENHAUER. The latter are unrivaled in a duo, and are always warmly encored; but I confess to having become somewhat satiated with the music they give us. Musical gymnastics, and agility of finger and elbow, lose their attraction by frequent repetition. Mr. Feder is a German baritone, possessing a full, round voice; but the aria from Paulus was an unfortunate selection, coming in contrast with the symphony that preceded it.

The Philharmonic society, I am rejoiced to say, is still in the full tide of success. Its subscription list numbers some hundreds more than last year even, and the first concert was really a jam. Niblo's was filled from parquet to dome, and every seat had an occupant, and a paying one at that. Is this not encouragement sufficient for an increase in the number of their concerts? Let the government take the Academy of Music, and give us a monthly treat.

The Prophete is resumed at the Academy this week, but I have no hopes of this opera's making up for the previous losses of the management. MEYERBEER is not here to see that the most important rôles, (the several spectacles,) are well filled; and without these the opera loses all its attractions. There is a suspicion of a melody in the finale of the third act; also in the coronation march; but you do not get the whole article, and the evidences of "sturdy manufacture" are too evident throughout. Then the Prophete was mangled shockingly by the orchestra, for which thanks be to MARETZKE. Really I shall begin to give credence to a report which is whispered about, to the purport that the "indefatigable" Max is dissatisfied that he is not lessee and manager of the establishment, nor his numerous family employed, and is determined that things shall go badly at any rate. Certes I have never listened to such conducting before.

The glorious melodies of Semiramide were a refreshing contrast to the barrenness of Meyerbeer's last; and afforded another triumph to Mme. DE LA GRANGE. How each new rôle adds new laurels to the already abundant wealth won by this talented and wonderful vocalist! In the florituras, and bravuras of ROSSINI she was in her element, and her declamation of the throne scene suffered not by comparison with that of GRISI. This opera was given for the debut of Mlle. NANTIER DIDIER, our new contralto, the successor of ALBONI, at Covent Garden. Mlle. is young and handsome; her voice, though not so gloriously contralto-ish as that of ALBONI, is round and full, and very sympathetic in its higher tones; her method is excellent, and her rendering good, saving a little coldness. The debut was a triumph; her audience were evidently delighted, and her success was undoubted; but the management, in its wisdom, has withdrawn her for the present, and until the excitement raised shall have abated. This is another blunder added to the many already committed.

The first of Messrs. MASON & BERGMANN'S Classical Matinées was most successful, to-day at 2 o'clock. It was an occasion of much interest to our dilettanti and the profession; familiar with Carl Bergmann's excellence as a conductor, much interest was felt to hear a quartet of his training. I think the most sanguine expectations were not disappointed. Dodworth's pleasant hall was completely filled; with the exception of many well known professionals, chiefly with ladies; the audience was so large that many had to stand throughout the performances. It was a very attentive and apparently interested audience, if I may judge from the fact that nearly if not quite all remained during the two hours occupied by the programme, notwithstanding the heat of the room, and also from the applause most heartily given by the fair sex, who usually take no part in such matters. The Quartet prepossessed all in their favor by their personal appearance; young and intelligent, (the first violin, Mr. THOMAS, is not twenty, I believe, and Mr. MOSENTHAL looks no older,) all had the appearance of enthusiasm for their art.

The programme I enclose to you. You will notice that the selections were all new, to a New York audience at least.

1. Quartet in D minor, for first and second Violin, Viola, and Violoncello. (Œuvre Posthume. 1. Allegro. 2. Andante 3. Scherzo. 4. Presto. Franz Schubert. Messrs. THOMAS, MOSENTHAL, MATZKA and BERGMANN.
2. Romanza from Tannhäuser: "O du mein holder Abendstern," Richard Wagner. Mr. OTTO FEDER.
3. a. Fantasia Impromptu. (Œuvre Posthume. F. Chopin. b. Deux Preludes. D flat and G, op. 24. Stephen Heller. Mr. WILLIAM MASON.
4. Variations Concertantes for Violoncello and Piano-Forte, opus 17. Mendelssohn. CARL BERGMANN and WILLIAM MASON.
5. Song: "Feldwärts flog ein Vögelein," O. Nicolai. Mr. OTTO FEDER.
6. Grand Trio in B major, opus 8, for Piano-Forte, Violin, and Violoncello. 1. Allegro Moderato. 2. Scherzo. 3. Adagio. 4. Allegro Agitato. Johannes Brahms. Messrs. MASON, THOMAS and BERGMANN.

I will not undertake any criticism upon the pieces themselves, as the greatest novelty, the BRAHMS Trio will be brought to your own notice during the season. I will only remark that the Trio is not novel in its form or construction, and reminds me, especially in the Adagio, of BEETHOVEN. There is a good deal of taking melody in it, which perhaps was hardly expected from 'Young Germany'; and the Scherzo, particularly, would be attractive to any audience. This composition, as well as SCHUBERT'S Quartet, was heartily relished by all; many of our leading musicians who were present, I noticed listened with great attention and many applauding at the close of each movement.

The performances at the Matinée were throughout highly satisfactory. It was the first appearance of the Quartet in public and after only six weeks of practice together, and I was prepared to make allowances for them. These, however, were unnecessary; in light and shade, in delicate pianissimos, careful diminuendos and crescendos, in boldness and vigor, the rendering of Schubert's Quartet surpassed anything I have heard in America. The close of the Adagio was the most perfect pianissimo I remember to have heard. The Duo for 'cello and piano was good; BERGMANN'S instrument gave out a sonorous and rich tone, which was not too much (as at times it had been in the quartet for the violins,) for the piano forte. But the Trio was perhaps the best rendered of all; Mr. MASON played with a fire and vigor; a spirit, that left all thought of mere technicals far behind—such as he had not been supposed capable of, and he was ably seconded by Messrs. Thomas and Bergmann.

The chief reason for hope that a taste for classical music may pervade our city. With the Philharmonic Concerts, the Soirées of Mr. EISEL, and these Matinées of Messrs. Mason and Bergmann, opportunity will not be wanting to hear something higher than ear-tickling Italian melodies, or feet-moving waltzes, polkas and schottisches; in short, that which is really music, the poetry, the soul of music. MILAMO.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, DEC. 1, 1855.

First Orchestral Concert.

The first of these festivals of great instrumental music, (for such they truly may be called, to distinguish them from the common run of miscellaneous and "star" concerts,) took place on Saturday evening. It was a great success, so far as character of music and of audience went, though not decisive as to the will or the ability of Boston to support good music on so grand a scale. We have seen larger and more paying audiences in years past for concerts on the same plan, when it has not been half so well carried out as it was this time. Whether the public taste has retrograded or not, we cannot say; but, certain it is, that the twelve hundred in the Music Hall that evening, ought to have drawn twice that number with them to make good the old music-loving character of Boston. Howbeit the twelve hundred showed themselves the most appreciative for such a number, that we can remember upon any such occasion. Such attention, such discriminating applause, such pervading sympathetic satisfaction, too deep and too real to vent itself in those noisy hand-clappings which it commonly requires so little to inspire, were the best assurance of the best kind of success. Should no more hundreds come up to the rescue of true music, the memory of these twelve shall remain sweet as that of Tennyson's "six hundred."

We do not hesitate to pronounce the concert, as a whole, about the best one of its kind that ever has been given in our city. There was a unity and completeness in the programme, an absence of all that was trivial and hacknied, a well-contrasted variety, and an abounding richness and brilliancy and piquancy in the selections which made the most solid fare enjoyable and stimulating and nourishing. There was but one opinion, one feeling, in the audience; all were delighted; all pronounced that it was good to be there. No one, after that experience, has the right to say that "lighter music" would have pleased the audience better. The most taking medley of witching waltz and sentimental song would have proved tedious and heavy, after the bracing stimulus and never disappointing fascination of that so-called "classical" BEETHOVEN symphony.

The execution was in the main worthy of the selections. The new orchestra of fifty-four musicians was larger, more select and better balanced than we have ever had before—leaving, of course, JULIEN'S out of the comparison. Eight first and eight second violins, with six each of violas, 'cellos and double basses, were a fine ground-work for an orchestra. There is truth in the remark, certainly, that half as many more of violins would have made the balance much more perfect. But we had all the good violins that were attainable—certainly all that the Boston public has as yet shown itself disposed to pay for. That the basses were too powerful we do not agree with some critics; we doubt if six double basses would drown a single violin; if the strings could not be strengthened sufficiently in the upper parts, it was still well that they should be in the lower, helping the whole family of strings to withstand the outside barbarian pressure of the brass. Let our public do its duty by this orchestra, and it will naturally attain to full growth and symmetry by another year. We liked Mr. ZERRAHN'S arrangement of his forces; the violins facing inward on each side of him, flanked by 'cellos and contrabassi at each end, with violas, 'cellos and basses again behind, forming a wall of basses round the strings or heart of the orchestra, while the wind band occupied a sort of extramural place behind all. Would that it were not also above all! for we cannot but think our Berlin correspondent right in the idea that drums and trombones, placed upon the same level close behind the strings, would come sifted through them with a mellow and less disturbing sound, than in the usual arrangement, where they ring out from a clear height over the heads of all the softer instruments. Mr. Zerrahn's arrangement, however, was excellent for such a stage, and quite imposing to the eye. It was soon apparent that a great deal had been accomplished in the two weeks of rehearsal. What was wanting here and there in fine precision of detail was made up in telling general effect, and in the way in which the spirit of each composition was essentially brought out.

First came that wonder-work of instrumental composition, the Seventh Symphony of BEETHOVEN, in A. Never have we heard it here, familiar as it is, when it has seemed both so great and so new. It was in the main admirably played.—Not that there were no faults; but these were scarcely thought of in the power and breadth and beauty, in the light and shade, the spirit of the whole rendering. There was some slight swerving from the pitch, at first, in some of the brass instruments, coming as they did from a cold into a warm room. There were little blurs and draggings now and then in single instruments in the first Allegro, while the general tempo of the movement seemed, if any thing, a shade too fast. It detracted a little from its full swelling joyfulness, sweeping all things into its own lyrical, exalted, happy movement—for joy is the key-note of the seventh symphony as much almost as of the ninth; but joy of a soul how deep, how great, how knowing to great depths of suffering! In that mysterious second movement, Allegretto, too, which seems like a fond lingering in the memory of old glooms and trials for the sake of the wonderful resolution that follows into that strain of celestial peace and sunshine,—the sweeter that the sad sub-basses still throb through the strain—the tempo was a little fast. The Scherzo, which is the very bounding, musical pulse of joy, joy spiritually conscious of itself in every vein and every fibre, and anon fainting into ecstasy, was taken just right and most satisfactorily rendered. But here again, when it came to that sublime episode—perhaps the sublimest in all instrumental music, where that A of the violins sustains its level height throughout the whole, until the trumpet takes it up—a passage which we never hear suddenly occurring in the midst of that wild merriement, without thinking of "And the heavens opened," for you are in a new sphere, encompassed by eternal glories—here again, especially, we felt the time too fast; the simple, solemn grandeur of the passage held back of itself ere long, establishing its own movement. The jubilant finale was taken at the right time; it could scarcely be too fast; and if in the leading violin phrase of the melody the ear continually caught only the accented notes, and lost the notes between, it was but an instance of the want of a still larger mass of violins. As often as we have heard this symphony, we do not remember a time when the effect of this passage was not partly lost. And yet, in spite of all this, we must thank Mr. Zerrahn and his orchestra for giving us a new sense of the beauty and the greatness of this inimitable work.—Long will it ring in the soul of many an auditor of that night, inspiring nobler faith and worthier aims through life.

Two pieces were now sung by Mrs. J. H. LONG. First the Recitative and Romanza: Selva opaca, from the second act of "William Tell," recalling the Matilde of STEFFANONE. Both were executed to a charm, considering that she had but one rehearsal with the orchestra; and it was the first time that this young native vocalist, whose voice and talent have been much admired by all who knew her, has been placed in so important a position before the really musical public. Her voice, improved since we last heard her, is a soprano of good compass, of mezzo soprano richness, very musical and telling, resonant in every part of that great hall, and capable of much dramatic power. It is not equally and always rich, some of the loud notes sounding a little pinched and hard, like a pinched reed; but the half voice is always beautiful, and some of the highest tones were held out to the vanishing point with exquisite beauty. Few lovelier or nobler melodies could have been chosen, and it received good justice from the singer, and was crowned with very general and sincere applause. Turning then to the piano, Mr. DRESEL accompanying, she sang Shakespeare's "Hark, the Lark!" to music full of ecstasy and day dawn as the poem, by FRANZ SCHUBERT. Shakespeare knew the beauty of his little song, and must have had Schubert's music in his mind's ear when he introduced it there in "Cymbeline."—Here is the passage:

Cloten—I would this music would come. I am advised to give her music 'o mornings; they say, it will penetrate.

[Enter musicians.]

Come on; tune. If you penetrate her with your fingering, so; we'll try with tongue too; if none will do, let her remain; but I'll never give o'er. First, a very excellent good conceited thing; after, a wonderful sweet air, with admirable rich words,—and then let her consider.

SONG.

Hark, hark, the Lark at heaven's gate sings,
And Phœbus' gins arise,
His steeds to water at those springs,
On chaliced flowers that lies.
And winking marybuds begin
To ope their golden eyes;
With ev'ry thing that pretty bin,
My lady sweet, arise!

This little song, of scarcely two minutes' length, would have been felt and remembered as a moment's ecstasy in the midst of greater things, could it have been fairly heard. Never were words and tones more happily wedded; the accompaniment is full of larks. But the singer was hardly so happy in this piece; the ecstasy was wanting, there were some little sins against the faultless beauty of the words, and moreover, coming directly after a song with orchestra, it was too short to win the audience fairly over to its mood.

RICHARD WAGNER'S overture to Tannhäuser, the much admired and much hated, but generally from the first admired in Boston, was splendidly played, employing all the extra brass and Janissary forces of the orchestra. It was the first time we had heard it in any thing like its full proportions, and even now the want of a still larger body of violins was felt in those reiterated, strong accompanying figures. The low reed tones in the opening theme were true and beautiful, and rich and warm as mellow sunset was the passage where the violins flowed in above them. At the climax of the diable of the Venus Mount, the tumult of passion was indeed terrible, swelled by the colossal Bombardine, a monster of the Sax family, of a civil though remarkably sonorous tone. So much the more beautiful was the return of the religious Pilgrim strain, and the finale was sublime.

MENDELSSOHN'S delicious Piano Concerto in G minor, developed beauties, points of strength and delicacy, which we had never observed before, in the conscientious, finished and poetic rendering of OTTO DRESEL. A select orchestra conspired well with him, so that it came out a clear poetic whole, full of unity and of beauty. He is received with enthusiastic applause, and nothing but the disappearance of the player the instant the last chord was struck, prevented a repetition. Mr. D. seems to have conquered that nervousness which was all that ever interfered with his appearing what he was, our best interpreter of classical piano music. Yet the large concert room is not the peculiar sphere of talent such as his.

The only blemish in the programme, that is the only mere parade piece, was the Cavatina: In questo semplice, from DONIZETTI's "Betly;"—a sparkling little tra la la affair, to show off the bright high notes of the voice; and that (as our readers know,) had to be adopted at short notice in place of the duet from "Tell," because the orchestral parts could not be had. Mrs. Long sang it well, but the accompaniments had not been sufficiently rehearsed. The applause, which in ordinary concerts follows such trifles chiefly, was, to the credit of the audience, moderate. It is a pleasure to be able to associate so fine a talent as Mrs. Long's with music so much better as the romance from "Tell." The never-failing favorite, the overture to Freischütz, was most effectively performed throughout. The quartet of horns was beautiful, and the precision and energy of the finale all that could be desired.

The impression of that concert, as a whole, will not soon be forgotten. It cannot but awaken a more general desire among our citizens to share the pleasure of the remaining concerts.

The Don Quixote of Opera.

CROTCHETS and QUAYERS: or Recollections of an Opera Manager in America. By MAX MAREZEK. New York: S. French. (Sold by Redding & Co., Boston.)

The "indefatigable Max" has written a book! and a wittier, saucier, more entertaining and romantic book, although it deals professedly with facts, we have not read for many a day. It will afford many a good laugh, and not a little valuable information; for it is in fact the history of Italian Opera in this country for the seven years in which Marezek has borne a leading part in it as manager or as conductor: a period embracing about all our important opera seasons, from the famous Havana troupe to these days of the New York Academy. Verily another seven years' war! Max turns the opera inside out, takes us behind the scenes, shows us the difficulties that beset the managerial path, the foibles, the intrigues, and almost incredible perversities and jealousies of those spoiled children of the pleasure-seeking public, the Italian opera singers. The story is humiliating, but it is also very entertaining.—Whether Max wrote it to pay off old scores, and get sympathy by showing the world what a wild beast menagerie he has had to manage; or to revenge himself on rival managers, some of whom he hits very hardly; or whether he did it from the mere humor of the thing, (for the tone of the book is laughing and good-natured,) we cannot say. It is not more vain and egotistical than such "Confessions" always are; and it is more amusing and instructive than the most of them. The book abounds in anecdotes and personalities, which the public will find piquant, though the parties interested may esteem them libellous. Max certainly has had enough to try the patience of a saint, and if he lets the spirit of retaliation go no farther than good-humored satire, he deserves the credit of a philosopher. His portraits of the principal singers who have figured on the American stage are lively and in the main correct, though sometimes terribly severe. His portrait of the public, too, the fashionable New York public in particular, one must own true. He is not always just to persons, and there is no telling how far he has given to each history the coloring most favorable to himself. The book is exceedingly well written, in a fluent, easy style, and shows the literary talent of a very clever feuilletonist. We did not know that Marezek possessed such; but he alludes to his early classical education in Vienna, and that he had some aid in writing it he confesses when he says he took with him to Staten Island for this summer task an English dictionary and grammar with an English friend. Of the style and happy temper of the volume, take the following passage from the Preface as a specimen. Alluding to the fact that he has been called the "Napoleon of Opera," he declines the title and accepts that of its "Don Quixote," though whether his career has been as disinterested as that worthy knight's is open to conjecture. He proceeds:

As far as concerns my operatic and musical Don Quixotism, it can, however, scarcely be said that I arrived in the United States by any means too late. On the contrary, little in the shape of Italian Opera had previously been attempted here. My naturalization in this part of the world has, in all probability, been a trifle too early. At all events, until the advent of my Cervantes, I accept right willingly the title of the "Don Quixote of Opera" in America. My Dulcinea del Toboso has been the Art of Music. As for my Rosinante, who can doubt but that this was indisputably the patronage of "Upper Tendon"—a meagre and lazy mare who would not go ahead, in spite of corn and spurs. My agents were veritable Sancho Panzas. They looked after their own interests, and while I was absorbed in the dream of my Dulcinea, kept their eyes wide open and most unpoetically fixed upon the possible loaves and fishes. Many first tenors were there, whom I had fancied giants, that turned out to be nothing but wind-mills, while the prime donne, who had been rated by me as faithful maids of honor to my Dulcinea, proved too often to be but little better than dairy-maids; and the enemies whom I had to encounter, not unfrequently exhibited themselves, ere the conclusion of the combat, as mere Italian barbers or hotel-waiters in disguise.

The book consists of a series of letters addressed to distinguished impresarios and artists in Europe. The first, to HECTOR BERLIOZ, describes his arrival and first year's conductorship at the Astor Place opera house, in 1848, while the enterprise was in the hands of Mr. E. P. FRY. We do not think that he does justice to "that gentleman, nor does he help his own cause in the eyes of all good men by his express leanings to the N. Y. Herald. He gives a humorous relation of the TRUFFI and BENEDETTI conspiracy, which defeated Mr. Fry's too sanguine efforts. We quote his sketches of these favorite artists:

The Signora Truffi was a lady singularly prepossessing in her appearance, and of the most distinguished manners. Had you looked on her abundant fair hair, and sunned yourself for a moment in the glance of her bright and azure eyes, you would rather have believed her some sentimental maiden from Northern Germany, than an Italian Prima Donna. Judged simply as an artist, she was one of that kind which seldom falls upon the ear, but never electrifies the soul of the listener. She rendered certain parts which do not admit of a fusco, such as Elvira in the "Ernani," and Lucrezia Borgia, well, carefully avoiding all she imagined might not suit her capacity. In quality her voice was a rich soprano, and she had considerably augmented its register by a careful musical cultivation.

Benedetti had a manly and robust figure. Indomitable, energetic, quarrelsome as a gentleman who has recently come from the South of Ireland, conceited with the inevitable self approval of a first tenor, and cunning as either a monk or a weasel, he possessed a strong voice. Its degree of cultivation was extremely mediocre. Did he chance to sing a false note, or commit an error in intonation, he would look daggers at some unoffending member of the orchestra, or if the humor seized him, publicly rebuke an innocent member of the chorus, for the purpose of inducing the public to believe that one or other of them had dragged him into a false key. Whenever he could not keep time, he had the trick of beginning to beat it himself, although he literally never knew the difference between a six-eight and a two-four movement. This was for the purpose of showing the audience that the fault, supposing they discerned it, lay with the conductor. You may imagine that such a vocalist was an almost priceless tenor. Yet he, for so Mr. Fry had told me, was a favorite with the public.

The second letter, to M. FIORENTINO, of Paris, shows up the New York "Upper Tendon" and the net amount of its supposed liberal support of opera. Some queer features are revealed. And there is some good criticism here as elsewhere on MOZART and other great and small composers. We cannot forbear quoting Max's testimony to the paying popularity (so often questioned by newspaper critics) of "Don Giovanni." He says:

The Opera of "Don Giovanni" brought me support from all classes, and attracted persons of all professions and every description to the Opera House. Fourteen consecutive evenings was it played to crowded houses. This opera, alone, enabled me to conclude the season and satisfy all demands made upon my exchequer.

Nor is this the first time Mozart's matchless masterpiece has saved some poor devil of a manager from ruin. It is truly wonderful how, not only the music, but the mere plot of this Opera, interests the public, in all and every country in which it may be performed.

And again:

To prove this, let me tell you that the "Don Giovanni" had the greatest success of any Opera which has been brought forward, in my time, in America. This argues, as you must admit, well for the public taste in this portion of the world, and promises even more for their future musical development. Everybody was delighted. Even a little mercantile acquaintance of mine, who was an enthusiastic admirer of Opera, and had a positive standing among amateurs, as a man of recognized judgment in musical matters, was literally carried away. Upon the first night, when the Opera had come to an end, he scarcely seemed to know whether he stood upon his head or his heels. My step was not heard in the lobby, ere he rushed up to me like a diminutive madman. Grasping both my hands in his, and shaking them with a very painful fervor to myself, he there and then gave me his opinion about Mozart. It was delivered by him in these terms:

"My dear Mr. Max! That music of Mozart's! A-h-h-hh! Oh-h-h-h-h! Indeed—I nev-v-v-ver!"

Letter third is addressed to LABLACHE, and is devoted to the period of the LIND furore, and a sharp criticism of BARNUM's Autobiography; in the course of which our author naïvely confesses his own attempt (he is "proud to say, the only time") to practise the Barnum method in manufacturing a reputation for PARODI. In the next letter he recalls his own earlier years; describes the successful opera managers in Europe, and then passing to Don FRANCESCO MARTI, of Havana, introduces the famous STEFFANONE, BOSIO, SALVI, BADIALI troupe. He appreciates the artists, but is terribly severe upon them personally, particularly SALVI.

A letter to BALFE, in London, exposes the tricks of humbugging "musical agents" in America, a class of unprincipled adventurers called into existence by the dazzling speculation of Barnum. For this Max deserves public thanks. He then speaks of CATHERINE HAYES. LOLA MONTEZ has a place too.—And the opera at Niblo's leads him into a critical comparison of MEYERBEER's and ROSSINI's music. His operatic adventures in Mexico, told in a letter to Mr. GYE, of London, form a tale almost as romantic as "Arabian Nights." How much is fact and how much fable we have no means of knowing, but few modern novels offer a chapter more amusing.

To CARL ECKERT, of Vienna, he addresses what he has to say about the enterprise of Mme. SONTAG, whose manager or agent he spares not. Finally, in a "postscript to the public" Max gives his criticism upon the construction and management, thus far, of the New York Academy of Music,—a chapter full of instruction, and not particularly encouraging to those who hope to make Italian Opera a permanent institution in our cities.

Mr. Maretzek appears, on the whole, to like American life and character, if he does amuse himself (and us) somewhat wittily at our expense, upon the side of our artistic aspirations and pretensions.

CONCERT OF MR. AND MRS. LEACH.—A charming little "quiet concert" of old-fashioned English music was given on Friday evening of last week, in the Meinaon, by these accomplished singers, with the aid of Mr. ARTHURSON, and of Mr. HAYTER, senior, as accompanist. The selections from HANDEL's "Acis and Galatia," too seldom heard among us, were particularly interesting, and had excellent interpreters. Mr. Arthurson's singing of "Where shall I seek," and "Love sounds the alarm," was in his best style. Mr. LEACH, with his finely cultivated, though not powerful, bass, is a master of such songs as "Oh ruddier than the cherry," and made the jealous rage of Polyphemus quite effective in the exquisite Trio: "The flocks shall leave the mountains." Mrs. Leach, too, is more satisfactory in this kind of music than in oratorio; her manner is graceful and modest, and she was warmly applauded in "As when the Dove." The scena from "Freyschütz," however, did not seem exactly in her sphere. The Trio, "This magic wave scarf," from BARNET's "Mountain Sylph" is one of the most pleasing pieces of light English concerted music, and was charmingly sung. Very quaint and curious was the florid old duet: "Haste my Nannette," by TRAVERS, sung by Messrs. Arthurson and Leach. The latter gentleman revealed a fine comic talent in an English version of Figaro's song; and Mr. Arthurson surprised us by an extravaganza à la JOHN PARRY and HATTON, to-wit "Fayre Rosamond," which he sang, recited and accompanied on the piano with much gusto.

We are glad to see that these clever singers have formed a "Vocal Quartet" by the acquisition of the charming contralto, Miss TWICHELL, and announce a varied programme for this evening. We trust it will prove but the beginning of a successful series.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.—The second performance of "Solomon" was unfortunate in weather.—A severe storm thinned both audience and chorus, especially the female parts. Yet the oratorio went off with spirit, and several of the solos were better than before. Some reduction had been made in its length by the further omission of a chorus, and a few songs and recitative. It might be abridged still further to advantage; the whole of the dramatic scene, of the two women and the trio, although the music rewards study, is ineffective without more accompaniment and very superior singers, and could well be spared. The choruses improve upon acquaintance, and even under the circumstances went finely. "Solomon" will be given again to-morrow night, and we urge every one to hear it.

THE MUSICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY.—The first concert of the season took place in the Meinaon on Monday evening; Mr. ZERRAHN conducting, Mr. MUELLER accompanying at the piano. The programme was rather a singular medley of the grandest and the lightest. The first part comprised two of HANDEL's great chorusses from "Jephtha," followed by a VERDI barcarolle, an air by LEE: Hark, the "nightingale," with flute obligato, sung by Mrs. HILL, and a romanza by AUER: "Young Agnes," sung by Mr. ARTHURSON. These we lost, but heard the second part, which consisted of a variety of vocal sugar plums, songs by very young ladies furiously applauded by young gentlemen, and so forth, packed between two great Handelian choruses. The choruses, from the "Messiah": All we like sheep, and, And the glory of the Lord, were sung by a large, well balanced and well drilled choir, with good unity and precision, though with a certain hardness of sound, which perhaps would become mellowed in a larger hall. But why so slow a time, particularly in a chorus of so much natural momentum, as All we like sheep have gone astray? We think these concerts may be made highly interesting and improving, but would suggest that the smaller miscellany of the programme was not up to the character of last year's concerts. Some songs, a little less incongruous with the choruses, and above all some good quartets and trios would leave a better impression of the whole.

Musical Chit-Chat.

Our advertising columns show a formidable array of coming Concerts. To-night the "VOCAL QUARTET," of which elsewhere.... To-morrow night "Solomon" again.... Monday night, (rumor says) there will be light English opera, to wit, "The Devil's Bridge," in which ADELAIDE PHILLIPS is to sing.... Tuesday night, the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, with the aid of Mr. G. W. PRATT.... Saturday next, the second ORCHESTRAL CONCERT (not "Orchestral Union," as some papers have it) with another brilliant programme.... Sunday, the 9th, the "Messiah," with portions of "St. Paul," by the MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY. Music-loving visitors could not time their visits to this city better than just now.

The letter of our New York correspondent came too late for the printer this Thanksgiving week. It will be good another week, and, meanwhile, we have an interesting letter from another source.

ROSSINI, as the newspapers have told us, fled from Paris, in the summer, to the sea-shore resort of Trouville. There he met an old friend, one of the first of living German musicians, FERDINAND HILLER, whose most interesting report of conversations with the maestro we commenced translating in our last. Let no one omit to read them. Some will open their eyes when they see how the great Italian talks about the mooted question of Italian and German music. PALESTRINA and ROSSINI are the two great musical names of Italy! are they not its opposite poles—as opposite as possible?

Our enterprising contemporaries of the Musical Review publish in their last number the first of the eight songs, selected by a competent committee, from the hundred or more sent in in competition for the prizes of $200 and $100, offered by them for the two best. After all the eight are published, the subscribers to the paper are to award the prize, the polls being kept open till the end of March. If all the eight are half as good as this first candidate, a charming lullaby to Tennyson's "Sweet and low, wind of the western sea," the publishers, who retain the copyrights, will have made an excellent speculation; and if the mass shall award intelligently, they will have helped the cause of Art among us.

CHURCH ORGANS. COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

WM B. D. SIMMONS, Organ Builder,
(Heretofore doing business in the style of Wm. B. D. SIMMONS & Co.) and

GEORGE FISHER,

Of Cambridge, have this day formed a Copartnership for continuing the manufacture of Church Organs.

We design to keep in our Warerooms New Instruments for sale at prices from $400 to $1,500 each, and are prepared to build by contract at the shortest notice. Organs, worth from $600 to $12,000. And by prompt and faithful execution of orders hope to merit a like encouragement to that heretofore extended to Wm. B. D. SIMMONS, and which has indicated the necessity of this business connection, that his entire attention may be devoted to the more difficult and artistic parts of the business, so that an increase thereof may cause no diminution of the personal attention which is requisite for the maintenance of the CHARACTER of our instruments, upon which we rely for success.

While it will be our aim and ambition to furnish ORGANS OF A PERFECTION OF TONE and MECHANISM, AND OF AN ELEGANCE OF EXTERIOR UNRIVALLED, we are confident of ability to offer terms MORE FAVORABLE THAN CAN BE OBTAINED ELSEWHERE, for the following reasons: Having ample means, we can purchase in large quantities at first cost, for cash; can always command the most talented assistants, and also do sufficient business to practise division of labor, which, by assigning parts to workmen skilled in their particular branch, necessarily insures better work at less expense. Our Manufactory, by its proximity to Charles river, enables us to receive lumber direct from the vessel at first cost, and having been erected expressly for the business, is in arrangement, size, convenience and its facilities unequalled, being furnished with steam engine, steam-heated drying-house, planing, grooving, matching, moulding, tenoning, boring, and other machines, together with lath scroll, circular and other saws, &c., all operated by steam power.

These facilities are such as are possessed by no other manufacturer of Organs in this country, and of themselves would enable us to furnish instruments, with a fair profit, at a price which those of like quality must cost builders who have work done by hand that can be better executed at half the cost by steam machinery.

Second hand Organs at all times for sale.

Orders for tuning church organs promptly attended to, and contracts taken for tuning by the year.

Orders respectfully solicited.

FIRST PREMIUM MELODEONS, The Very Best now Manufactured.

S. D. & H. W. SMITH respectfully call the attention of the public to their IMPROVED MELODEONS, constantly on exhibition at their Warerooms,

No. 417 Washington Street.

By means of a new method of voicing, known only to themselves, they have succeeded in removing the harsh and buzzing sound which formerly characterized the instrument, rendering the tones full, clear and organ-like. The action is prompt and reliable, enabling the performer to execute the most rapid music without obscuring the tones. The swell is arranged to give great expression.

The manufacturers received the First Premium, over all competitors, at the Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association; also at the Metropolitan Mechanics' Fair, held at Washington, D. C.

For the Parlor, instruments are furnished at prices varying from $45 to $150.

Larger instruments, with two banks of keys, for chapels and small churches, from $150 to $300.

This last instrument, known as the ORGAN HARMONIUM, has been essentially improved by Messrs. Smith, and they have secured a patent therefor.

Persons who wish to hire Melodeons with a view of purchasing at the end of the year, can have the rents credited as part payment of the purchase money.

Chat with Rossini.

BY FERDINAND HILLER.

Translated for this Journal from the Zeitung of Cologne.

III.

—What MOMBELLI family was that, for which you composed Demetrio e Polibio? I began in the evening. Families, for whom one writes operas, are not found very often.

—MOMBELLI was an excellent tenor, said ROSSINI; he had two daughters, one of whom sang soprano, the other contralto. They associated a basso with them, to complete the vocal quartet, and, without further help, gave operatic representations in Bologna, Milan, and other cities. They first appeared in this way in Bologna, in a little, but very pretty opera by PORTOGALLO.

—A Portuguese composer?

—O no, an Italian. He was not without talent, and understood how to treat the voice parts particularly well. Many distinguished singers were very partial to his compositions. My first wife, MME. COLBRAN, had some forty pieces of his in her repertoire. The way I became acquainted with Mombelli was quite pleasant, and since you take an interest in my little history, I will relate it to you.

—Tell it, maestro, I beg you.

—Though still a boy (I was thirteen years old) I was already a warm admirer of the fair sex. One of my early friends, protectresses, how shall I call it? wanted to have an aria out of that opera produced by the Mombellis. I went to the copyist and begged him to write it out for her, but he refused. Then I applied to Mombelli himself, but he also put me off. You can't help yourself, said I to him; I will hear the opera again this evening, and write down all I like of it. We will see, said Mombelli. But I, undaunted, listen to the opera once more with all attention, and then put a complete piano-forte arrangement of it upon paper and take it to Mombelli. He would not believe his eyes, cried out treachery on the part of the copyist, and what not. If you will not believe this, said I, I will hear the opera a couple of times more and then write down the full score, but under your own eyes. My great, and in this case, perfectly justified self-confidence conquered his suspicion, and we became good friends.

—I have often had occasion to convince myself of your extraordinary musical memory, said I; but to write down a whole opera, that is altogether astonishing.

—It was no score like the Nozze di Figaro—but I may well boast of my strong musical memory at that time.

—A peculiar gift! I have known great musicians who did not know by heart their own compositions, which had been played a hundred times, while others carried about whole libraries in their head. MENDELSSOHN belonged to the latter class; he once accompanied BACH's Passion music from memory.

—With the oratorios of HAYDN, said Rossini, I would have undertaken to do that when a young man. The "Creation," especially, I knew by heart even to the least bit of Recitative; to be sure I had accompanied and played it through often enough.

—But I must come back again to Demetrio e Polibio, maestro. You see I have a turn for archæology. Did Mombelli, then, commission you to write this opera?

—He gave me words now for a duet, now for an arietta, and paid me a couple of piastres for each piece, which spurred me up to great activity. So I had got out my first opera before I knew it. My singing master, BABINI, gave me much good advice about it. He had a particular and passionate dislike to certain melodic figures then in vogue, and he used all his eloquence to make me avoid them.

—A quartet from this Demetrio had a sort of celebrity when I was in Italy, and was particularly cited as a proof of your early maturity. And did you do nothing more to it, afterwards, when the opera came upon the stage?

—I was not present; Mombelli gave it at Milan, unbeknown to me. What people admired particularly in that quartet was the fact, that it ended without the usual closing cadence, with a sort of exclamation of the voice parts. There is also a duet in it, which was much sung for a long time; it was very easy, and that is a great thing.

—You grew up, maestro, in the midst of singing and the stage; as you had a fine voice, it is singular that you never thought of becoming a stage singer.

—I thought of nothing else, my dear friend; but I wanted to become more thoroughly grounded in my art, than most of the singers I then knew. It was an easy matter. I already at an early age filled the place of Mästro al Cembalo; transposing and arranging came occasionally, my attempts at composition met with favor, and so I fell almost by accident into the career of the composer. I adhered to that, although I had opportunity from the first to see how immeasurably better paid the singers were, than one of us.

—That heaven knows! BEETHOVEN hardly got as much for his collective works, as they give CRUVELLI at the Grand Opera.

—They were not quite so crazy then as they are now, to be sure, but there is little change; if the composer got 50 ducats, the singer received 1,000, said Rossini in a vexed tone. I confess I never could help smarting under the sense of this injustice, and often enough have I vented my ill humor against the singers. You good-for-nothings, I would say to them, who don't know how to sing as well as I do, and yet earn more in an evening than a whole score brings me in! But what good did that do! The German composers, too, do not grow rich!

—By no means, maestro! But they get situations, which, if they do not pay brilliantly, yet make one easy about the necessities of life. Upon the income of his operas no German composer ever could have lived. But it seems better now in Italy than formerly.

—Incomparably better. The earlier Italian opera composers could write God knows how many operas, only to live in want. With me it was scarcely otherwise, until my engagement with BARBAJA.

—Tancredi was the first opera of yours that really made its way, maestro; how much did you receive for it?

—Five hundred francs! And when I wrote my last Italian opera, the Semiramide, in Venice, and bargained to receive 5,000 francs for it, I was looked upon not only by the management, but by the whole public, as a sort of highway robber.

—You have the consolation, that singers, theatre managers and music publishers have become rich through you.

—A pretty consolation! Except during my stay in England, I have never made enough through my art, to be able to lay up anything. And in London I made money not as a composer, but as an accompanist.

—Yet, it was because you were a famous composer!

—So my friends told me, to persuade me to it.

It may have been a prejudice, but I had a sort of repugnance to receiving pay for accompanying on the piano, and I have only done it in London. Moreover, they only wanted to get a peep at my nose, and hear my wife sing. For our participation in musical soirées I had fixed the rather high price of fifty pounds—We took part in about sixty such soirées—that was well worth the pains. In London, too, musicians do all sorts of things to make money, and I have had some queer experiences there.

—One often cannot trust his eyes there, and still less his ears, said I.

—For instance, continued Rossini, they told me, the first time I undertook the accompaniment at one of those soirées, that PUZZI, the famous hornist, and DRAGONETTI, the still more famous contrabassist, would be present also. I supposed of course, that they would play a solo. But no such thing! they were to help me accompany. Have you, then, accompanying parts for all the pieces? I asked them. God forbid! was the reply; but we are handsomely paid and we accompany as we think fit. These improvised attempts at instrumentation, however, were rather dangerous to me; so I asked Dragonetti to content himself with snapping a few pizzicatos, when I winked my eye, and Puzzi, to strengthen the closing cadences with some tones, which he, as a good musician, found quite easy. In that way it went on without any further bad mistakes, and everybody was contented.

—Delightful! But the English, as it seems to me, have made great progress in a musical regard. Nowadays they bring out a great deal of good music in London,—they perform it well and listen to it with attention—that is to say in public concerts. In the saloons music always plays a mournful part, and many utterly untalented men strut there with incredible audacity, and give instruction in matters of which they understand next to nothing.

—I knew in London a certain X., who had made a great fortune as teacher of the piano-forte and singing, said Rossini; all he understood was how to blow the flute a little and quite wretchedly. Another, who had an immense run as a singing teacher, did not even know the notes. He kept an accompanist, who had to drum over to him beforehand the pieces which he afterwards taught, and who accompanied in the lessons; but he had a fine voice.

—You are of the opinion, perhaps, maestro, that really good singing masters are among the rare phenomena? They are even obliged to form the instrument with which the music must be made—a doubly difficult task!

—Most of the important singers of recent times, replied Rossini, have owed their talent more to their happy nature than to cultivation. Such was RUBINI, such was PASTA and many others. The peculiar art del bel canto ceased with the castrati; this one must admit, although we may not wish them back again. To these people their art had to be their all, and so they expended the most assiduous industry, the most unwearied care upon their cultivation. They always became competent musicians, and when their voices failed, at least excellent teachers.

—Who are the best singing teachers, with whom you are acquainted now? I asked.

—I esteem PIER MARINI in Paris very highly. LAMBERTI in Florence understands admirably how to prepare one, who is no longer a beginner, for the stage. Have you an able teacher at your Conservatory in Cologne?

—Our REINTHALER understands his business, as few in Germany; moreover he is a distinguished composer. But I have a proposition to make to you, maestro?

—What may that be?

—Do you undertake a singing class in our music school—I should have to do something too for you. You shall have three hundred thalers salary and free lodgings to-boot. Is not that enticing?

—In the highest degree, my good Ferdinando; we will speak of particulars hereafter.

Life of John Sebastian Bach;

WITH A CRITICAL VIEW OF HIS COMPOSITIONS, BY J. N. FORKEL.

Through this admirable system of teaching, all Bach's scholars became great artists, some indeed greater than others according to the degree of instruction they received, or their subsequent opportunities and encouragements to improve upon or apply it. His two eldest sons, however, William Friedemann, and C. Ph. Emanuel, were the most distinguished among them; certainly not because he bestowed more pains on them than on his other pupils, but because they had from their earliest youth opportunities of hearing in their father's house much good music and no other; whereas others, before they could participate in his instructions, had either heard nothing good, or were already spoiled by bad or common compositions. And it is a proof of the goodness of the school that, notwithstanding these disadvantages, even these pupils all acquired a great proficiency in their art, and distinguished themselves in one or other of its branches. His oldest scholar was John Caspar Vogler, who received instructions of him at Arnstadt and at Weimar. He was, by his master's own testimony, a very able performer on the organ. He became organist of Weimar, and afterwards burgomaster of that city, still, however, retaining his post of organist. Some choral preludes for an organ with two rows of keys and a pedal were composed by him and published in 1737. Bach's other pupils who obtained celebrity were 1st. Homilius in Dresden, not only an excellent organist, but a celebrated composer of church music. 2nd. Franschel in Dresden. He was a fine performer on the clavichord, and a very good teacher.—There are six polonaises by him in manuscript which, except those of William Friedemann, excel all polonaises in the world. 3rd. Goldberg, from Königsberg. He was a very clever performer on the clavichord, but had no decided talent for composition. 4th. Krebs, organist at Altenberg. He was not only a very good organ player, but a prolific composer of organ, clavichord, and church music. He was fortunate enough to enjoy for nine years the benefit of Bach's instructions. 5th. Altnikol, organist at Naumburg, the son-in-law of his master. He was, it is said, a very able organist and composer. 6th. Agricola, Prussian court composer. He was less reputed for his compositions, than for his knowledge of the theory of music. He translated Tosi's "Instructions for Singing," from the Italian into German, and enriched the work with some acute observations. 7th, Müthel, in Riga. He was a skilful player on the clavichord, and also composed for that instrument, of which his "Duet for two Clavichords," and his sonatas, which appeared still earlier, afford proofs. 8th. Kirnberger, court musician to the Princess Amelia of Prussia, at Berlin. He was one of the most distinguished of Bach's scholars, full of the most useful zeal, and genuine enthusiasm for his art. The world is indebted to him, not only for his development of Bach's method of teaching composition, but also for the first and only tenable system of harmony, which he has gathered from his master's practical works, entitled "True Principles for the Use of Harmony." He has rendered service to the art by other writings and compositions, as well as by teaching. The Princess Amelia was herself his pupil. 9th. Kittel, organist in Erfurt. He is a very solid if not a very fluent player. He distinguished himself, however, by the composition of several trios for the organ, which are so excellent that his master himself would not have been ashamed of them. He is the only pupil of Bach's now (1802) living. 10th. Voigt, in Anspach, and also an organist by the name of Schubert, were named to me by C. Ph. Emanuel, as scholars of his father; but all that he knew of them was that they came into his father's house after he had left it. I have already said that Bach's sons were his most distinguished pupils. The eldest, William Friedemann, came nearest to his father in the originality of his ideas. All his melodies have a different turn from those of other composers, and yet they are at the same time as natural as they are ingenious and elegant: and when played with the delicacy with which he himself performed them they cannot but enchant every real lover of music. It is only to be regretted that he preferred playing from his fancy to committing his thoughts to paper, as therefore his compositions are but few. C. Ph. Emanuel ranks next to him. He went early into the great world, and thence learned how to compose for a numerous public. In the clearness and intelligence of his melodies, therefore, he makes some approaches to the popular style, but he never descends to become common. Both the elder sons frankly acknowledged to having been obliged to form a style of their own, as they could never have hoped to rival their father in his. John Christopher Frederic, master of the concerts at the court of Buckeburg, imitated Emanuel's style, but not equal to his brother. He was, however, according to the testimony of William Friedemann, the most skilful performer of all the brothers, and one who played most readily his father's compositions for the clavichord. John Christian, called Bach of Milan, and afterwards of London, being the youngest son of the second marriage, had not the advantage of having the instructions of his father. The original spirit of the Bachs is not therefore in any of his works; he became nevertheless a popular composer, and was universally admired in his day.

CHAPTER VII.

Bach not only distinguished himself as a performer, composer, and teacher of music, but had besides the merit of being an excellent father, friend and citizen. These virtues he displayed in the careful education of his children, the conscientious discharge of every civil and social duty. His acquaintance was desired by everybody; and every sincere lover of his art, whether foreigner or native, was free to visit his house, and sure to meet a kind reception. All his high reputation and social virtues seldom left his house without visitors. He was an artist extremely modest and, notwithstanding the superiority he possessed, and could not but feel over the rest of the profession, and in spite of the admiration and respect constantly shown for his talents, he was never known to assume upon it. When asked how he acquired so great a mastery of his art, he used generally to reply: "I was compelled to be industrious; and whoever is equally industrious will succeed equally well." He did not seem to pay much regard to his great natural genius. His opinions of other artists and their works were always just and liberal. Many works necessarily appeared to him trifling, because he was almost exclusively engaged on the higher branches of the art, yet he never permitted himself to express a harsh opinion of them, unless to his pupils, to whom he thought himself obliged to speak the real unvarnished truth. Still less did he suffer his consciousness of his own superiority to seduce him into bravado, such as is too often practised by a great performer when he thinks he has an inferior to deal with.

So far did he carry his modesty in this respect, that he never voluntarily mentioned the musical contest he had with Marchand, though in this case he was not the challenger. Many absurd tricks are related of him, as that, for instance, he sometimes dressed himself like a village schoolmaster, and, going into a church, begged the organist to allow him to play a psalm tune, for the sake of enjoying the astonishment of those present at his performance, and to lead the organist to say that he must be either Bach or the devil, &c., but these tales are evidently mere inventions. He himself disowned everything of the kind. He had too much respect for his art thus to toy with it; besides, an artist like Bach does not thus throw himself away. In musical parties, where he was not otherwise engaged, he used to have great pleasure in playing the tenor in quartets or other concerted pieces. With this instrument he was placed, as it were, in the middle of the harmony, whence he could best hear and enjoy it on all sides. Sometimes, when an occasion presented itself at such parties, he would accompany a trio on the harpsichord. And sometimes, if in a cheerful mood, when he knew that the composer, if he chanced to be present, would not like it amiss, he would extemporize out of the figured bass a new trio, or of three single parts make a quartet. It was in this manner alone he proved to others how strong he was. A certain Hurlbusch, of Brunswick, a vain and arrogant clavicord player, once came to visit him at Leipzig, not to hear him play, but to let himself be heard. Bach received him kindly, and listened with polite attention to his very indifferent performance, and when on his taking leave he presented Bach's eldest sons with a printed collection of sonatas, urging them to study them with diligence (they who had studied things so superior!) the father only smiled to himself, without in any way altering his behavior to the conceited stranger.

He was fond of hearing music of other composers. In a church if he heard a fugue for a full orchestra, and one of his two eldest sons chanced to stand near him, he always, as soon as he had heard the introduction to the theme, told him beforehand what the composer ought to introduce, or what he possibly would introduce, and if the composition, was a good one, it happened as he had predicted, and he rejoiced and joggled his son's elbow to make him remark it. This too is a proof that he valued the ability of others. We have already named the composers whom he admired and studied in his youth. As he advanced in age, and his judgment became more matured, he had other favorites, such as Fux, the leader of the emperor's band, Handel, Caldara, Rhein, Kayser, Hasse, the two Grauns, Telemann, Zeluka, Benda, and he was well acquainted with all the distinguished composers of the time, living at Dresden and Berlin; personally, with all but the four first named. In his youth he was very intimate with Telemann. He had a very great esteem for Handel and desired much to be personally acquainted with him. As Handel was a great performer on the clavicord, and organs, many amateurs in Leipzig and its neighborhood wished to hear these two great men together. But Handel could never find time for such a meeting. Three times he came from London to Halle, his native town. His first visit was about the year 1719; Bach was then at Coethen, only four German miles from thence, and when informed of Handel's arrival he lost not a moment in paying him a visit; but Handel had left Halle the very day that Bach entered it.

At the time of Handel's second visit, somewhere between 1730 and 1740, Bach was lying ill at Leipzig; he however immediately dispatched his eldest son, William Freidemann, to Halle, with a very pressing invitation to Handel to come and visit him at Leipzig; but much to their mutual regret Handel could not do so. At Handel's third visit to Halle in 1752 or 1753, Bach was dead. Thus, his wish to be personally acquainted with Handel was not gratified, any more than that of numerous others who would have gladly seen and heard these two great geniuses together. At the period when Hasse was director of the chapel at Dresden, both it and the opera there were very effective and brilliant. Bach had there from his earliest years many acquaintances and devoted admirers. Hasse and his wife, the celebrated Faustina, came several times to Leipzig, attracted by their admiration for his great talents. He was, therefore, always received most honorably at Dresden, and frequently went thither to hear the opera, generally taking with him his eldest son. He used to say to him jestingly before his departure: "Freidemann, shall we go again and hear the pretty Dresden songs?" Innocent as was the remark in itself, he would not, I am convinced, have made it to any one but his sons, who already knew perfectly how to distinguish between what is really great in Art and what is merely pretty and pleasing. Bach did not make what is called a brilliant fortune; he held, indeed, a lucrative office, but he had a numerous family to maintain and educate, and he neither had nor sought other resources. He was too entirely engrossed by his office and his art to think of pursuing those means which, for a man like him, and especially in his times, lead to wealth.

If he had chosen to travel he would, as even his enemies allow, have attracted the admiration of the whole world. But he preferred a quiet, domestic life, the constant and uninterrupted occupation afforded him by his art, and was, moreover, as we have said of his ancestors, contented with a moderate competency. Notwithstanding this he, however, enjoyed during his life very many proofs, not only of love and friendship, but of respect and honor. Prince Leopold of Coethen, Duke Ernest Augustus of Weimar, and Duke Christian of Weissenfels, were all most sincerely attached to him, which was the more honorable to him, as the princes were not mere lovers, but also good judges of music. At Berlin and Dresden he was universally honored and respected. And if we add to this the admiration of those connoisseurs who heard him, and were acquainted with his music, it may be easily supposed that a man like Bach, "who sang only for himself and the muses," had received from the hands of Fame all he could desire, and of a sort that had more charms for him, than the doubtful honors of a ribbon or a golden chain. It would be scarcely worth the mentioning that, in 1747, he became a member of the "Society of the Musical Sciences," founded by Mitzler, did we not owe to this circumstance his beautiful choral melody: "Vom Himmel Hoch, &c." He presented this melody on his admission to the society, and afterwards had it engraved.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Scraps of Musical History.

At the first Quintette Club concert we were favored with a very pleasing Andante, composed by BERNARD CRUSELL, for clarinet, with quartet accompaniment. Perhaps few, if any of the audience, ever heard of the composer before. Being myself among the number of the ignorant, I looked into Fétis's Dictionary, and there found that Crussell is a distinguished clarinetist, at present attached to the chapel of the King of Sweden. That he was born in Finland in 1778, studied in Berlin, and afterwards resided in Hamburg, until he finally removed to Stockholm. His published compositions are all for the clarinet, obligato or concertante.

There is another person connected with the history of music at a much earlier period, of whom, perhaps, many of your readers have never heard. I refer to the man who originated concert-giving in London; the man who sold coal about the streets out of a sack, which he carried on his back; the man who was distinguished as a chemist, as a bibliopolist, who associated with noblemen and gentlemen, when his day's work was done; who was never ashamed of his humble calling, but laid aside the coal sack to devote himself to the examination of curious books, or to listen to, or perform in, one of the concerts which he originated.

This man, whose history is among the most curious of his times, was THOMAS BRITTON, "the famous Musical Small Coal Man," as Hearn's Appendix styles him. "Hearn's account is given by one who knew him well," says Hawkins. He was born about the year 1654, and having come up to London very young, from Northamptonshire, apprenticed himself to a Small Coal man. His apprenticeship lasted seven years, and he then returned home, having received a sum of money from his master not to practice his trade. Having spent his money, he however returned to London and rather dishonestly broke his promise, by commencing the charcoal business on his own account, having hired a stable which he converted into a dwelling house. He spent his leisure hours with the "savans" and artists, whose acquaintance he had made.

His neighbor, Dr. Garancier, taught him chemistry, and Britton even constructed a moveable laboratory, which was highly approved of by all who saw it. When not occupied by chemical studies he visited the bookstore of a certain Christopher Bateman, when leaving his empty coal sack upon the "bulk" of the shop window, he joined the lovers of book-lore who assembled there, and often afterwards adjourned with them to dine at "the Morning Bush at Aldergate." He had a passion for music; "played on the viol di gamba, and could tune a harpsichord." And his Collection of Music, copied by himself, was so considerable, that at his death it was sold for £100. Britton's concerts were given in the upper rooms of his own house, the lower being filled with charcoal. It was situated on the south side of Aylesbury street. The stairs leading to the upper story were on the outside of the house, and the ceiling of the room was so low that a tall man could hardly stand upright in it. Here with the co-operation of Sir ROGER L'ESTRANGE, "a very musical gentleman," he soon had for his audiences on concert days the most brilliant society of London. Noblemen and gentlemen, duchesses and marchionesses crowded with enthusiasm to the concerts of the charcoal man. At first Britton refused to receive money for admission to them, but he was obliged in order to pay his expenses, to fix a sum of ten shillings a year as the subscription price, and then allowed his visitors coffee at one cent a cup. HANDEL often played the harpsichord there, assisted by the most skilful musicians of the day. Fétis says that Britton played himself upon the "clavécin," but Dr. Hawkins tells us that it has been questioned whether he played upon any musical instrument. Hawkins gives an immense catalogue of the music sold from his library after his death. In it we find the works of PURCELL, CORELLI, Dr. CROFT, LOCK (the author of the "Macbeth" music), &c., &c., which may serve to show what sort of music was performed at his concerts.

His cry of Small Coal was a perfect consonance, the octave  and he was so well known that when passing through the streets "in his blue linen frock, with his sack of coal on his back, he was frequently accosted with such expressions as these: There goes the famous Small Coal Man, who is a lover of learning, a performer in music, and a companion of gentlemen."

His life appeared so singular to many people, that they scrupled not to bestow upon him the epithets of Conspirator, Atheist, Jesuit, and Magician.

His death was as singular as his life.

Mr. Holt, a magistrate of Middlesex, who often formed one of Britton's audiences, introduced a blacksmith named Honeyman, who was a ventriloquist, into his house, in order to frighten our poor friend. A deep and solemn voice, crying out, as if from the invisible world, announced to Britton that his end was near, unless he fell upon his knees, and recited the Lord's Prayer. The poor man fell upon his knees indeed, but could not proffer a syllable for very fright. His tongue clove to the roof of his mouth, and being carried to his bed, he died some days after, in the year 1714, aged 60 years. His concerts had lasted for forty years, and, as the first established in London, are of great interest. Under a print of him are written, by Mr. JOHN HUGHES, who had frequently played at his concerts, the following lines which may serve instead of an epitaph.

Though mean thy rank, yet in thy humble cell,
Did gentle Peace and Arts unpurchased dwell;
Well pleased, Apollo thither led his train,
And Musick warbled in her sweetest strain.
Cyllenius so, as Fables tell, and Jove
Came willing guests to poor Philemon's Grove.
Let useless Pomp behold, and blush to find
So low a Station, such a liberal Mind.

MLLE. NANTIER DIDIÉE.—Of this new prima donna contralto at the New York Academy, the Mirror gathers the following notices from The Entr' Acte, a gossiping little sheet distributed gratuitously amongst the audience.

She is a native of St. Denis, in the Isle of Bourbon, and was born in 1832—consequently she is now in her twenty-third year. At an early age she exhibited a remarkable fondness for music, and became, when quite young, a student in the Conservatoire, in Paris, having Duprez, the renowned French tenor, as her master. In due course, she debuted at the Académie, and obtained the most marked success. But the peculiar quality of her voice required a wider scope for action than French opera afforded; and on the earnest advice of friends and professors of eminence, she determined to forsake the French for the Italian lyric stage. She therefore proceeded to Italy, and, after completing the necessary studies, made her first appearance at the Theatre Carignano, Turin, in the rôle of Pippo, in La Gazza Ladra. Her success was beyond the most sanguine anticipations of those on whose advice she had acted; and her subsequent performance of Giulia, in La Vestale, so thoroughly confirmed it, that offers were immediately made her from all parts of Italy; but these she declined, preferring to accept a brilliant engagement as prima donna in an Italian company then about to give representations in the principal cities in France. While performing at Lyons, M. Corti, the Director of the Italian Opera, Paris, arrived there for the purpose of judging of her merits, her fame having already reached the capital, and was so delighted with her performance, that he tendered her an engagement, and succeeded in getting her current one cancelled. She appeared at the Italian Opera as The Duchess, in Luisa Miller; and notwithstanding the slight interest attached to this rôle, she made so much of it that her efforts were greeted with enthusiastic applause. Mr. Gye, the Director of the Royal Italian Opera in London, was then in Paris, in search of new artists to commence his season with. He heard of Mlle. Didiée, and was so satisfied of the success she would achieve in the English capital, that he gave M. Corti a handsome consideration to surrender her engagement to him. The opening character at Covent Garden was Armando, in Maria di Rohan; this was in 1853, and one of the leading journals remarks of her voice:

"The crisp distinctness of delivery which marked the few words of 'Gondi,' preclusive of the Per non istare all' ozio, scarcely prepared us for the finish, the precision, the facility of execution, and the rare natural quality of voice, with which this popular morceau was executed. The house unanimously called the cantatrice at the close of the first refrain.

She next appeared as Maffeo Orsini, in Lucrezia Borgia—and the London Times says:

"Mlle. Nantier Didiée—next to Alboni, the best Maffeo Orsini we have heard at the Royal Italian Opera—sang the famous brindisi, 'Il segreto per esser felice,' with great spirit, and was unanimously encored. But still more to our liking was the plaintive romance in the first scene, 'Nella fatal di Rimini,' which was given by Mlle. Didiée with an unobtrusiveness of style that betrayed a strong artistic sentiment. On the fall of the curtain, she was recalled, with Madame Grisi, and well deserved the honor."

At the close of the season, she accepted a re-engagement for the following year, and in the interim proceeded to France and Belgium. During the season of 1854, she continued to win the plaudits of London audiences, and subsequently visited Madrid, where she achieved a great triumph in the part of the gipsy Azucena in Il Trovatore, and Climene in Saffo. During the past season Mlle. Didiée accompanied Madame Grisi and Mario in a professional tour through England, Scotland, and Ireland, and everywhere called forth the highest eulogiums from the press.

The lady has a highly attractive personal appearance, and is altogether the most beautiful and charming artiste that has ever visited America. She is a perfect blonde, and her face is not only strikingly handsome, but highly intellectual. Her manners are remarkably graceful and lady-like. Her voice is a highly cultivated contralto, of immense range; indeed, so extensive is its compass, that she can sing soprano and mezzo-soprano parts without difficulty, and is unquestionably, with the exception of Alboni, the greatest contralto in the world.

NEW-YORK, NOV. 27.—It was a matter of life and death to penetrate through the dense crowd that filled the vestibule of Niblo's theatre on Saturday, the night of our first PHILHARMONIC concert, and at a very early hour every nook and corner of the house was occupied. This is of course encouraging, but holds out a dire prospect of future inconvenience and loss of much time to the audience, unless a larger house be taken. The concert was, as a whole, quite satisfactory, although some single features might be found fault with. The orchestral pieces were the "Pastoral Symphony," GLUCK's Overture to Iphigenia in Aulis, and WAGNER's to Tannhäuser. The first was well and spiritedly played, with the exception of the Andante, in which some confusion in the time was observable. Some call the Pastoral the most insignificant and least interesting of BEETHOVEN's Symphonies—but I cannot find it so,—there is a gushing freshness, a cheerful repose in it that makes it actually sound like the country, and which vividly recalled to me all the last summer's placid rural enjoyments. Between the two overtures there was a strange contrast, the one so crowded with full instrumental effect—the other appearing almost meagre in a close comparison, and yet so severely, chastely beautiful. I think it was taken rather too slow, although, as I hear, the tempo was fixed by Wagner; but I like it better when played more rapidly, as I heard it from one of the first orchestras in Germany. The Tannhäuser, and Mr. BERGMANN's conception of it you know much better than we do. I can tell you nothing new about it, but only express my regret at its having been placed at the end of the programme, and that not even its popularity could prevent many persons from leaving during its performance. In addition to these pieces by the orchestra, the brothers MOLLENHAUER gave us a duet, and Edward Mollenhauer a solo, both of their own composition. This was hardly appropriate for a Philharmonic concert: it is a great pity that these gifted brothers do not apply their really admirable talent to something higher than mere trickery and effect. The solo was particularly full of these; it was called "La Sylphide"—but can you tell me whether sylphs were ever known to dance polkas? For the final motif of this piece was unquestionably a good, danceable polka. Mr. OTTO FEDER, who sang the beautiful Bass Aria from MENDELSSOHN's "St. Paul," and a couple of songs by DESSAUER and SCHUBERT, has a voice of good quality, but small compass, and unfortunately sings out of tune very often, particularly whenever the voice comes in again after a bit of instrumental symphony. What I admired most in his performance, was his remarkably distinct enunciation; but that was all lost on the greater part of the audience, as he sang in German.

Concerts come thick and fast now. For to-day I have to record MASON and BERGMANN's first Matinée, which took place this afternoon (rather paradoxical, that!). There was quite a good audience assembled, and I, for one, enjoyed myself very much, notwithstanding that the ensemble performance was not entirely satisfactory. But as this may be ascribed, in a great measure, to short practice which the players have had together, and this is a fault which is constantly being remedied, the least said about it the better. The opening piece, and the gem of the concert, was SCHUBERT's posthumous Quatuor. I had long known it well from ROBERT FRANZ's pianoforte arrangement of it, and was highly gratified at this opportunity of hearing the original. It is one of the most characteristic of Schubert's works, full of originality, in the lovely, flowing Allegro, the crisp, pert Scherzo, and rushing, breathless Finale, as well as in the heavenly theme of the Andante, which, with its few, simple modulations and chords, and almost monotonous melody, yet seems to bring peace and rest to our souls, and leave room for none but good and pure thoughts. Mr. Mason played several solo pieces—a Fantaisie Impromptu by CHOPIN, and a couple of short, pretty little Preludes of STEPHEN HELLER—exceedingly well. In the first, particularly, one of the composer's most dreamy, delicate effusions, he adapted himself entirely to the true spirit of the work. Besides these he played some Variations by Mendelssohn, with Bergmann (violinello), and took part in the Trio by BRAHMS, the Man of the Future. I can hardly judge of this composition on a first hearing, and with no previous acquaintance with the style of its author. Suffice it to say that I was agreeably disappointed in not finding it as difficult to understand as I had anticipated, and in its very pleasing and original melodies. Mr. FEDER sang the Aria from "Tannhäuser": O du mein holder Abendstern! which cannot be at all appreciated without an orchestral accompaniment. Also a very florid and brilliant song by O. NICOLAI. The remarks made above apply also to this gentleman's singing at to-day's concert, and I would add to them the regret that he should sing so many compositions which reach above the agreeable compass of his voice, and thus injure its quality as well as its effect.

PHILADELPHIA, DEC. 3.—I was absent from the city last week, and unable to send you my customary report; indeed I returned only in time to attend the PYNE Concert on Friday evening last.

The hall was full, and Miss LOUISA PYNE was applauded to the echo each time she sang; she is the best vocalist of the brilliant execution school who has visited the United States in English opera; others have had better voices, but none such good training. The programme was principally selected from BRISTOW's opera, "Rip Van Winkle"; one duet and five ballads, all pretty, pleasing and very much like each other; no one can complain that Mr. Bristow did not write them all at one inspiration. They were all good, all singable, but in the most common place song style; such songs as one expects when Ethiopian Minstrels sing with unblackened faces. Mr. STRETTON's song of "The Tears of the Vine," has,—as the Tribune remarked,—not a solitary bibulous trait in it, but is more like a sentimental ditty about the tears of the heart, or some such tombstone music. The second part of the concert was from different composers—"Rode's Air," "The Skylark," "We may be happy yet," "The Bay of Dublin," &c.; nearly everything was encoired by the good-natured audience, which even put up with Harrison's nasal efforts; he gave as an encore to "We may be happy yet" the favorite "Thou'lt remember me," laying peculiar stress upon the last pronoun, as if there was any danger of the audience being fortunate enough to forget him. The only blot on the programme was a comic song from HORNCastle, more suited for the saw-dust and pea-nuts of a circus, than the Musical Fund Hall.

On Saturday evening the Musical Fund Society gave its second Concert, with BRIGNOLI, ALDINI, HENSLER, and GOTTSCHALK. The orchestra was out of tune and out of practice, and completely spoiled all the accompaniments; the overtures were tolerably performed,—"La Violette" by CARAFA, and LINDPAINTNER's "Vampire,"—the first light, the second heavy. Miss Hensler was warmly received. Gottschalk is getting more noisy than ever, breaking strings and pounding as if music had to be beaten out of the piano. His rendering of Chopin's delicate, sympathetic Funeral march and Scherzo, was nothing more than discreditable to any one pretending to the rank he claims; in his own compositions he can be listened to, in other people's he is less than indifferent. Brignoli was the bright particular star of the evening, though he deserved a scolding for keeping the audience waiting so long for him. Did you ever see anything to compare with Gottschalk's airs and graces? his piano moving, his gloves, his handkerchief, his upturned head and rolling eyes? all these affectations growing with his growth and strengthening with his strength.

The Musical Union will give the Stabat Mater on the 11th, with full orchestra, despite the loss of the C. K. M., who is endeavoring to start a society for his own personal benefit.

Another new Sacred Music Society has been formed, I hear, in the northern part of the city, called the Handel and Haydn; president, Mr COOLIDGE, an amateur. MEIGNEN is vocal instructor.

The Harmonia's second Concert is announced for Saturday evening. The feature is the new oratorio of "The cities of the Plain," by F. T. S. DARLEY, the organist of Christ Church (and a director of the Society.) It has been in rehearsal for two seasons, and is said to be a heavy work by those who have heard it,—his first Cantata of "Belshazzar" was anything but heavy, almost too light. Another feature of the concert is the "Marseilles Hymn," rather an odd anthem for a sacred concert. I shall lay myself out on this entertainment, as a native oratorio is a novelty. VERITAS.

BERLIN, OCT. 30.—It seemed like old times this evening, and I was carried back to Boston again, as ALFRED JAEHL took his seat at the piano, and scattered showers of tone-pearls upon the audience in "Arnim's Saloon." I need say nothing about his playing, but the same life, spirit, and joyousness, that ever characterized him, are his characteristics still. He looks just as handsome, and happy as ever, nor have his twinkling fingers lost a jot of their lightning speed. Here is the programme, in the plain and primitive form of German programmes.

- 1) Trio for piano, violin and 'cello, in G minor, by RUBINSTEIN, played by the Royal Concert-masters Herren L. and M. GANZ and the CONCERT-GIVER.
- 2) Song piece.
- 3) a. Second Barcarole;
b. Prayer of Elizabeth, from Wagner's "Tannhäuser," Transcription;
c. Italian Serenade. } composed and played by the CONCERT-GIVER.
- 4) Song piece.
- 5) a. Prelude No. 15, by CHOPIN;
b. C minor Fugue, by BACH;
c. Scherzo in B♭ minor, by CHOPIN. } played by the CONCERT-GIVER.
- 6) Song piece.
- 7) Paraphrase, from Wagner's "Lohengrin" and "Tannhäuser," composed and played by the CONCERT-GIVER. HERR JAEHL.

The songs were an air from GLUCK's "Orpheus:" "Welcome" by CURSCHMANN, and "He is come" by FRANZ—sung by Fraulein JENNY MEYER, sister-in-law and pupil of STERN, the excellent head of the singing society bearing his name, and director at the Orchester-Verein Concert. Fraulein Meyer, a fine, large brunette, has one of the finest of the younger contralto voices in Berlin, and is destined, I think, to become a favorite oratorio singer.

As to Jaell, it is better to record part of RELSTAB's notice of him, than to repeat what we Americans have so long and so often said.

"The Concert-giver" says he, "exhibited himself as a master of the first rank in three salon pieces, which he performed solo. * * * He played all three numbers, of greatly different character, with what may be called perfect beauty. * * * The bell-play in the Italian Serenade was a new and delicious effect. True, it was only play, but given in such perfection as to attain artistic rights."

The hall was well filled, and the applause was clearly heartfelt, which was specially pleasing to me as confirming the judgment passed upon the artist in America. Another point noticed by Relstab, was the extreme beauty of tone which was drawn from the instrument, a characteristic which all Bostonians will remember.

From something that he said to me, I should not wonder if we by and by had Jaell as a permanent resident in Boston, a city of which he speaks with heartiest satisfaction and fond remembrance.

Nov. 10.—What can I say? I am too excited, too much 'carried away,' and yet would fain record, that hereafter I may recall in some faint degree, the feelings with which I have heard CLARA SCHUMANN and JOACHIM again. Have I sneered at virtuosity? Never at such as this! Where and how to begin? The language of the critics is like Sanscrit to me, I can neither use it myself nor understand it in others. I must—as I can with truth—comprehend all technical description in one phrase—there are no difficulties to them in their respective instruments. What are difficulties to other performers are so easily overcome, are played with such perfect calmness and rest, and glide away so unnoticed from their fingers that you cannot think to wonder at them. Let me go back a week.

It was a concert with orchestra in the Sing Akademie. Again, as last winter, I found it so beautiful in them, when all was ready, to come down to their places in front of the orchestra, so modestly and simply as if the audience was but a meeting of friends—with no display, no evident wish to be greeted with applause, no zany-like contortions of body, nor tossing of heads, but quiet and calm in their strength, without anxiety, without triumph. The overture to Byron's "Manfred," led by that excellent director STERN, and played by our new 'Orchester Verein,' opened the concert. A powerful work, expressive of struggle and commotion of spirit. SCHUMANN's strong side, as it seems to me. Then followed his Concerto in A minor, for piano-forte and orchestra, which she played. I was badly seated to get the proper effect of the work, but not to see the mastery with which the pianist ruled her instrument. What force and what delicacy! How wonderfully those handfuls of notes spoke out the deepest thoughts of Robert Schumann! Here a sigh, and there a tear—here the struggles of a giant, there the soothing voice of an angel. It is this wondrous power of entering into the very soul of the composer, which makes Clara Schumann what she is. Others can equal her in the technicalities of playing, but no woman approaches her in this thing.

I met a lady a day or two after, who asked me how Madame Schumann appeared?

"She seemed to me care-worn and sad; as well she may, poor woman!" said I.

"She appeared just so years ago, when she was a young girl, and came here to triumph over all," said the lady. "She never had a childhood. Her father was determined to make a virtuoso of her, and the joyousness of youth she never knew. Even then her countenance showed her secret sorrow."

Is not this the reason that she plays BEETHOVEN as no other living? Does she not feel that great struggling spirit in his music? does it not sympathize with her, and share every trouble, and soothe, and calm and speak peace? When she plays his music, you think no more of composer and performer than you do of SHAKESPEARE when reading his dramas. On this evening she only played some variations by the great master, in C minor. No mere finger-work, but full of feeling and beauty.

Joachim's first piece was a sonata for the violin solo, by BACH. I had heard it a day or two before, when he played it to an audience of two, curled up upon the lounge; and as he now stood up before the large audience, there was no change in his demeanor, no variation in his manner of playing; all was just as simple and unaffected as before, and what is the secret of this, but his love for the music? And truly I begin to have some faint conception of that man Bach's greatness. What power, depth and quaint beauty in this work! The first movement has a grand, sweeping power, producing an effect that one could hardly expect from the instrument. Then follows a quaint fugue, on four subjects, I think; but can that be possible? I heard it twice and hardly dare say it; and then an Adagio, full of soul, and a finale, capricious and wild, and full of technical difficulties hardly to be imagined. One never would imagine it from the manner of Joachim. RELSTAB says of the performance: "The poet says:

'In him have I

The model of a perfect man beheld.'

"We can quote these words in relation to this artist, in whom we honor a model of perfect performance. Not the storm of applause at the close, but the breathless stillness during the piece praised him the most. In the solution of his problem not only did no note of the smallest importance fail him, but no stroke of power, no spark of fire, no breath of tenderness; it was the most perfect Daguerreotype of the work."

But it was in the last piece that I felt his mighty power to the fullest extent. This was that grand work of Beethoven's ripest years, the Concerto for violin and orchestra, op. 61, in D. I had heard it at a concert of the Orchester-Verein not long before, the solo by Concert-master LAUB, from Vienna. He had played it with distinguished skill and it had not failed of making its due impression. But now! Still as the tomb was that house, the audience being prepared for the noble orchestral opening by the delicate variations before mentioned, which immediately preceded it. This work was written at that period when Beethoven's genius proved in the fourth Symphony, that as a mere artist, a simple writer of music, he was behind none. So in this work the deep sorrow of the later period does not appear. The giant is there in the Allegro, but a giant rejoicing in his strength. What tenderness, what unheard-of depths of human feeling in the Larghetto!

"You need not be ashamed of your wet eyes," said

Miss G. to me, "there are many others here in the same state."

If Joachim would only put on a few artist airs, one could think of him; as it is, the stream of music carries us along with it and the very heart strings are vibrating to every tone of that marvellous instrument. If he would not be so calm and utterly buried in his own feelings, there would be some escape. But no. He seizes upon you by his very personal appearance, and after the first tones all escape from his enchantment is impossible. And so the Larghetto ended and the people waked from their trance—the magic bonds were loosed. The deepest feelings had been excited. The British Spy wondered how the audience of the blind preacher could be brought down from the pitch of excitement to which his eloquence had raised them. Had any one but Beethoven written that Larghetto, or had any other than Joachim played the Rondo (Finale), I should have feared like the British Spy. But when did Beethoven ever fail in placing just exactly the right thing after one of his heart-reaching, soul-thrilling Andantes or Adagios? With what abounding life and joyousness did the Rondo spring from beneath Joachim's bow! His own figure, calm as it was, seemed to feel in every nerve the change. The orchestra was inspired to a man, and the audience were electrified. That the "gloomy Beethoven!" This last movement is the very champagne of music; Joachim poured it out to us, until we were "like Bacchus, crowned and drunken!"

CONCERTS.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. The second concert, for which the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon was again filled with the best sort of an audience, on Tuesday evening, was one of the most interesting of the many feasts of classical "chamber music" for which we have been indebted to the Club for several winters past. The programme was of just about the right length, the pieces choice and in the main extremely well performed, and we perceived no signs of weariness unto the end. On the contrary, a quiet and keen relish, without any particular vehemence of outward applause, characterized the audience. Here is the programme:

PART I.

1. Quintet No. 5, in E Flat.....Mozart.
Allegro—Tema con variazioni—Minuetto—Finale, Allegro.
2. Two German Songs:
a. "Der Neugierige,".....Schubert.
b. "Widmung,".....Schumann.
G. W. PRATT.
3. Quartet in E minor, No. 2, op. 44.....Mendelssohn.
Allegro appassionato—Scherzo—Andante—Finale,
Presto agitato.

PART II.

4. Prayer; composed in 1687 by.....Alessandro Stradella.
G. W. PRATT.
5. Quartet in G, No. 2, op. 18, [first time,].....Beethoven.
Allegro—Adagio cantabile and Allegro—Scherzo
Allegro—Finale, Presto.

The opening of MOZART's Quintet was somewhat marred by lack of perfect harmony in the strings and roughness in the upper part; but the fusion of the elements was more complete in the beautiful Andante, with its variations full of the subtlest invention and delicacy of Mozart; after which all went smoothly, and the playful, almost jolly finale, so child-like in its gayety, left the listeners with a fresh zest for what might follow.—The Quintet in E minor seemed to us one of the very best of MENDELSSOHN. There is such a depth of thoughtful sadness in the first movement, that it seemed scarcely possible that it was composed at so early an age as the opus number would indicate. It tells of the deep experience of the tried and mature man. The Scherzo opened in that same Midsummer Night's Dream fairy vein, which is at once the most original creation of Mendelssohn's fancy, and one of his common-places to one who hears him much and meets it recurring in quartet, quintet, trio, overture, everywhere. But this time the idea is worked up with marvellous skill and interest as it goes on, and is really one of the happiest of his Scherzos. The finale, too, is admirable, in perfect keeping with the impassioned introductory movement. The whole Quartet was very finely played; the violoncello passages were singularly expressive.

That early Quartet of BEETHOVEN, in G, (how comes it that we have never had that before, having so often drawn from the treasures of that op. 18?) full of the cheerful strength of youthful genius, contrasted finely with the Mendelssohn, and made a most acceptable conclusion. It is as clear, and elegantly finished as Mozart in its structure, and in its spirit as musically abstract as Oublicheff himself could well desire. To the Adagio, with the moody interruption of a bit of Allegro, he might possibly take exception, as betraying the cloven foot of a dramatic tendency, which he would sacredly exclude from the Quartet; but it is a most beautiful Adagio, full of feeling.

The songs by Mr. PRATT revealed his conscientious Leipzig studies, and showed the talent of the singer to more advantage than the oratorio music in which alone he has before appeared. That Widmung (Dedication) of SCHUMANN, however, so passionate and so delicate, in which the lover calls the mistress of his heart: mein guter Geist, mein besseres Ich, was hardly suited to a heavy-moulded baritone voice, and being transposed so low, lost much of its fire and fineness, although it was rendered with chaste expression and gave evidence that the character of words and melody had been faithfully studied. The song by SCHUBERT, (from his charming cycle of songs, under the title of Die Schöne Müllerin), of the Neugierige, or curious lover, who questions the brook whether his love is returned, was a happier selection. But the most satisfactory was that old prayer of ALESSANDRO STRADELLA, of romantic memory, which, with quartet and flute accompaniment, had the charm of a deep-toned old painting by one of the religious masters. It was sung with true expression. The upper tones of Mr. Pratt's voice are quite musical, but his manly organ tone is not free from a certain huskiness, and yields reluctantly as it were to delicate and subtle modulations of feeling. There is the conscientious manner of the artist about him, and we rejoice that we have one who cultivates so earnestly and so intelligently the nobler treasures of the vocal art.

To accommodate those who would attend Mr. Thackeray's lectures, the third concert of the Club will take place on Monday, Dec. 17th.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.—Handel's "Solomon" drew a very large audience at the third performance. The choruses were finely sung. That "nightingale" serenade chorus, particularly, and that short one in G minor: Draw the tear, are among the most beautiful of all choruses, as others in the same work are of the most sublime. Of the solos, there are about two songs each in the parts of Mr. ARTHURSON, Mr. LEACH and Mr. PRATT, which improve continually upon acquaintance. The latter gentleman sang: What though I trace, with much expression: the effect of that song is much heightened by a richer instrumentation than the rest; new orchestral parts having been tastefully added by Mr. HAYTER. More and more we are convinced that the dramatic scene of the two women adds only to the tedium of the performance.

VOCAL QUARTET. Quite an encouraging audience attended the old-fashioned English vocal medley of Messrs. ARTHURSON, LEACH, &c., at the Meionson, last Saturday evening. The programme was given in our paper last week. We were only present during the singing of an old English piece by Mrs. LEACH, substituted for the canzonet of Haydn; a French Romance, by CLAPISSON: "My soul to God, my heart to thee," a melody of much sweetness and pathos, finely sung by Mr. ARTHURSON; and a very good performance of an old English quartet: "Ye spotted snakes," by Mrs. Leach, Miss Twichell, Mr. Arthurson and Mr. Leach. These things have their admirers, and four good singers, singly or combined, are an attraction; but we must say that few things musical come over us with such a drowsy influence as a continuous succession of those English songs that charmed an older generation, before other music was much known among us.

Ferdinand Hiller.

The interesting conversations with ROSSINI which we have been publishing, will doubtless render some notice of the reporter of those conversations acceptable to the readers of the Journal. FERDINAND HILLER, like MENDELSSOHN, is of Jewish descent, the son of a rich Frankfurt am Main gentleman, and was born there in 1812. His early inclination to music was fostered by his parents, by affording him every means of developing his talents and taste. The first public notice we find of him is of his appearance in Paris in 1829 as pianist, where he seems to have made a very good impression. Afterwards he returned to Germany and exhibited his command of his instrument in various places, but settled again in Paris in 1833. Five years later we find a notice of him in Milan; in 1842 he was in Rome; the next year he had come back to Fatherland and become a teacher in the new Conservatorium in Leipzig, where in 1844 he was one of the directors of the Gewand-house concerts. In 1847 he was called to Dresden as director of a series of subscription concerts, and soon after accepted the place of music director at Düsseldorf, whence he removed to Cologne. For the few past years he has been at the head of the new Conservatorium there, and is known as the director of the great Rhine musical festival at Düsseldorf.

Among his works are the operas "Conradin," "The Miller and his child" and "Romilda," performed in Milan. Neither of these seems to have had any great success. His oratorio, "The Destruction of Jerusalem," was much praised by the German papers. His works for the concert room are numerous,—overtures, two or three symphonies, and the like, and he has written much for the pianoforte and with a considerable degree of success.

We have not the means of judging very decidedly of the merit of his compositions, but at present incline to the opinion that they exhibit more knowledge and musical learning than original genius. Most composers of the highest rank have already made their mark firmly and decidedly before reaching the age to which Hiller has already arrived.

Musical Chat.

The music-lover in our city is bewildered by the announcements of concerts, great and small, which appeal to him on every side. There is danger that the thing will be overdone and that the regular series of concerts of the highest kind of music, which depend on large and regular patronage, may suffer through so many musical distractions. Surely there is no kind of musical entertainment in itself so interesting, so effectual in creating a true love and taste for music, so strengthening to the higher artistic tone and purpose of the musicians themselves,—none which has been so much a matter of true pride in Boston hitherto, as the concerts of a grand orchestra, in which the leading feature always is a symphony by some great master. The success of this class of concerts quickens all the others, which are at all worthy to succeed. Let the grand orchestra concerts go well, and we are pretty sure of a good musical season generally. Let these fail and the season will be dull, however many irons there may be busily turning (to small purpose) in the fire. First, therefore, in interest as in order, is the Second ORCHESTRAL CONCERT, at the Music Hall this evening. The impression produced a fortnight ago by the noble orchestra of fifty-four, under CARL ZERRAHN, and by the fine rendering of that glorious programme, will make hundreds eager to listen to an equally rich feast to-night. MENDELSSOHN'S 'Scotch' Symphony is always a favorite; BEETHOVEN'S Leonora is about the grandest of overtures; the overture to "Tell" and the Finale to the 1st act of "Don Juan" (including the Trio of maskers, the Minuet, the ball-room scene, &c., &c.,) even in an orchestral arrangement, are always popular. This time not only the Romanza, the entire scena from "William Tell," including the duet, will be sung by Mrs. LONG and Mr. ARTHURSON; which, with the exquisite tenor aria from MOZART'S "Magic Flute," will make the vocal entertainment worthy of the instrumental.—At the urgent request of many music-lovers, who live out of town and who have no railroad accommodations in the evening, the Committee of the Orchestral Concerts have decided to give soon an afternoon performance, in which the Seventh Symphony and one or two other features of the first programme, together with some graceful music of a "lighter order," will be given at afternoon prices.

Next in order come the oratorios, to which three several societies invite us. We are only sorry that the excellent plan of uniting all three in the production of the "Messiah" at Christmas time has failed. Meanwhile the opportunity is close at hand, even to-morrow evening, in the Tremont Temple, of hearing the "Messiah," as well as extracts from "St. Paul," performed by the MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY, who have been signally successful in their productions of that sublime work heretofore. Their quartet of solo-singers, too, is quite superior, including Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS, for the first time in oratorio, besides Mrs. J. H. LONG, Mr. ARTHURSON and Mr. WETHERBEE.... The HANDEL and HAYDN SOCIETY announce for the same evening, for the fourth time, "Solomon," with Mr. MILLARD in the place of Mr. ARTHURSON; also the "Messiah" for Sunday evening before Christmas, with Miss PHILLIPPS, Mrs. WENTWORTH, Mr. and Mrs. LEACH and Mr. MILLARD.... Finally, on the evening of Christmas the "Messiah" will be given a third time by the MUSICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY, with the aid of Mrs. WENTWORTH, Mrs. LONG (in "Rejoice greatly," "I know that my Redeemer," &c.), Miss TWICHELL, (contralto), Mr. ARTHURSON and Mr. PRATT. No one can complain that HANDEL is neglected here this winter.

At the Boston Theatre this week they have been giving what were once called "English operas," that is to say, old-fashioned comedies and melodramas, in which action, scenery and startling surprises are the main thing, and the music merely incidental and subordinate, limited to a number of songs, which rather interrupt than interpret or help on the plot; and those mostly in the one character sustained by Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS, who certainly sings finely what she undertakes, and what with her good acting powers besides, constitutes about all the interest of the occasion. It is a solo vocal concert, (unless we count in a few wretchedly sung choruses, comic songs, &c., by members of the stock company),—a solo concert with a background of scenery and story. The fact that MALIBRAN, some thirty years ago, drew crowds by this sort of thing, before the taste for real opera was formed, was not good warrant that it would prove attractive now. The houses have been thin. Neither the scenery and stirring incident of "The Devil's Bridge," nor the farcical action of Sheridan's "Duenna," with all the well-sung medley of our fair contralto, seem to have created much enthusiasm.... We understand there is a Sacred Concert shortly to be given in the Rev. Dr. Putnam's church in Roxbury, under the direction of Mr. BAUMBACH, and with the aid of Mr. and Mrs. LEACH, Mr. ARTHURSON, Mr. L. H. SOUTHARD, the Quartet Choir of the church and an efficient chorus. Romberg's Cantata: "The Transient and Eternal," selections from the "Messiah," "Creation," Stabat Mater, &c., &c., will be performed.

Master PAUL JULLIEN, with his violin, and little ADELINA PATTI, the singer, are engaged to appear at the Drury Lane theatre in London, next month.... Mr. BORRANI, late Basso of the Pyne and Harrison Troupe, has organized an English opera company, with Miss BEHREND as prima donna, and Mr. HARRISON MILLARD, tenor. They are soon to commence in Philadelphia, with Bristow's "Rip Van Winkle."

To those who seek instruction in piano-playing, Harmony, &c., we commend the card of Mr. PIERRE BERTHOUD, a modest, gentlemanly, thorough-bred musician, who was a pupil in the Conservatoire of Paris, and is master of its system, has taught successfully for two years in seminaries in Massachusetts, and has shown a clever talent as a composer, as we have before had occasion to notice.... Arrangements are in progress for the erection of the BEETHOVEN statue in the Music Hall, with appropriate musical festivities, the Choral Symphony, &c. But it will not be possible to complete the preparations in season for the birthday (Dec. 17) of the great composer.... Our Boston prima donna, Mme. ELIZA BRACCACCIANTI (so we are informed through a letter from an American officer at Buenos Ayres,) lately made her debut in that city, triumphing signally over the opposing claqueurs in the interest of a prima donna who preceded her. All the Americans, the sailors, &c., took tickets, and though the claqueurs hissed and the orchestra played purposely wrong, succeeded in obtaining for her a fair hearing, and a general recognition of her merits.

The London Musical World, having completed the republication of our translation of OULIBICHEFF'S "Review of the History of Music," of course without credit, has begun in the same manner upon the Analysis of "Don Giovanni." We are happy to be of service, and congratulate the London editor upon his easy labors.... The grand scheme of a National Opera Company in London has fallen through.... Sig. SALVI, in consequence of the VERDI difficulty, has been deposed from the managership of the Italian Opera in Paris.

NEW COURSE OF HARMONY, BY L. H. SOUTHARD.

The Publishers call the attention of the musical profession to this work, as one eminently calculated to lighten the labors of the teacher, and rapidly advance the pupil. It is emphatically a PRACTICAL work, serving both as a Manual of instruction on the one hand, and a Text-book on the other; and it is believed that the peculiar arrangement of the work, together with the very large number of exercises and examples, presents great advantages, to both scholar and teacher, over any similar work of the kind. Teachers highly commend the work. Mr. WILLIAM MASON says it is a work unsurpassed in the language. Mr. GEORGE J. WEBB says that it is a work perspicuous in diction, methodical in arrangement, and sufficiently copious to embrace all the essentials of the general doctrine of accord. It can be ordered through any respectable Music-seller, and will be sent through the mail on the receipt of the price, ($1.75), postage prepaid.

CHURCH ORGANS.

COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

WM. B. D. SIMMONS, Organ Builder,

(Heretofore doing business in the style of WM. B. D. SIMMONS & Co.) and

GEORGE FISHER,

Of Cambridge, have this day formed a Copartnership for continuing the manufacture of Church Organs.

We design to keep in our Warerooms New Instruments for sale at prices from $400 to $1,500 each, and are prepared to build by contract at the shortest notice, Organs, worth from $800 to $12,000. And by prompt and faithful execution of orders hope to merit a like encouragement to that heretofore extended to WM. B. D. SIMMONS, and which has indicated the necessity of this business connection, that his entire attention may be devoted to the more difficult and artistic parts of the business, so that an increase thereof may cause no diminution of the personal attention which is requisite for the maintenance of the CHARACTER of our instruments, upon which we rely for success.

While it will be our aim and ambition to furnish ORGANS OF A PERFECTION OF TONE AND MECHANISM, AND OF AN ELEGANCE OF EXTERIOR UNSURPASSED, we are confident of ability to offer terms MORE FAVORABLE THAN CAN BE OBTAINED ELSEWHERE, for the following reasons: Having ample means, we can purchase in large quantities at first cost, for cash; can always command the most talented assistants, and also do sufficient business to practise division of labor, which, by assigning parts to workmen skilled in their particular branch, necessarily insures better work at less expense. Our Manufactory, by its proximity to Charles river, enables us to receive lumber direct from the vessel at first cost, and having been erected expressly for the business, is in arrangement, size, convenience and its facilities unequalled, being furnished with steam engine, steam-heated drying-house, planing, grooving, matching, moulding, tenoning, boring, and other machines, together with lath scroll, circular and other saws, &c., all operated by steam power.

These facilities are such as are possessed by no other manufacturer of Organs in this country, and of themselves would enable us to furnish instruments, with a fair profit, at a price which those of like quality must cost builders who have work done by hand that can be better executed at half the cost by steam machinery.

Second hand Organs at all times for sale.
Orders for tuning church organs promptly attended to, and contracts taken for tuning by the year.
Orders respectfully solicited.

FIRST PREMIUM MELODEONS,

The Very Best now Manufactured.

S. D. & H. W. SMITH respectfully call the attention of the public to their IMPROVED MELODEONS, constantly on exhibition at their Warerooms,

No. 417 Washington Street.

By means of a new method of voicing, known only to themselves, they have succeeded in removing the harsh and buzzing sound which formerly characterized the instrument, rendering the tones full, clear and organ-like. The action is prompt and reliable, enabling the performer to execute the most rapid music without obscuring the tones. The swell is arranged to give great expression.

The manufacturers received the First Premium, over all competitors, at the Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association; also at the Metropolitan Mechanics' Fair, held at Washington, D. C.

For the Parlor, instruments are furnished at prices varying from $45 to $150.

Larger instruments, with two banks of keys, for chapels and small churches, from $150 to $800.

This last instrument, known as the ORGAN HARMONIUM, has been essentially improved by Messrs. Smith, and they have secured a patent therefor.

Persons who wish to hire Melodeons with a view of purchasing at the end of the year, can have the rents credited as part payment of the purchase money.

Chat with Rossini.

By FERDINAND HILLER.

Translated for this Journal from the Zeitung of Cologne.

IV.

ROSSINI sang the beginning of a string Quartet by HAYDN. Could a piece be commenced in a more noble manner? he exclaimed. What an abandon, what a grace is in this motive!

—I do not believe that Haydn in the string Quartet, said I, has ever been surpassed by any composer, not even by BEETHOVEN.

—Charming works indeed are these Quartets, said the mäestro with warmth; what a lovely interchange of the four instruments! and what a subtlety in the modulations! All composers of consequence have fine modulations; but those of Haydn always had for me a quite peculiar, individual charm.

—Have you already had occasion to hear these compositions in Italy? I asked.

—Already in Bologna, in my boyhood. I had got together a quartet of strings, in which I played the viola as well as might be. The first violinist had at first only a few of Haydn's works, but I kept urging him to procure more and more, so that I gradually became familiar with a considerable number of them. At that time I studied Haydn with peculiar partiality. You should have been present when I directed "The Creation" at the Lyceum in Bologna! In truth I suffered no slip in any performer to escape me, for I knew every note by heart. "The Seasons," too, I studied, as after leaving the Lyceum I was made director of the Philharmonic concerts.

—"The Seasons" are perhaps still richer in invention, than "The Creation," said I. Certainly the text afforded more room for variety.

—It may be so, replied Rossini; but there is a certain higher feeling pervading "The Creation," which makes me prefer it. How splendid is this Aria—, and the chorus in B flat,—and the air of Raphael (the mäestro sang the beginnings of all these pieces),—and what a wonderful instrumental composition is the Chaos! But nothing cleaves to one more deeply, than the impressions of first youth. I knew in Vienna an Italian, CALPANI, who, having resided there for many years, had been a great deal in the society of Haydn. He was never weary of telling me about the kind-heartedness, the gentleness and modesty of the old master.

—He showed the greatest justice towards others, said I, and declared to MOZART's father, in the simplest words, that he esteemed his son the greatest of all composers.

—He certainly expressed his real thought, and he was right, exclaimed the mäestro.

—I have never seen one of his operas, I continued; but, strangely enough, they do not seem to have been of much account.

—I have read them through in Vienna, at the house of a passionate admirer of Haydn, who boasted that he possessed all his compositions, said Rossini. They are insignificant works, in which scarcely a trait here and there reminds you of the great composer. I believe he composed them all at an early age, merely to oblige prince ESTERHAZY and his singers. Do you know his cantata, Ariadne?

—I played it through once, a long time ago, but I have never heard it, and there is nothing remaining of it in my memory, said I, somewhat ashamed.

—Apart from the oratorios, it is to me the dearest vocal composition of Haydn—the Adagio especially is very fine, said Rossini, and he began to sing a considerable piece of it.

—You really know our German masters better than I do, I exclaimed, and I begin to grow jealous of you. Are you as well acquainted, then, with your Italian predecessors?

—I have read through a great deal.

—Have you heard many of PAISIELLO's operas performed?

—In my young days they had nearly vanished from the Italian stage. GENERALI, FIORAVANTI, PAER, but above all SIMON MAIR were the order of the day.

—Do you like Paisiello?

—His music passes agreeably by the ear, but neither as regards harmony nor melody is it distinguished, and it has never interested me particularly. His principle was, with a small motive to compose a whole piece—which gave little life and particularly little dramatic expression.

—Did you know him personally?

—I saw him in Naples, after his return from Paris, where he acquired some fortune. NAPOLEON liked to hear his music, and Paisiello boasted of it in a rather naïve manner, telling everybody that the great Emperor was peculiarly fond of his music, because it did not hinder him from thinking about other things. A singular praise! Nevertheless his soft music was universally preferred in its day—every epoch has its own peculiar taste.

—Was Paisiello an interesting man?

—His exterior was fine, powerful, almost imposing; but he was shockingly uncultivated and immeasurably insignificant. You should have read a letter of his! I speak not of the handwriting, nor of the orthography—I can pardon that; but the inaptitude of the expression, the flatness of the thoughts, are beyond all conception!

A very different man was CIMAROSA,—a fine, cultivated mind. Do you know anything of his? —The Matrimonio Segreto, of course, I answered; also I have read through "The Horatii."

—In the latter there is not so much. On the other hand there is an Opera Buffa by him, Le trame deluse, which is altogether excellent.

—Better than the Matrimonio Segreto?

—Incomparably more important. There is a Finale in the second act (it is almost too great for a last Finale), which is a genuine masterpiece. Unfortunately the libretto is miserably bad. I also remember an aria in his oratorio, Isaaco, in which there is one passage especially, which is very striking and dramatic as to harmony. A pure inspiration, for in general, as you know, he was no great harmonist.

—It is difficult with us to obtain the works of these composers, said I. One must go in person and spend a year in Italy for this purpose. The library of the Conservatoire of Naples especially, must contain extraordinary treasures.

—There is an astonishing quantity stored away there, said Rossini; the collective manuscripts of Cimarosa, too, must be to be found there. Formerly they were in the possession of the Cardinal Gonsalvi, who cherished a passionate regard for Cimarosa. One could not give him a greater pleasure, than by singing him some pieces of his favorite. I did this often during my stay in Rome, and he was truly grateful to me for it.

—And your own manuscripts, mäestro,—I fancy, you do not possess many of them?

—Not a note.

—But where in the world are they?

—Heaven knows. I had the right, at the end of a year, to demand them back from the copyist, but I never made any use of it. Some of them may be in Naples; some are in Paris; the fate of the rest is unknown to me.

—Have you not at least preserved your studies with Padre MATTEI?

—I had them for many years—but one day when I came back to Bologna, they were no more to be found. Whether they were thrown away, or stolen, or sold for waste paper, I know not.

—You are not perhaps in possession of the engraved scores and piano arrangements of your operas, mäestro! said I, laughing.

—What should I want of them? It is years since any music has been made in my house. Shall I study them?

—And the opera, Ermione, which one of your biographers says that you have kept mysteriously, to leave it to posterity—how about that?

—It lies with the others.

—You told me formerly about that opera, that you had made it too dramatic, and—it had fallen through.

—And very justly, said Rossini, in a cheerful tone, it was very tedious.

—Does it contain no airs, then, no finales, nothing of all that, with which you always knew how to intoxicate the people?

—You are very kind, said the mäestro, ironically, but there was really nothing in it,—all recitative-like and declamatory. I wrote one Cavatina in it for DAVID; the poor fellow had to have something to sing. This has had some circulation, and probably you know it. It begins . . . (and the mäestro sang the first motive).

—I have often heard it, without knowing that it was taken from that opera. But here comes General MONET—let us ask him for some explanations in relation to the last telegraphic despatches (from Sebastopol).

—That we will. Curious music, they perform there—very strongly instrumented! But when shall we get to the Finale?

V.

Our esteemed master NEUKOMM was also passing a couple of weeks in September with his friends in Trouville. He wished to see Rossini, and as he had not met him for twenty-five years, I called with him. Rossini at once recollected how at that time, at the Duchess of Vaudemont's, Neukomm had given him some hints about the construction of an Aeolian harp, of which he had several made at the country seat of his friend Aguado. The two distinguished men conversed together in the most cordial manner. I had told Rossini much about Neukomm, especially of his incredible, and really wonderful activity, which kept him prisoner at his writing desk from the earliest hour of morning. Thereupon Rossini began.

You are still ever unwearied in producing, Signor Chevalier, he said to him.

—When it comes to such a pass that I can work no more, replied Neukomm, they may lay me between six boards and nail them up; I shall not care to know any more of life.

—You have the passion of industry, I always have had that of laziness! exclaimed Rossini.

—The forty operas of your composing are not exactly a proof of that, replied Neukomm.

—That was long ago. But one should bring into the world with him whip-cords instead of nerves, said the mäestro somewhat seriously. But let us leave that. You have travelled extensively, and indeed have been for several years in Brazil?

—I had accepted the place of court-kapellmeister with Don PEDRO, who was a very music-loving gentleman. He even busied himself with composition.

—I can tell you something about that, said Rossini. He had been so gracious, as to send me an order. Afterwards when he came, somewhat against his will, to Paris, I thanked him for it, and, as I had heard about his compositions, I asked him to allow something of them to be performed at the Italian Opera, to which he willingly consented.

—He would even have directed, had you wished it, interrupted Neukomm.

—Impossible! He sent me a Cavatina, which I had copied out, with the addition of a few trombone blasts; it was well performed in a concert at the Italian Opera, received quite a respectable applause, and Don Pedro in his box appeared to feel great pleasure in it,—at all events he thanked me in the warmest manner.—

I must insert here by way of completion of this little anecdote, that I spoke of it in the saloon of the Countess B. I remember that evening perfectly well, said the Countess, for Don Pedro came after the concert into the Tuileries and looked perfectly transfigured. He declared that he had never in all his life experienced so great a pleasure. These enthusiastic outbursts on the part of a man, who had just lost an empire, appeared strange enough.

—Perhaps it is not always the weightiest things, that give us the greatest pleasure, I took the liberty of remarking.

—Another forenoon I was with Rossini at Neukomm's. The latter had in his chamber a little Orgue expressif, which contained many improvements and conveniences suggested by himself. With the youthful vivacity, peculiar to him, Neukomm explained all the details and begged Rossini to try the instrument. He sat down and played, as well as he could, a couple of dozen bars of the "Chaos" from the "Creation," which was naturally very gratifying to the old scholar of Haydn. Then I played with Neukomm some movements from "The Seven Words," which he had arranged for piano and orgue expressif, which led to mention of the fact that Neukomm had performed this labor for a great number of the greatest works of Handel, Haydn and Mozart, of course simply for his own satisfaction and the pleasure of a few friends.

Afterwards as we walked away together, Rossini said, evidently moved: Such industry, such genuine simple love of Art are in the highest degree honorable. No money interest comes in play there, no self-love, or at least so small a dose of it, that it is not worth speaking of. I have great respect for it!

Life of John Sebastian Bach;

WITH A CRITICAL VIEW OF HIS COMPOSITIONS, BY J. N. FÖRER.

CHAPTER VIII.

In order to produce works of such excellence as Bach has left behind him, in various branches, it is clear, he must have composed a great deal. For the greatest genius in the world, unless he be daily exercised in his art, can never produce works which a competent judge could pronounce to be perfect and complete throughout. Constant practice can alone attain to true greatness. But it would be highly erroneous to pronounce all the productions of this unwearied practice to be master-pieces, because master-pieces are the final result of it. And this is not unexemplified in Bach's works. Though there are to be found, even in his earliest attempts, unquestionable evidences of great genius, yet they, at the same time, exhibit so much that is useless, weak, eccentric and tasteless, that they are unworthy of being preserved, at least, for the public at large, and are chiefly interesting for the connoisseur, as serving to trace the course which such a genius has pursued, from the beginning of his career. To assist us to distinguish these juvenile efforts or exercises, from his real master-pieces, Bach has furnished us with two criterions, and critical comparison may afford a third. He was above forty years of age when his first work appeared; and what he himself, at that mature age, deemed worthy of publication, we may, surely, pronounce to be good. A great portion of his compositions, however, were merely circulated in manuscript; and to judge of these, we must resort partly to critical comparison, and partly, also, to those sure tests, which Bach himself has given us. Bach, like all other true geniuses, never entirely laid aside the file of the critic, but improved any of his early works that were capable of improvement, and even extended his care to some of those works already engraven; and hence arose the differences in the old and new copies; and he himself clearly conceived the pieces so altered to be worthy of improvement, and capable of being made really fine works of Art. Under this head, you may reckon most of what he composed before the year 1725, as will be presently more particularly mentioned in the following list. There are a great many later compositions which, for reasons easily to be understood, are, likewise, known only in manuscript, but which bear, too decidedly, the stamp of perfection, to allow us to doubt whether we shall class them among the essays, or among the chef d'œuvres of this accomplished master.

Bach's engraved works, are as follows:—1. Clavierübung, or Exercises for the Clavichord; consisting of preludes, allemandes, courants, sarabands, jigs, minuets, &c., for the amusement of amateurs. Opus 1, published by "the author, 1731." This work consists of six suites; the first appeared in 1726, and the others followed in succession, till in 1731 they were all engraved together. This work made in its day, a great noise in the musical world: such superior compositions for the harpsichord had never been before heard. He, who learnt to play some of these pieces well, could make his fortune by them, in the musical world; and even now a young artist might gain much knowledge from them; they are so brilliant, tuneful and expressive, and ever new. In the new edition, they bear the title of "Exercices pour le Clavecin." 2.—"Clavierübung, or Exercises for the Clavichord; consisting of a concerto in the Italian style, and an overture in the French style, for a harpsichord, with two rows of keys. Second part, published by Christopher Weigel, in Nuremberg." 3.—"Clavierübung, or Exercises for the Clavichord; consisting of various preludes to the Catechismal, &c., and other hymns for the Organ, composed for the amusement of amateurs, and especially for judges of such works. Third part, published by the author." Besides the preludes and fugues for the organ, which are all master-pieces, this collection also contains four duets for the clavichord, which are models for duets, and admit no third part. 4. "Sechs Chordale, or Six Choral Melodies, of various kinds, to be played on one organ, having two rows of keys, and a pedal. Zella on Thuringia Forest. Published by J. G. Schübler." They are full of solemn and religious expression. In some of them we may see how Bach's method of managing stops differed from the usual one. For instance in the second chorale, "Wo soll ich fliehen hin," &c., he gives to the first 8, to the second 16, and to the pedal 4 feet. The pedal is made to perform the cantum firmum. 5. "Clavierübung, or Exercises for the Clavichord; consisting of an air, with several variations for the harpsichord, with two rows of keys. Published by Balthaer Schmid, at Nuremberg." This excellent work has thirty variations, in which there are canons in all intervals, and movements from the unison to the ninth, with the most easy and flowing melody. It has, also, a four-part fugue, and besides, several very brilliant variations for two clavicords; and to conclude, a quodlibet, as it is called, which might alone immortalize its author, though it is here far from holding the first place. For this model, according to which all variations should be made, though for obvious reasons, not one of the kind has ever been attempted,—for this model we have to thank Count Kaiserling, formerly Russian Ambassador at the court of the Elector of Saxony, who often resided at Leipzig, and brought with him Goldberg, of whom whom we have before spoken, in order to have him taught by Bach. The Count was a great invalid, and passed many sleepless nights; and, on these occasions, Goldberg, who lived in the same house with him, used to remain during the night, in an adjoining room, to play to him while he remained awake. The Count once expressed a wish to Bach to have some harpsichord pieces for Goldberg, of a soothing yet cheerful character, which should afford him some amusement during those sleepless hours. Bach thought that this desire would be best gratified by variations, which he had hitherto looked upon as an ungrateful labor, on account of the continual sameness of their fundamental harmonies. But these variations became in his hands, models of Art, as, indeed, were all his compositions of this period. They are the only model of the kind he has left us. The Count always called them his variations, and was never tired of hearing them; and long afterwards, when ever he lay awake at night, he used to say: "Do, dear Goldberg, play me one of my variations."

Bach was, perhaps, better rewarded for this than for any other of his works. The Count presented him with a golden goblet, containing a hundred louis d'ors; but had it been a thousand, it would not have been overrated as a work of Art. It should be observed, that in the engraved copies of these variations, there are some important errata which the composer has carefully corrected in his own copy.

Diary Abroad.—No. 29.

BERLIN, NOV. 11.—LENZ's new book! Part First, "Life of the Master, BEETHOVEN," 8vo. pp. 293.

Page 5th. "Beethoven was hardly seven years old when his father concluded to educate him as a musician. The old custom in common life, of bringing up the son in the footsteps of his father, so often a cause of misery, was to the advantage of Beethoven; him it raised aloft! The future creator of the Sinfonia Eroica withdrew into the little room in the attic of the modest gabled house in the Bonngasse, which resembles the birth house of MOZART in Salzburg, as the overture to the Zauberflöte does that to Orphee. Here, high up under the roof, the boy practiced the violin entrusted to him among the heaps of dusty books and his father's piles of music, yellow with age, which contained more dust than soul. His only society was a huge spider, so musically inclined, that it instantly left its corner, so oft as it heard this boy, the elect to so grand a destiny, and let itself down upon the instrument of the roof-virtuoso. He however had just so little fear of the ugly creature, as he had thirty years after in swearing solemnly eternal hostility in his violin concerto in D, (see op. 61 in Catalogue*) to the prevailing empty concerto style. On the other hand the child learned to love the spider, but this was not to last. The mother of the boy, not knowing the instinct and its love for her son, destroyed it in the absence of the roof-virtuoso. So ended his first love. Whether the insect was musical, or more probably unmusical, is not decided by Quatremere Disjournal, who relates the fact in his Araneologie."

An interesting and beautiful story, is it not? Mr. Lenz however has not given it exactly as it was communicated to the Leipsiger Musik Zeitung in 1800, [vol. II., p. 653] by D. Hager, of Altenburg. This gentleman expressly states that he copies from Disjournal, and relates the death of the spider thus: "One day his aunt [not the spider's] who filled the place of mother to the boy, entered the room and brought some one to witness the talents of the young violinist. He played, the spider stayed not away, but finally mounted to his arm. The aunt suddenly sprang forward, knocked the insect to the floor with her slipper, and trod upon it instantly. Horrified sank the young man to the floor in a fainting fit."

Note by D. Hager:

("The young artist then, is the so celebrated Beethoven now. Whoever wishes can learn the truth of this circumstance as often as he will by applying to his former teacher, citizen Le Mierre, at Paris.")

One or two points in Lenz's relation sound a little as though he had gone to FETIS or the ——— for his facts. They however are easily corrected.

1. Beethoven's father decided to educate him to music before he was four years old. Wegeler and Mayor Windeck of Bonn, in the controversy about B.'s birth house, testify to having seen the child at that early age standing in tears at the pianoforte, whither he was forced by his father.

2. At seven years of age the Beethoven family no longer lived in the Bonngasse; they left it soon after the birth of the Ludwig.

3. There is no evidence that the father, Johann van Beethoven, ever composed a note of music, and much circumstantial evidence that the heaps of dusty books are a Fétis-like ornament to the story.

4. The instrument on which the boy had to practice was the piano forte, and not the violin.

5. It was in a back room of the house in the Rheingasse, where Wegeler saw him at work in tears.

As to the anecdote of the spider, Lenz acknowledges that Beethoven in after years denied it. SCHINDLER says so expressly; but believes it nevertheless, on this ground: "Beethoven," says he, "hated everything that reminded one of 'Sensiblerie,' and just on this account he was able to speak such wisdom in the mysterious language of his music to the finer but true feelings of the human heart."

I do not believe it, on these grounds:

1. That B. studied the pianoforte so as in his eleventh year to play BACH, and publish sonatas—how should he study the violin?

2. In his eighteenth year he plays viola in the Elector's orchestra, which does not look like being a violinist of note.

3. In the story told in the Zeitung, an aunt is the actor, who supplies the place of a mother. Now there is no other account whatsoever that Beethoven's father or mother had a sister, and his mother did not die until he was nearly eighteen years old.

4. I have done what Mr. Lenz should have done, hunted up Disjournal's book at an antiquarian bookseller's, and not taken extracts on trust. I find my side of the question strengthened by the account as it stands there.

This "Araneologie" is a thin octavo of 117 pages, in German, translated from the second edition of the French work and published at Frankfurt am Main in 1796. The author during an imprisonment of "eighty-nine months" made the habits of spiders his study, and especially observed them in their capacity of natural barometers. The third chapter is upon "Spiders in their relation to men," and closes with two anecdotes, one of which is the one in question. Herr Hager has not given the close of the story quite in the author's words. Here it is: "The spider did not omit to appear immediately after the first stroke of the bow, and, according to its custom, to draw nearer and nearer, and finally to rest itself upon the hand of the young artist. But for the good aunt to snatch off her slipper, hastily to brush the hateful spider from its favorite position to the floor, and, pitiless, to crush it—was all one. Oh, reader! that I could pass over the close of the story in silence! The poor boy complained not, he wept not. In a swoon he sinks to the floor. He is conveyed to his bed; he is quite insensible. For more than three months he fluctuates between life and death, and when at last he once more can speak, he calls continually, and, alas! in vain for his dear, dear spider."

Touching, is it not?

Now I cannot believe Wegeler would have passed this over in silence, nor that Beethoven would have lied about it, if true.

The note in parenthesis, given above, as by D. Hager, is an incorrect translation of the following note on page 86 of Disjournal's book:

"The then young artist, is now [1798] the first violinist existing [certainly then not Beethoven]; in one word, it is the celebrated BERTHOE. Any one can, as to the truth of the above related circumstance, inquire as often as he will of citizen Le Mierre, his teacher."

But, perhaps Berthome is a misprint for Beethoven. Let us ask Schilling. (See Schilling's Lexicon.)

"Berthome, (the first name has never been known) an artist in many respects distinguished and remarkable; a violinist and composer; born at Paris about 1756, already as a boy of eight years he drew the attention of the artists and dilettanti of that city to him by the public performance of difficult violin concertos; a powerful genius developed itself in the fast growing youth, whose spiritual seemed to hurry on in advance of his corporeal nature; still his father, who at the same time was his only teacher, held the reins very tightly; he is said to have accomplished wonders in the paths of the greatest violinists, and yet even the well known anecdote of the spider, which, according to his own account, related to him and not to another young virtuoso of whom the Leipsiger Musik Zeitung tells it—the spider which is said to have appeared during his playing—could not convince his father of the already achieved unsurpassability [a good German word!], of the expressive and finished style and the deep-grounded musical knowledge of his fourteen-year-old son."

He became the violinist of his day, and died in 1802.

An error is the longest and most manifold lived animal that exists. I think, for the readers of Dwight, one of that cat's lives is at an end; and yet see if in a month from this time the story is not going the rounds on Lenz's authority.

Therefore I do not believe the story of Beethoven and the spider.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, DEC. 11.—It is really a relief to be able to write that DE LA GRANGE has appeared in a new rôle, without making a decided success. Hitherto every fresh appearance has been a new triumph, and the critics had fairly exhausted all the adjectives of praise; but her Lucretia Borgia was far from satisfactory. She was not at home in her rôle; it is said that it is the first time of her singing it, and to-night at AMODIO's benefit all this may be remedied. Of course she is always the finished artist and maintains her rank as the very first singer of the lighter, the LIND and SONTAG school, now living. But it is physically impossible for her to represent the profligate of the Italian librettist. Her personal appearance forbids it, and her voice is not that large organ so indispensable for such rôles as Norma and Lucretia. Here she is as much out of place as WAS GRISI as Amina or Rosina.

The performance of I Puritani on Wednesday night was a most curious affair. DE LA GRANGE was of course faultless, for this is one of her most acceptable rôles; but the new basso, CASPANI, has an organ hardly capable of filling that elegant saloon which the CHICKERINGS of your city have so generously fitted up. Of course we only saw him, and his head dressed à la malcontent, with a long, lank figure and face, relieved only by a moustache, which from its size seemed to make up for the hair that was not on his caput, reminded me only of the far-famed Don Quixote de la Mancha. Getting very near the stage I did hear enough to surmise that he might be very acceptable in a drawing room. I hear that he has wisely determined to return to Europe. MORALLI was artistic of course, but he has found out that New Yorkers have an over-weening fondness for noise, and exaggerates a little too much. Then the orchestra, although composed of our very best instrumentists, and without a superior in America, got entirely out once or twice, and MA-RETZEK either could not or would not put them back again. There he sat, flourishing his bâton, indeed, pretty freely, but apparently quite indifferent to the confusion which was evident. I never listened to a worse performance.

I had forgotten to mention BRIGNOLI, and perhaps it is as well as it is, since an apology was made for him and he had reason to labor under some excitement from a duel that did not come off during the day. Signor PATAMIA, husband of the very acceptable comprimaria who debuted as Bertha, and an artist whose clever caricatures of some of our opera people have attracted much attention in Goupil's window, had some disagreement with the tenore assoluto, words passed and a challenge ensued; the duel was fixed to come off that Wednesday with small swords, this weapon having been selected as less dangerous and noisy than the pistol. "Sober second thoughts" came in time, however, and the parties concluded to apologize and make up. There are very many versions afloat of this little operatic episode, but it is hardly worth the while to enter more in detail for your readers.

Has it ever struck you how strangely our opera troupe is at present composed? We have one prima donna; fortunately her strength of endurance is sufficient for three; two comprimaries, very good in their way; two seconde donne, whose first appearance here was so long ago that I have forgotten all about it; four tenori, Brignoli a little better than the others; one good buffo; two very acceptable baritoni; three very unacceptable bassi and not one primo basso; and four contralti, one of whom deserves the name; one contralto is considered sufficient for a troupe; Mr. PAINE has four. The consequence is that one of them, VENTALDI, has not yet been heard by our public and is not likely to be in the few nights that remain. I have been somewhat favored, however, as I had the opportunity, seated behind her, of hearing her accompany sotto voce the whole of I Puritani the other night, but I await a public appearance before forming an opinion as to her merits.

NANTIER-DIDIÉE made her appearance in Trovatore last night, and gave quite a new idea to the rôle of Azucena; I can understand how VIARDOT GARCIA made such a sensation in it abroad. Didiée is an excellent singer and a true artist, completing the trio of the Academy troupe.

Mr. EISFELD's second Soirée will be given on Saturday night. A quartet by RUBINSTEIN will be the novelty; I am curious to hear NOLL holding the first violin for young Germany. Mr. TIMM will play in SPOHR's second Quintet, and Mme. WALLACE-BOUCHELLE will sing an aria from MOZART and a ballad by Mr. Eisfeld.

MASON and BERGMANN's second Matinée is for Tuesday of next week. BEETHOVEN's 7th Quartet, ROBERT SCHUMANN's Quartet for piano and strings, GOUNOD's meditations on a prelude of BACH, for piano, violin and 'cello, and CHOPIN's A flat Ballade, for the programme. MILAMO.

PHILADELPHIA, DEC. 9.—The original oratorio of "The Cities of the Plain" was sung last evening for the first time, at Concert Hall, by the Harmonia Sacred Music Society, which has the credit of being the only association in the United States, willing to bring out American compositions of any bulk. Would that the success with which its efforts are crowned, were an incentive to other musical societies to follow its example. It is rare for American composers to obtain a hearing, and every one will acknowledge how much more unusual it is for them to be heard a second time. As far as my knowledge extends, this is an honor that has been attained solely by WILLIAM H. FRY, G. F. BRISTOW, and F. T. S. DARLEY, in his two oratorios of "Belshazzar" and "The Cities of the Plain"; the last named composer has the field of sacred music to himself, and is the only American who has acquired any notoriety in this elevated range of Art.

The libretto of "The Cities of the Plain" is better than oratorio books usually are, and the author, JOSEPH A. NUNES, Esq., is not ashamed to acknowledge it as his. The latter portion is quite good. The words are printed in a neat pamphlet of sixteen pages or so, with explanatory notes that are great helps to a proper conception of the composer's meaning. I confess that, occasionally, the auditor is called upon to hear what is by no means represented in the organ accompaniment; in an orchestra, perhaps, the effects spoken of might have been found. I cut the story of the oratorio from the bills, as follows:

The Story of the Oratorio is merely founded upon the events recorded in Genesis, Chapter 19; the composer and the author of the libretto having preferred to make a plot calculated to afford a variety of musical situations rather than to follow the text closely. It was therefore deemed best to call it "THE CITIES OF THE PLAIN," instead of Lot, which last would appear to be a more correct title for the Scriptural record, and to make the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah the leading feature, instead of the Patriarch's providential rescue. The argument may be given briefly, thus:—Lot's household are assembled to sing their evening praises to Jehovah, as they close, the Angel of the Lord appears, and is invited into the house by Lot and his two daughters. The heavenly messenger foretells the coming punishment of the sinful cities, and warns the Hebrew Patriarch to flee from the anger of the Lord. The first portion ends with thanks to God for the protection extended over this one just household. The second part shows the Priests of Dagon revelling in the temple of their false deity, one of the daughters of Lot is brought in, having been wandering through the city, and she is commanded to worship the idol; this she refuses to do, and is condemned to perish in flames on the altar. As they drag her to her fate, Lot appears with his other daughter, and interrupts the sacrifice, warning the guilty priests of the impending doom of the Almighty. They do not heed, and will not give up their victim. Lot calls his household to his aid, and compels the heathens to surrender his child, with whom he departs. The priests resume their festivities, but are interrupted by the storm of fire which commences the destruction of the cities. In the midst of their despair, and vain appeals to their false gods, Lot is heard passing the temple on his way from the burning town, solemnly praising Jehovah. The temple is destroyed, and the Oratorio ends with a simple choral.

This choral runs through the entire work, and,—the notes say, is the type of Lot, in the same way that a certain peculiar passage of some four bars is always heard before the Angel's voice,—an odd method of creating a "unity." The choral is treated in a variety of ways, and in counterpoint with several dissimilar subjects, quite ingeniously, and in some instances with considerable effect. Another peculiarity of the entire work is the difference preserved in the style of the heathen and Hebrew music, the former being generally minor, the latter major.

I cannot pretend to criticize an important composition as this really is, after a single hearing, and without ever having seen a single bar of the score; I can only give my impressions of it as in comparison with "Belshazzar," as an original work, and in regard to its suitability for an oratorio, after which, if I have space, I will tell you what I consider the best parts of it.

First. Is it, or not, an improvement upon the composer's previous cantata or oratorio, of "Belshazzar?" Yes, and No. Let me explain this vague answer. "Belshazzar" had the faults of a first effort, crude treatment of ideas that were too decidedly French and Italian to be purely original; in "The Cities of the Plain" we find well marked phrases clearly handled, and judiciously treated. It bears the marks of better directed study, more care, and far more acquaintance with the art of composition. At the same time it has not the number of decided melodies that "Belshazzar" had; I grant they are more flowing and easier perhaps, of execution, but they have not, generally speaking, the ear-catching properties of the former production. The concerted music is much better in "The Cities of the Plain;" there are several pieces of part-writing far superior to any in "Belshazzar," but none of them are as striking as the Terzette: 'Tis in vain, which often occurs to my memory even at the present time, although nearly two years have elapsed since I heard it. There is one great fault in the first part of "The Cities of the Plain," a monotony of time and rhythm, which makes it seem tiresome to me; so you see my answer was correct, for while the new oratorio is better written, it is not so pleasing as the young composer's initial effort.

Second: as an original work. I am not given to admire American attempts in the high range of musical composition; there is always a want of that indescribable spirit which is infused into foreign works by the constant study of the old masters, a study too much neglected here. European composers have better opportunities to perfect themselves in the art than are afforded by our institutions, and, except in instances of remarkable genius, they seem to model their writings upon the style of some acknowledged celebrity, thus giving a distinctive character to their own compositions. In America the young tyros follow everybody's lead, and generally give us a work that is a patchwork of all sorts of styles, without any originality. Mr. Fry, in his opera of "Leonora," is an exception to my remark, as he followed BELLINI with such extreme fidelity, as to produce a copy rather than an imitation. Mr. Bristow's "Rip Van Winkle" is a patchwork, so was Mr. Darley's "Belshazzar" a patchwork of MEYERBEER, AUBER and BELLINI, as was stated at the time in a criticism published in the Journal of Music. But let me be candid enough to state that Mr. Darley is now forming a style for himself, modelled on Meyerbeer still, but less trammelled by recollections of strains he has heard, and indicating a gradual enlargement from his first standpoint. I am willing to say that "The Cities of the Plain," particularly the second part, is the first American work I have heard that gives any promise of future excellence on the part of the composer.

Third; as regards its suitability for an oratorio. In speaking as I really think in regard to the music in this light, I must allow that it is not what it should be. There are none of those solemn choruses that distinguish the oratorio from every other class of composition, none of the descriptive music identified with it, none of the recitatives which are inseparable from the followers of HANDEL and HAYDN. The choruses are all simple, with two exceptions, and not in the least like oratorio choruses; they are pastoral, or light, while the exceptions I have named; one preceding the storm is a concerted operatic finale, and the other a broken up bacchanale, apparently a double chorus between the people of the falling cities, and the priests revelling in the temple. These two compositions are the best in the work, and are very original, but not in oratorio style. The recitatives are very few and short, and always dramatic in construction. The solos may be similarly described. May I not say then that "The Cities of the Plain" is a sacred opera, and not an oratorio? You would say so, friend Dwight, were you to hear it, for all the concerted music smells of scenery and savors of foot-lights: none the worse for that, as music.

The pieces I prefer are four in number; the two trios, one in each part, the bacchic song of the High Priest, and the first of the two choruses I have called exceptions. The first trio is where Lot and his daughter invite the Angel to enter their dwelling, and the melody and movement of the parts expresses an invitation as plainly as any music can. I am not, generally, a believer in imitative music, but the trio is so appropriate to the words that I cannot avoid mentioning it. The second trio is more operatic, and is sung by two priests of Dagon and the daughter of Lot in the temple; it is somewhat complicated in treatment, but the phrasing is even, good and well suited for vocal performance. The chorus I speak of, is sung by the household of Lot breaking into the temple and demanding the release of the captive maid. It commences energetically in fugue style, but turns into an Allo. Presto, of considerable dramatic power, ending with a novel crescendo and rapid descending scale, with all the parts in unison. The High Priest's drinking song follows this, and commanded an encore, quite a breach of decorum on the part of the audience, though I was not surprised at the wish to hear it over, as it is one of the most inspiring bacchanals I can recall to memory. I do not mean to say that these four fragments are the only good things in the oratorio; there is a drinking chorus opening the second part, (encored) that is quite characteristic, and very light; a soprano cavatina for the captive daughter, pathetic and Meyerbeer-ish; a quintet and plenty more, all worthy of notice.

As my duty, as critic, is to find all the fault I can, let me say, on the whole, the oratorio is long-winded—almost two hours long,—and that the Directors made a mistake in having a second part to the concert. Finally, let me say that the performance was in many parts most excellent; the chorus numbered larger than I ever heard in the Harmonia concerts, was better drilled, and entered most creditably into the ideas of the composer. The words could be heard distinctly despite the large body of performers. The contralto part in the chorus sounded weak in comparison with the overpowering sopranos. The solo singers acquitted themselves well, excepting in one or two places. The soprano and baritone were the best; the bass rather too powerful a voice for the others in the concerted pieces. Mr. BISHOP sang tastefully but nervously, and was not always up to the pitch of the organ. The room was full in every part, and that the oratorio met with complete success cannot be denied by any critic. To fulfil the requirements of my nom de plume, I am compelled to say that the production of "The Cities of the Plain" was creditable to all concerned, the chorus, solo singers, the organist, the society and more than all to the young composer; to encourage him to pursue his studies, and to write more is the duty of every honest musician and critic. VERITAS.

BERLIN, NOV. 12.—The next evening, after the glorious concert described in my last, my fortunate star led me into a select company, where CLARA SCHUMANN and JOACHIM kindly played a couple of pianoforte and violin sonatas by MOZART, and one by BEETHOVEN. I don't understand and follow Mozart's purely instrumental music as I do Beethoven's—it appears to me after another manner. With his vocal music the case is different. His Requiem is almost painful to me, so overpowering are the emotions it awakens; his masses carry me into unknown regions—into the realm of the lofty and magnificent poetry of the Psalms, of Isaiah and Job; his operas are the acme of all that is perfect in the musical expression of mere human emotion; but his symphonies, his quartets and his pianoforte music, set my thoughts rambling into every unknown sphere, and so I found it to be the case in these duet sonatas. They were new to me, and have left a strange impression. Whether that be not the object of them? How they were played—that is not to be spoken.

There is a society of women here, subordinate to the Gustav Adolph Verein—an association for the purpose of assisting feeble German Protestant churches—which arranges for a series of concerts annually, at which distinguished performers kindly assist. One of these concerts took place this evening, and the virtuosos were ALFRED JAEHL and JOACHIM. I have been hearing little else than sober earnest music latterly; within a few days past MOZART's "Idomeneus," GLUCK's "Orpheus and Euridice;" MENDELSSOHN's "Elijah," various symphonies, the grand overtures of Gluck, Beethoven, and music of that quality. It was therefore with a real feeling of delight that a concert of lighter music came in my way, and this was that of this evening. Besides the performances of the two virtuosos, solo, we had an air from the "Prophète," a vocal trio by CURSCHMANN, an air from Mozart's "Titus" for contralto with bassethorn obligato; a trio for female voices from "Tell," and at the beginning, HUMMEL's glorious "Septuor." I was badly seated for this.

The pianoforte part in this was given by Jaell, with his so well known ease and beauty. The other performance by him was of two salon pieces, melodies surrounded with a halo of pearly runs, trills, and beautiful ornaments of all kinds; a kind of music of which I have heard no example from any other artist in Germany, though so popular with us. He pleased, for he was called out again, and gave a third in similar style.

But the charm of the evening to me was JOACHIM. His first performance was SPOHR's Concerto in vocal form in which the violin sang the music in the most delicious style, and the concert closed with a prelude by BACH and a caprice by PAGANINI. But I have exhausted myself—I do not know what further to say. These were difficulties which I did not, with Dr JOHNSON, wish impossible. But,—what I did not expect—each difficulty had a true musical value, and one saw that Paganini was not merely the great virtuoso, he was also the great artist.

As I came out, all exalted and treading upon air, I met Joachim. "How can you play so?" He smiled and instead of replying directly to my question, simply remarked, in relation to the last pieces, which had been announced on the programme as two caprices by Paganini, that he was curious to see if the critics would find out the difference.

A few days before, I had met him with a mutual friend, where the conversation turned upon EMERSON and SHAKESPEARE; Emerson's essay on the great poet in the "Representative Men," forming our text, a part of which we had been reading. I found Joachim a good English scholar, and his appreciation both of Shakespeare and Emerson shows him to be more than a mere virtuoso on the violin. Almost the last thing he said to me was: "To-day I have bought all Emerson's works." I think this fact will not injure him in the esteem of Bostonians.

Two works by him (op. 10 and 11, I think they number) have just appeared; both are for viola and pianoforte. One of these operas contains three duets, "Hebrew melodies," inspired by three of BYRON's poems of the same title. A friend of mine has also a pianoforte and violin sonata by him,—but I cannot learn of any case in which he has played his own music in public! And this great artist is not yet twenty-five years of age. A. W. T.

CONCERTS.

SECOND ORCHESTRAL CONCERT.—Another beautiful Saturday evening, and another fine feast of the best of music. The audience was considerably larger than before, and yet not large enough to fill up the measure of a triumph in that spacious Music Hall. The mass of listeners seemed even more delighted than the first time. The programme proved a little too long, longer than the makers thereof had anticipated;—yet it contained nothing which a true music-lover could regret, or count it other than pure gain to have an opportunity to hear. The chances of hearing the best things come so seldom and so irregularly, that one must sometimes take more than enough at one time to make sure of half enough in the long run. He who would master a science, or a period of history, must he not sometimes read more at a sitting than is good for eyes or brain? Nay, do not even your merest intellectual pleasure-seekers, your light novel-readers, do the same?

The best played piece of the evening was the Symphony, MENDELSSOHN's No. 3, in A minor. Indeed we have scarcely ever listened to a symphony so well performed in Boston—never by so large an orchestra. All was clear and well fused and subdued; the tempi just right; good light and shade; and the composer saw to it that there should be no over-braying of brass here, the score containing no trombone parts. Still ROBERT SCHUMANN says: "Above all it requires gentle blowers." We congratulate Mr. Conductor ZERRAHN on such fruits from a few but thorough drills. This symphony is commonly supposed to have owed its poetic motive to the author's recollections of a visit to Scotland. Yet in the earlier notices of the work, when it first appeared, in Germany and England, about the year 1842 or 1843, (it is dedicated to Queen Victoria,) we find no sort of recognition of these Scotch allusions. On the contrary, Schumann, writing about it in 1843, seems to confound it with the "Italian Symphony" (commonly called No. 4, but really No. 2,) and to feel an Italian atmosphere in it, intimating at the same time that it was commenced in Italy at a much earlier date. How the Scottish origin has at length obtained currency we do not know; but the whole work breathes a northern rather than a southern spirit; in its wild, tender, melancholy melody and coloring, its romantic, breezy, sea-shore character, it is more in affinity with his Hebriden overture, than with almost any of his works. In that intricate, sun-sparkling, dimpled laughter of the Scherzo, too, there seems to be a pointed allusion, at once fond and playful, to a characteristic of Scotch melody, in that emphatic mocking of the cadence of a minor third. There is an old ballad, people's song-like tone pervading the whole work, as it does many of the "Songs without Words." A great peculiarity in its structure is that the leading themes of all four movements are very kindred to each other; the melody moves almost always in the same steps, with a little rhythmical variation; and yet it is not monotonous repetition, but vital, organic, self-unfolding unity. Mendelssohn gives directions in the score to have the several movements follow upon one another without pause, so that you dream through one delicious maze of melody and harmonies from beginning to end.

The first movement is on the whole the richest and most satisfying. How deep and tender the feeling of that opening Andante con Moto, in 3-4 time; and how charmingly the kindred Allegro melody, in 6-8, melts from it and runs away so smoothly and so rapidly, most of the way in octaves between first violins and low tones of the clarinet; how it winds in and out among different instruments, now quiet and individual, now borne along upon the swelling, roaring tide of the whole orchestra; how it keeps its sweet sad mood, relieved only by one little bit of the sunshiny major, all the rest being minor; how fondly it repeats and echoes its own graceful turns, and makes itself remote or present! Then, after the repeat, what wild, strange, sea-shore modulations, the cool, mysterious thrill of ocean and the infinite! Then, when again the violins and clarinet resume the theme, how infinitely expressive is that sympathetic accompanying melody of the violoncello! and when again those shuddering modulations occur, how the excitement rises to a furious climax and all the strings rush up and down the chromatic scale with a tremendous vehemence; and it all subsides away again, till only flutes and reeds are left streaming in the air, sliding leisurely down tone by tone, and leading back into the Andante, which closes the whole as it commenced it! Nothing could be more beautiful, more unique in conception, and carried out with a more perfect grace and harmony of detail. Yet how different from the same movement of the symphony played last time, the seventh of Beethoven! How much less of strength and grandeur and of that Promethean fire that could defy the gods!

In the Scherzo how vividly the laughing theme leaps out from now one and now another voice; the instruments seem to speak (as Schumann says) like men. And there is a bustling, huddling gleesomeness in the accompaniments, like the little waves that crowd up round the spot where the fountain's column falls. In a hushed staccato the strings whisper another motive, which is taken up by all and developed, with fragments of the laughing theme, whose Scotch cadence is mockingly echoed, as we have said; and it floats sportively away into the distance, in the violins, against a skyey background of oböe and horn tones, the soul charmed away with it in pleased forgetfulness, when with a sudden revulsion of consciousness you are in the minor chord of D, (like a great sob, escaping you involuntarily,) leading with solemn, stately measure and a sound of warning into the Adagio in A, 2-4, a most lovely, deep and tender movement, in which the orchestra seems to sing as it were a Psalm of Life. There is something mysterious and ominous in the march-like harmony of low reed tones and horns by which this melodious flow is interrupted; but all the orchestra falls cheerfully and grandly into the movement, as if accepting the call of destiny not to linger in the sweet, sad dreams of sentiment. But the sweet Psalm triumphs, and its tune is exquisitely varied and embellished with each fond renewal. Upon this bursts, like a flash of sunshine over the sombre water, the Allegro vivacissimo, a most dashing, brilliant theme, pausing anon to let a more pensive melody of reeds be heard; but with rough, impatient vehemence the basses break off the episode, and the bacchic frenzy of the movement storms itself away again, till its force is spent, and the quiet, naïve little reed theme gets another chance, and runs fondling and chatting along in duet between bassoon and oböe, and the strain sinks to sleep as in the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture. There is a short finale, in A major, in kindred rhythm and melody with the first Allegro, but with a bold and somewhat swaggering pomp of movement, as if all were breaking up and marching off home from a glorious festival. But how is it possible to recall these things in words! Again, let us thank Mr. Zerrahn and his orchestra for rendering it so clear.

The vocal piece, which followed, was hardly of the taking and effective kind for a promiscuous audience. Its only fault was that it was perhaps too good. We mean the aria: O cara imagine, from the Zauberflöte, one of the gems, pure inspirations, which MOZART introduced occasionally, as if in sign that it was really he, into that strange melodramatic medley which he wrote to order, according to the clap-trap suggestions of his friend, the Vienna manager, whom he saved from ruin by it. It is not an Air, to be sure, after the popular pattern, but a series of exquisite melodic fragments, or little ejaculations and heart-gushes of melody, with answering phrases in the orchestral. But it is so supremely beautiful and full of soul and of ideal passion, and relieved and completed by such euphonious, mellow instrumentation, that, with Mr. ARTHURSON'S chaste and expressive singing, we still wonder at the apparent coolness with which it was received.

The overture to Leonora, in C, the third of the four which BEETHOVEN wrote for his one great opera, and in which he worked out to their completest expression the ideas which haunted and inspired him to experiment so far, until he threw all aside in favor of a wholly different and more popular kind of overture in E, is universally regarded among musical men abroad as the greatest of all overtures? Nothing could contrast the peculiar genius of Mendelssohn and Beethoven more strikingly than that Symphony and this Overture. The first how exquisitely finished in every detail! how completely and fully every thought in it is stated! In the latter what a simplicity of means, with what a wonderful effect! How sketchy and fragmentary and full of hints and brief suggestions and abrupt changes, it appears at first to one who only listens with the outward ear! But what a unity of deepest sentiment burns throughout the whole! What intense and concentrated passion! Was ever instrumental music so dramatic? What a sense of utter, weary loneliness, as of an imprisoned soul, in those slowly sinking first notes, and that sighing crescendo, like a great ground-swell from the ocean depths of the heart, which follows! How wonderfully suggestive that restless, yearning motive, which stretches itself by successive efforts into the leading theme, the longing for love and liberty! What marvellous presentiment in those wild, sweet out-streamings of the horn tones, and in those expectant, cautious, tip-toe little phrases, (of flute, &c.) so characteristic of this master when he approaches the grand development, and climaxes of his thought! And what climaxes! The greatest that where, when the storm of emotion is at its height, we suddenly hear the distant trumpet announcing deliverance; (the trumpet, unfortunately, shut up too closely in a back room, sounded flat to listeners in the hall.) And then that immense crescendo of the violins before the close;—in no work of musical Art is great expectation more greatly answered from the beginning to the end. The performance was in the main effective, with the exception of that invisible trumpet, and of the want of a much greater mass of strings. We hope we may soon have this overture again, if only for the sure conversion of the skeptical.

A very different overture commenced the second part, and yet a fine one in its way; the overture to "Tell," too well known to need many words. The beautiful introduction of violoncellos was very finely played. The noisy finale, however, so brilliantly worked up from a commonplace rub-a-dub subject, was what carried the elapping portion of the house by storm, notwithstanding that it was the one badly played thing of the evening, especially upon the encore, when the voices rushed pell-mell and the drum was pounded as if it would go through the floor. Probably the wag ROSSINI laughed when he wrote that finale as a "sop to Cerberus," and would have laughed all the more, to have heard it so applauded and so played. One complains that the "German Orchestra" could not treat this music with respect enough. Probably with quite as much respect as the composer; while "William Tell," in the main noble music, and by far Rossini's greatest, is more German than Italian, and more loved and played and sung by Germans.

The Scena from the second act of "Tell," which followed, proved too long. The Romanza: Sombre Foret, was sung by Mrs. J. H. LONG, even more charmingly than at the first concert; her sustained and vanishing high notes and the finishing cadenza were beautiful. The dialogue recitative with Mr. ARTHURSON was much too long, followed as it was by a very long duet, consisting of three several movements or melodies. For this duet, with its strongly accented high tones, and very full orchestral accompaniment, Mr. Arthurson's tenor was not robust enough; but it sounded very sweetly (when not drowned by the instruments), especially in the middle or Andante portion, where the two voices are entwined in a most exquisite melody. The last, that patriotic strain, was taken quite too slow. Otherwise the duet was well sung on both parts; but the orchestra was much too loud and rough, and must learn to subordinate its strength more to the voice part in accompanying. Fortissimo is but a relative term and must not be literally taken always to mean as loud as possible.

Because the duet was too long, many fancied the last piece, that sparkling, wonderfully fresh and festive and variegated finale to the first act of Don Juan to be too long. We are confident no one would have thought so, had it come earlier in the evening. True, it was but an orchestral arrangement, but the voice-parts are represented in the instruments (Leporello by the bassoon, &c.) and all the wealth of ideas and of coloring of that succession of scenes terminating in the ball scene, with the three dance times playing at once, was brought most vividly to mind. It was no "medley," as one critic hinted, no patchwork selection from all parts of the opera, but the entire connected music of the end of the first act.

Beethoven and Mendelssohn, Mozart and Rossini were most characteristically represented in that programme. And that the concert was a fine one, that it produced a deep impression, is proved by the tone of the newspaper criticisms, which are not only admiring and respectful, but candidly and dutifully fault-finding, as all true and high occasions of Art do properly demand of us to be.

MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY.—The elements were most inclement Sunday night; yet there was quite a respectable assemblage in the Tremont Temple, to listen to one of the best performances of the "Messiah," (that is, the greater portion of it,) which we ever heard. The choruses were most of them sung with remarkable accuracy and well-blended power; "All we like sheep," and the Hallelujah, especially. Some of them were perhaps taken a little too fast,—which is the fashion of the times, and in this case not so bad a fault as dragging. We should be glad to hear, too, a more perfect and continuous crescendo than we ever yet heard in the "Wonderful" chorus. The superb organ, under the able hands (and feet) of Mr. W. R. BABCOCK, filled out the tide of chorus grandly. Of the orchestra we cannot say much in praise; it was a picked up affair; a second choice of such as another society had left; and Mr. ECKHARDT's restless, anxious, Jullienesque exertion of hands, head and whole body, seemed to have hard work to keep all together. Still it was only in the accompaniment of some solos, that it was positively bad, and we doubt not we shall find great improvement in the repetition of the oratorio, announced for to-morrow night. This is well; so successful a performance ought not to be thrown away upon a stormy night. The hall should be crowded this time.

But the solos! Never have we listened to ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS with such pure satisfaction. Her rich voice, in the first place, told to the greatest advantage; and then she sang those contralto songs in just that simple, large and noble style which they require. It was expressive, it was artistic, it was religious; better than we have ever heard here before, unless perhaps by Miss LEHMANN. This is especially true of He was despised, and still more especially of the last part of that. Mrs. J. H. LONG, too, for one not greatly experienced in this music, sang finely the soprano solos. We have seldom heard anything more satisfactory than her clear, ringing voice in There were shepherds. If she continues to study this great music, and to let its spirit inform both mind and voice, she will be truly a great gain to our oratorios. Mr. ARTHURSON sang only Comfort ye, which he ornamented too much. The other tenor airs were passably well rendered by Mr. GILBERT. Mr. WETHERBEE was obliged from recent illness to reduce his singing to the bass songs of the first part.

A couple of Chorales from "St. Paul" were among the most satisfactory performances of the evening, as was also Miss Phillipps's singing of the aria, "For the Lord is mindful of his own."

MUSICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY.—The Second Concert, on Monday evening, we were not able to attend; but the programme was greatly superior to the first, in the matter of the solos. These included "ever bright and fair," by HANDEL, "With verdure clad," "Be thou faithful," from "St. Paul," an air by NEUKOMM; a duet by SPOHR, &c. The choruses were all by Handel, viz. "In glory high," from "Jephthah," "We with redoubled rage," and another with duet, from "Joshua," "May all the hosts of Heaven," and Coronation anthem: "Zadock, the Priest." If the other concerts shall be as good we shall be loath to lose them.

New Music.

Carols for Christmas Tide. Set to ancient melodies by Rev. T. HELMOR, M. A. Words by Rev. J. M. NEALE, M. A. Pp. 31. (J. A. Novello, London and New York.)

A beautifully engraved selection of twelve of those ancient melodies, which were sung at Christmas time, all over mediæval Europe, the ground-work of words and music being the same, in spite of national peculiarities. Their quaint old words, half Latin, half vernacular, are in this case freely and very cleverly imitated. The music is given without alteration, as found in the Pia Cantiones, published by the Lutheran Communion in Sweden, in 1582; and the melodies are harmonized in plain old church style for four voices, with piano. The carols have the charm of antiquity, of hallowed association, of quaintness and a certain rude intrinsic beauty.

Novello also has them in the cheaper forms: (1) of the Compressed Vocal Parts, and (2) the Melodies alone with the words.

Come into the garden, Maud: Serenade from TENNYSON's "Maud." By J. C. D. PARKER. (O. Ditson.)

It was rather a dangerous matter, to attempt to render Tennyson's dainty verses into music. Because the words are perfect without music; or rather they are music; and because this dainty poet has the daintiest admirers, and who can so catch his tone, his spirit as to hope to suit these? We only wonder therefore that the composer has succeeded so well. The song is charming; only we think the leading motive of the melody has rather too light a sentiment; but it has a deeper passion as it proceeds, and from the line: "There has fallen a splendid tear," onward, there commences a fine impassioned climax. The accompaniment and treatment generally, bating one or two questionable little fancies, are artistic. It is one of the most promising songs that we have seen by any of our young composers.

L'Art du Chant, &c., by THALBERG, Nos. 11 and 12. (O. Ditson.)

These complete this fine series of standard melodies made to sing themselves on the piano; and these are choice indeed, being that "Minna and Brenda" sort of a Duet from Der Freyschütz, and Mozart's Il mio tesoro.

1. Sombre Fôrd: Romance from "William Tell," ROSINI.
2. Shakespeare's Serenade: "Hark! the Lark!" FRANZ SCHUBERT. (Nathan Richardson, Musical Exchange.)

These are the two exquisite pieces sung with such effect by Mrs. J. H. LONG at our Orchestral Concerts. The Romanza from "Tell" is one of the purest inspirations of the great melodist. It is here given with the French and English words. Schubert's Hark! the Lark is a perfect song of its kind, and, if too short, too perfect for the great concert room, will win admirers in every house blessed with the real love of song.

A number of notices are unavoidably crowded out this week, including one of Mr. PARKER's excellent little "Manual of Harmony," which we can but advise all beginners of the study to procure.

The subscription list for OTTO DRESSEL's Soirées is filling up finely. We hope to announce time and particulars by next week. The next Concert of the MENDELSSOHN QUINETTE CLUB (forgot it not) will be on MONDAY evening instead of Tuesday. The programme, it will be seen, offers some rare novelties. For the third ORCHESTRAL CONCERT, next Saturday, the younger Miss HENSLEY will sing, and WILLIAM MASON will play Weber's Concert-stück. These, with the Pastorale, and the "Midsummer Night's Dream," and an overture by Cherubini, ought to draw an audience.

The proposed afternoon Orchestral Concert is reluctantly abandoned, owing to the engagements of so many members of the orchestra at that hour.

CHURCH ORGANS.

COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

WM. B. D. SIMMONS, Organ Builder,
(Heretofore doing business in the style of Wm. B. D. Simmons & Co.) and

GEORGE FISHER,

Of Cambridge, have this day formed a Copartnership for continuing the manufacture of Church Organs.

We design to keep in our Warerooms New Instruments for sale at prices from $400 to $1,500 each, and are prepared to build by contract at the shortest notice. Organs, worth from $800 to $12,000. And by prompt and faithful execution of orders hope to merit a like encouragement to that heretofore extended to Wm. B. D. Simmons, and which has indicated the necessity of this business connection, that his entire attention may be devoted to the more difficult and artistic parts of the business, so that an increase thereof may cause no diminution of the personal attention which is requisite for the maintenance of the CHARACTER of our instruments, upon which we rely for success.

While it will be our aim and ambition to furnish ORGANS OF A PERFECTION OF TONE AND MECHANISM, AND OF AN ELEGANCE OF EXTERIOR UNSURPASSED, we are confident of ability to offer terms MORE FAVORABLE THAN CAN BE OBTAINED ELSEWHERE, for the following reasons: Having ample means, we can purchase in large quantities at first cost, for cash; can always command the most talented assistants; and also do sufficient business to practise division of labor, which, by assigning parts to workmen skilled in their particular branch, necessarily insures better work at less expense. Our Manufactory, by its proximity to Charles river, enables us to receive lumber direct from the vessel at first cost, and having been erected expressly for the business, is in arrangement, size, convenience and its facilities unequalled, being furnished with steam engine, steam-heated drying-house, planing, grooving, matching, moulding, tenoning, boring, and other machines, together with lath scroll, circular and other saws, &c., all operated by steam power.

These facilities are such as are possessed by no other manufacturer of Organs in this country, and of themselves would enable us to furnish instruments, with a fair profit, at a price which those of like quality must cost builders who have work done by hand that can be better executed at half the cost by steam machinery.

Second hand Organs at all times for sale.

Orders for tuning church organs promptly attended to, and contracts taken for tuning by the year.

Orders respectfully solicited.

FIRST PREMIUM MELODEONS,

The Very Best now Manufactured.

S. D. & H. W. SMITH respectfully call the attention of the public to their IMPROVED MELODEONS, constantly on exhibition at their Warerooms,

No. 417 Washington Street.

By means of a new method of voicing, known only to themselves, they have succeeded in removing the harsh and buzzing sound which formerly characterized the instrument, rendering the tones full, clear and organ-like. The action is prompt and reliable, enabling the performer to execute the most rapid music without obscuring the tones. The swell is arranged to give great expression.

The manufacturers received the First Premium, over all competitors, at the Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanics Association; also at the Metropolitan Mechanics' Fair, held at Washington, D. C.

For the Parlor, instruments are furnished at prices varying from $45 to $150.

Larger instruments, with two banks of keys, for chapels and small churches, from $150 to $300.

This last instrument, known as the ORGAN HARMONIUM, has been essentially improved by Messrs. Smith, and they have secured a patent therefor.

Persons who wish to hire Melodeons with a view of purchasing at the end of the year, can have the rents credited as part payment of the purchase money.

Chat with Rossini.

BY FERDINAND HILLER.

Translated for this Journal from the Zeitung of Cologne.

VI.

Did your extraordinary successes ever turn your head? I asked ROSSINI one day. You were so young, it would have been no wonder.

—My extraordinary successes! said the maestro, smiling in his peculiar way. But seriously speaking, I have always remained tolerably quiet in success, and in a fiasco likewise; and for that I thank an impression I received in my earliest youth and which I never have forgotten.

—What was that?

—Before I had yet given my first operetta, began the maestro, I was present in Venice at the first production of a one-act opera of SIMON MAIR. Mair, you know, at that time was the hero of the day; he had produced perhaps twenty operas in Venice with the greatest success. In spite of all that, the public treated him that evening as if he were an ignorant vagabond; you can form no idea of such a rudeness. I was really shocked. Is this the way you reward a man who has provided you enjoyment for so many years? Dare you take such liberties, because you have paid a couple of paoli entrance money? Then verily it is not worth while, thought I, to take your judgment much to heart;—and on this principle I have acted ever since as much as possible.

—They have not always behaved very gently towards you; I said.

—Too true! you know how they maltreated me at the first performance of "the Barber;" and that was not the only time. But one evening the Venetians touched me. It was at the first performance of an opera, Sigismonda, which made them most heartily tired. I saw by their looks, how gladly they would have aired their impatience; but they controlled themselves, kept still and let the music float past undisturbed. I was quite affected by this amiability.

—I can fancy to myself a lively picture of it, said I laughing.

—To say the truth, continued Rossini in a lively tone, I was at that time the most insolent fellow in the world. I loved my parents tenderly, and care on their account disturbed me, until I had so far succeeded as to make their subsistence sure. Beyond that, the devil might take all and several. It was very wrong, I dare say; but I could not do otherwise, I was so constituted.

—It was very well that it was so! Else you never would have composed "The Barber." But, apropos to "The Barber," I have sometimes heard it maintained, that the arietta of Marcellina in the second act was not yours. Is it so?

—You mean the aria di sorbetto?* said Rossini. I must boast the composition of that. And that reminds me of another aria di sorbetto, which was droll enough.

—What was that?

—In an opera, Ciro in Babilonia, I had a dreadful seconda donna. She was not only beyond all licence hideous, but her voice too was worthless. After the most careful examination I discovered, that she possessed one single tone, the B flat of the middle octave, which sounded not badly. So I wrote her an aria in which she had nothing else but that one tone to sing, gave all to the orchestra, and as the piece pleased and was applauded, my one-toned singer was overjoyed at her triumph. —She was at least modest. But this Ciro? I have neither seen nor heard of it.

—It belongs with my fiasco's. When I returned from its unfortunate production to Bologna, I found an invitation to a picnic. I ordered at a confectioner's a little ship of march-pane, whose flag bore the name "Ciro;" the mast was broken, the sail full of holes, and it lay on its side, swimming in a sea of sweet cream. The merry company laughingly devoured my wrecked vessel.

—But that does not prove, said I, that your Persian conqueror deserved his fate;—the case is peculiar. Your Zelmira is one of your least known operas, and yet it certainly belongs among your best.

—During my stay in Vienna, said Rossini, it had great success; but it requires such an excellent ensemble of singers, as I had with me there. I had uncommonly fine times there.

—Were you also satisfied with the musical materials you found there? I asked.

—The chorus was excellent. The orchestra, too,

*An Italian expression, to designate the pieces sung by the second or third singers, while the company refreshed themselves with ice-creams, &c.

was very good; it only wanted power which, possibly was accidental. Did you know WEIGL?

—I saw him for a moment in my earliest boyhood; he was then directing.

—Very likely. He knew that he had been described to me as one of my great enemies. To convince me of the contrary, he rehearsed Zelmira in the orchestra with a carefulness such as I had never known either in myself or others. I wanted sometimes to beg him not to be so very particular about it; but I had to confess that it went wonderfully. At that time I heard several of my operas in a German translation, and indeed to my greatest satisfaction. The German language adapted itself to my music much better than the French, as I was afterwards convinced. Among the singers I recollect particularly the basso, FORTI, as a great talent. The UNGHER and the SONTAG began their career at that time. —I am not surprised at what you say of the German translation of your operas. To be sure, I could not swear to the excellence of their diction; but our prosody, which has pretty well determined long and short quantities, stands much nearer to the Italian, than the French does.

—In the translations which they made of several of my operas for the Grand Opera, said Rossini, I often could not trust my ears; the substituted text seemed to me impossible, intolerable. But NOURRIT, to whom I spoke of it, found it all right; I also saw that no one was disturbed by it. It would have been laughable to wish to be more severe than Frenchmen were, and so I did not press the matter; but the impression, which I had of it, has never changed.

—The French composers frequently are not very exact in their treatment of the text, and many foreigners have set them examples in that respect. How admirably has not our German GLUCK de-claimed the French!

—It would have been bad, if he had not done it, replied the maestro, since with him the declamatory part forms the foundation of the whole.

—Do you believe, maestro, that poetry and music ever can excite an equal interest at the same time?

—When the charm of the tones has once fairly siezed upon the listener, said Rossini with fire, the words will surely have the worst of it. But if the music does not tell, of what use is it? It is then unnecessary, if not superfluous or even an annoyance.

VII.

—You must tell me still more about your boyhood, maestro, I began over a game of Domino; for you were properly a boy, when you began to write operas. How came it, that you made your debut in Venice of all places?

—Accident plays so great a part in our career! exclaimed Rossini. At the age of thirteen I was engaged for the opera season in Sinigaglia as maestro al cembalo. I found there a singer, who sang not badly, but was just one of the most unmusical sort. One day in an aria she made a cadenza of a harmonic adventurousness, that went beyond everything. I tried to make it clear to her, that she should have some regard to the harmony held out in the orchestra, and she even seemed to see the truth of this remark to a certain degree; but at the performance she abandoned herself again to her inspiration, and made a cadenza, at which I could not refrain from laughing out. But the parterre also broke out into a loud laugh, and the donna was furious. She complained to her special protector, the gentleman who on the part of the city stood at the head of the opera, a very wealthy and respectable Venetian, who had large estates in Sinigaglia; she accused me particularly of uncivil conduct, maintaining that I had set the public laughing by my own behavior. I was summoned into the austere presence of the gentleman and severely rated by him. If you allow yourself to make fun of the first artistes, said he to me in a domineering tone, I will have you thrown into prison. He might have been able to do that, but I did not let myself be intimidated, and the affair took another turn. I explained to him my harmonic scruples, convinced him of my innocence, and instead of sending me to prison, he conceived the liveliest fancy for me and told me finally, that if I ever got so far as to be able to compose an opera, I must come to him and he would commission me to write one.

—And did he keep his word?

—I may thank him for my first scrittura in Venice, and with a remuneration of 200 francs, which at that time seemed to be not small.

—At the theatre San Mosé, was it not?

—Yes; that theatre has since gone down, and it is a great loss for the younger Italian composers. They used to give there short comic operas, for four or five persons, without chorus, without change of scenery, which could be studied in the shortest time, and which cost the impresario but little. Hence it was easy to get one's work brought out there and acquire a little experience. Many distinguished composers have made their debut there. To-day, if a young Italian composer wishes to make a first attempt upon the stage, and has not some thousands of francs to throw away upon it, he will hardly be able to accomplish it. In fact, quite other means are now required, such as it is hardly to be supposed an impresario would risk.

—What a pity that the Italians have so entirely forsaken the opera buffa, in which they have achieved so much that is excellent! said I.

—The Neapolitans especially, replied Rossini, had a peculiar talent for it. This kind requires perhaps rather a lively feeling for the nature of the stage, than great musical gifts. But now the singers, too, for that are wanting. This daily handling of the stiletto makes them quite unfit to move with lightness and with grace.

Do you ascribe it to political events, that such a preponderating taste for the tragic, the pathetic, rules just now in Italy?

—I do not know, said the maestro, but I have observed, that when by way of exception an opera buffa has once been tolerably given, it always exercises a certain attractive power, and causes a good deal of merriment among the people.

—And that is something not to be despised! said I, thinking of GOETHE's comical side.

VIII.

—One day the maestro suddenly sang the beginning of the finale from BEETHOVEN's Septet, and then a Scherzo of the same master.—From which Symphony is this movement? he asked, turning to me.

—From the Eroica.

—Right. What an energy, what a fire dwelt in that man! What treasures are contained in his piano-forte Sonatas! I am not sure that they do not stand higher with me than his Symphonies; there is perhaps even more inspiration in them.—Did you know Beethoven?

—I had the fortune, when a boy, to speak with him a few weeks before his death,—I answered.

—During my stay in Vienna, said Rossini, I was presented to him by the old CALPANI; but with his deafness and my ignorance of the German language, conversation was impossible. I rejoice that I have at least seen him.—But your WEBER also was a capital fellow—his treatment of the orchestra, the new efforts which he won from the instruments! Did he write Symphonies also?

—He made one attempt, which however cannot be counted among his most felicitous. On the contrary his Overtures, even in the concert room, are among our most favorite pieces for the orchestra.

—And justly, said the maestro, although I cannot exactly approve the practice of introducing in the overture the finest motives of the opera; if only because it robs them of the charm of novelty when they occur again. Besides, it is not easy to divine their relations to one another, before the play. But Weber had precious ideas! How exquisite the entrance of the march in his Concert-stück, with the deep clarinet tones! (Rossini sang the first part of it). I have always loved to hear this piece.

—You have heard it from LISZT, who in truth played it as no other could! I interrupted.

—Poor Weber! He visited me in Paris on his journey to London; he looked then so weak and suffering, that to me it was incomprehensible how he could undertake such a journey. He hoped, he told me, to be able to earn something substantial there for his family;—he should have preserved himself for them. The way in which he approached me, was singular; to me there was something in it almost comical.

—How so, maestro?

—It seems that Weber at an earlier period had once written a newspaper article about, or rather against, my Tancredi, and he thought it necessary, therefore, to have me asked, through an acquaintance, whether I would be willing to see him. If I had had any anticipation, when as a twenty-year old chap I put Tancredi upon paper, that a foreign composer would have taken any sort of notice of it, I should really have reckoned it an honor. You can imagine, that Weber's visit was none the less welcome to me on that account.

—Newspaper articles have never troubled you much! said I.

—Certainly not! replied the maestro, laughing. To think of all that was written against me, when I came to Paris! Indeed the old BERTON made verses upon me, in which he called me Mr.

Crescendo. But all that passed without danger to life! What does annoy me is, that they have circulated a mass of untrue stories about me, in which I sometimes play a strange part enough—but we must put up with all that.

—But you must some day dictate your biography to somebody, said I. The particulars of so rich a life as yours ought not to be lost. I too shall soon be able to furnish a small contribution to it! You perceive, I listen to you as if I belonged to the secret police.

—Keep on asking questions, my dear Ferdinando! as long as you are at all interested.

—Poor maestro! Then you will have to hold forth many a time yet!

Life of John Sebastian Bach;

WITH A CRITICAL VIEW OF HIS COMPOSITIONS, BY J. N. FÖRKL.

6. "Einige Kanonische Veränderungen," some canonic variations on the Christmas Hymn, "Von Himmel hoch da komm ich her," for the organ with two sets of keys and a pedal. Published at Nuremberg, by Balthasar Schmid.—They consist of five variations, in which a great number of artificial canons are introduced, in the simplest manner.

7. "Musikalisches Opfer," Musical Offering, dedicated to Frederick II. of Prussia. The theme received from the King, of which we have before spoken, first appears as a three-part fugue, under the name of Ricercar, or with the heading, Regis Jussu et Religia, Canonica Arte Resoluta. Secondly, the composer has made it into a sixpart Ricercar for the Clavichord. Then follows "Thematis regii elaborationes canonicæ," of various kinds," and fourthly and lastly, a Tigo for the flute, violin and bass upon the same theme is added.

8. "Die Kunst der Fuge," (that is, the art of the Fugue.) The greatest part of this admirable and unique work was engraved by one of his sons during the life of the composer, but nevertheless it did not appear till after his death, in 1752. Marpurg, then at the head of the German composers, wrote a preface to this edition, containing many just and critical observations on the use and importance of works of this kind. Nevertheless this work was above the appreciation of the public in general, and its popularity was restricted to a small circle of connoisseurs. These were soon furnished with copies, and the plates soon fell into disuse, and were sold by his heirs for old copper. Had a work of this kind by a man of such reputation as Bach, and recommended as something superior by a writer whose opinions was so highly esteemed on these subjects, been published in any other country than Germany, ten or more elegant editions would have been purchased out of mere patriotism. But as it was, there were not a sufficient number of copies of this work sold to pay the value of the copper plates used in engraving it. The work is composed of variations on a grand scale. The author's intention was to show all that could be done upon a theme for a fugue. The variations, which are all complete fugues upon the same theme, are here counterpoints. The last fugue but one has three themes, in the third of which the composer discovers his name by b-a-c-h. This fugue was however never finished, owing to a disorder in the composer's eyes, for which an operation proved unsuccessful. It is said Bach's intention was to have four themes in the last fugue, to reverse them in all their four parts, and thus close the work. All these different kinds of fugues upon one theme have this merit, that each part is equally melodious and smooth, and no one inferior to the others. To make up for the deficiency of the last fugue there is added at the end of the work the four-part chorale: "Wenn wir in höchsten Nothe sind."—It was dictated a few days before his death by Bach to his son-in-law Altnikol. Of the art displayed in this composition, little need be said. It was so familiar to the composer that he could practice it even during his illness. I have always felt greatly affected by the expression of resignation and devotion which it conveys, and I, can hardly determine which I would rather have done without—this chorale or the conclusion of the last fugue.

CHAPTER IX.

There were published after Bach's death a collection of four-part choral songs made by his son C. Ph. Emanuel, and published at Berlin and Leipzig, by Birnstiel, part 1, in 1765 and part 2, 1769. Each part contained 100 choral hymns, mostly selected from the author's annual compositions for the church. At a subsequent period Kirnberger also published four collections of choral hymns, by John Sebastian Bach. These were published by Breitkopf.—The manuscript works of Bach may be classed into compositions for the clavichord and organ, with and without accompaniments; and compositions for stringed instruments and for the voice. I will mention them in their natural order.

I. Compositions for the clavichord.—1. Six little Preludes for the use of beginners.—2. Fifteen two-part Inventions. A musical subject so contrived that by imitation and transposition of the parts the whole of a composition might be developed from it, was called an Invention. The rest was but an enlargement, and did not need to be invented, when the means of development were properly known. These fifteen inventions are very useful for a young harpsichord player. The composer has taken care that not only both hands shall be exercised equally, but that every finger shall be so likewise. They were composed at Cothen in 1723, and originally had a long title beginning: "A plain introduction, by which the lovers of the clavichord are taught a clear method of playing correctly in two parts &c." In several of these inventions there were originally here and there poor and awkward turns in the melody, and some other defects. But Bach, who at a later period found them of great use to his pupils, gradually took out of them whatever shocked his now mature taste, and at length made them really expressive master-pieces, without however diminishing their usefulness as exercises for the hands and fingers, and for forming the taste. A careful study of these is indeed the best preparation for Bach's greater works. 3. Fifteen three-part Inventions, which are also known by the title of Symphonies. They are intended for the same purposes as the preceding, only they lead the pupil on further.

4. "The Well-tempered Clavichord" or preludes and fugues in all the keys, composed for the use of inquisitive youth, as well as for the amusement of such as are already versed in the art. Part I. 1722.—The second part of this work, containing also twenty-four preludes and twenty-four fugues in all the keys, was composed at a later period. All are from beginning to end master-pieces in this collection; while, in the first part, there are some few pieces which bear the traces of the immaturity of youth, and were probably only preserved by the author to increase the number to twenty-four. But even these were in course of time corrected by the author; whole passages are cut out or altered, so that in later copies there are very few pieces left which can be taxed with imperfection. Among these few may be reckoned the fugues in A minor, G major, and G minor, C major, F major and F minor, &c. The rest are all excellent, and some of them in no way inferior to those in the second part. And even this second part has, in the lapse of time, received many improvements, as will be seen on comparing the old and new copies. These two parts together form a treasure of Art, which can certainly not be found anywhere but in Germany.

5. Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue. I have sought in vain to find another piece of this kind by Bach; such is not to be found, for this is a unique work of its kind. I first received this fantasia from Brunswick, from W. Friedemann. It is singular that this work, though so astonishing a production of Art, may be appreciated by the most unpracticed hearer, when performed with even a tolerable degree of accuracy.

6. A Fantasia. This does not at all resemble the preceding, but is like the Allegro of a sonata divided into two parts, and must be performed in the same movement and time. In other respects it is excellent. In some old copies we find a fugue annexed to it, which cannot however belong to it. It is not finished. The first thirty bars are unquestionably by S. Bach, for they contain an extremely bold attempt to make use of diminished and extreme intervals, and their inversions in a harmony of three parts. None but Bach would venture so bold an attempt. The remainder seems to have been added by a different hand, for it bears no trace of the style and manner of Sebastian.

7. Six great Suites, consisting of preludes, allemandes, courantes, sarabands, jigs, &c. They are known by the title of "the English suites," having been made by the composer for an Englishman of rank. They are all estimable as works of Art, but some single pieces in particular, such as the jigs of the fifth and sixth suite, may be regarded as master-pieces of harmony and melody.

8. Six little suites, consisting of allemandes, courantes, &c. They are generally called French suites, on account of their being in the French taste. Consistently with the object he has in view, the composer is here less learned than in his other suites, and makes use of a melody more striking and pleasing. The pieces of the fifth suite deserve to be particularly noticed on this account, being all of the smoothest melody; and in the last jig none but consonant intervals, especially thirds and sixths, are used.

These are the principal works for the clavichord of J. S. Bach; all of which may be considered as classical. Of single suites, toccatas, and fugues, not mentioned among the before named, although they possess much merit in various ways, most must be classed among his juvenile efforts; and ten or twelve single pieces out of this number are alone worth preserving; some because they may be useful as exercises for the fingers, for which indeed the composer originally intended them; and others as at least surpassing all similar productions of other composers. As an excellent exercise for the fingers of both hands, I particularly recommend a fugue in A minor, in which the composer has endeavored very successfully, by a constant succession of running passages, to give to both hands equal strength and facility. There is also a little fugue in two parts, which might also be very useful to beginners, as it is very flowing, and contains nothing antiquated.

A NEW PRIMA DONNA.—A letter from Turin says: "The great attraction which Signor Renzoni (Impresario of the Royal Opera) has been fortunate enough to secure, is Signora MARIA PICCOLOMINI, who has created a perfect furore among all sorts and conditions of men in Turin, in Verdi's opera, the "Trovatore." With great powers and talents as a singer, this young lady combines the most inestimable quality of a great actress, that of thoroughly understanding the part she has to represent. But perhaps the romance of her own history is not the least of her charms for the public. Of an ancient and noble family of Sienna, which reckons among its members two Popes (Pius II. and III.) and several cardinals, one of whom is now in existence and uncle to the lady in question, she has entered upon her present career much against the wishes of her family in the first instance, solely from an inspiration of her peculiar fitness for the stage. At an early age she evinced a great genius for the art, and, contrary to the prejudices of the class to which she belongs, and the arguments of her anxious parents, she determined on pursuing an avocation which certainly promises now to bring her wide renown. Her family at length, finding this passion really amounted to a 'calling,' gave way, and the consent of all parties having been obtained, she made her debut with the utmost success at Florence; since then she has sung at Pisa, Rome, and other places, with like applause."

Diary Abroad.—No. 30.

BERLIN, NOV. 13.—LENZ's book on BEETHOVEN again. Page 8. "Kapellmeister in Bonn and excellent Bass singer, had this grandfather [Beethoven's] in the musical dramas of the time, L'Amore Artigiano, (Mechanic's Love), in the "Deserter" of MARTIGNY had success. Who can decide whether this first distant relation to the theatre remained without influence upon the future composer of Fidelio?"

Sure enough, who can decide? WEGELER says the grandpapa not only won great applause in these plays during the time of Elector Clemens Augustus, but produced operas of his own composition, which Lenz should not have omitted. Now as Clemens Augustus died nine years before our Beethoven was born, and the said grandfather lived until his grandson had attained the ripe and mature age of three years, nearly, Mr. Lenz's question is worthy of careful attention.

Lenz, p. 9. "Distinguished as Beethoven became afterwards as a pianist, his teachers on this instrument have remained unknown, and certainly to their happiness." Wegeler, who lived in Bonn at the time, mentions Johann van Beethoven (Ludwig's father) as his first teacher, then a Herr PFEIFFER, then VAN DER EDER, court organist, and then NEEFE, who succeeded van der Eder just two months after the boy reached the age of ten years. According to Wegeler and Schindler, Beethoven did not profit much by Neefe's instruction. Yet Neefe writes from Bonn in the summer and autumn of 1793 thus: "In November of last year Ludwig van Beethoven, second court organist and indisputably one of the first pianists, left Bonn for Vienna at the cost of our Elector (of Cologne) to perfect himself in the art of composition under HAYDN;" and in a note adds: "As this L. v. B., according to various accounts, has made great progress in the art, and is indebted for part of his culture to Herr Neefe in Bonn, whom he has thanked in writing; so perhaps Herr N.'s modesty will allow a few words to be placed here, as they are to the credit of Herr B." "I thank you for your counsel, which you so often have given me in my progress in my heavenly art. Should I ever become a great man, you will have had a part therein;—that will rejoice you all the more as you may be sure, etc."

But here is another extract from a letter by Neefe, ten years before—1788. He is speaking of the musicians at Bonn, and then says, "Louis van Beethoven, son of the above named tenorist, a boy of eleven years of age and of very promising talents. He plays the harpsichord with great expertness and power, reads well at sight, and, to say all in a word, plays nearly all SEBASTIAN BACH's Wohltemperiertes Klavier, placed in his hands by Herr Neefe. . . . Herr Neefe has, also, so far as his other duties allow, given him some instruction in thorough bass,"—and more of the like. Ah, Mr. Lenz, it is the teachers on the violin who are unknown!

Lenz, p. 10. "The distinguished Bernhard Rommel"—ROMBERG, man, ROMBERG;—if this was a mere misprint, why is it not in the table of errata?

P. 13. "One of his first acquaintances (in Vienna) was Baron VON SWIETEN, formerly physician to the Empress MARIA THERESA, &c."

Not so, Mr. Lenz. The old physician died years before. This man was his son, privy counsellor and president of the Imperial Library.

P. 18. (Speaking of the Septet), "Haydn praised the youth, already so great a master, and we must consider him perfectly honest in this. The answer of Beethoven is ironical!" still his Septet was not a 'Creation'—"That," replied Haydn, nettled, "you could not have written, for you are an Atheist."

ALOYS FUCHS, of Vienna, the celebrated collector of autographs and pictures of composers and musicians, relates the story thus:

"One day after the performance of the ballet, 'Men of Prometheus,' Haydn met his former pupil, and stopping him, addressed him with: "Well, I heard your ballet yesterday and was greatly pleased with it."

"Oh, dear papa," replied Beethoven, "you are very good, but still it is very far from being a 'Creation.'"

Haydn, taken by surprise, and not well pleased at the idea of any comparison between the two works, paused a moment and answered significantly: "That is true; it is indeed no 'Creation,' and I hardly believe its author will ever reach that;" upon which, both somewhat disconcerted, they separated.

Considering, first, that the subject of "Prometheus" is the advance of man from the rudest, savage state,—that of a mere animal,—through the reception of the Promethean fire, to a state of the highest enlightened civilization; and secondly, both the "Creation" and the ballet were performed for the first time during the same spring (1799), both being therefore the topic of general conversation, the reply of Beethoven to Haydn loses all its irony, and Mr. Lenz's story must be taken for what it is worth.

P. 78. (Speaking of the Masses said, &c., after Beethoven's death.) "The author is indebted to the distinguished singer, LABLACHE, for this notice, who, being present at the death of Beethoven [bei dem Tode Beethoven's gegenwärtig] gave us his last words thus: 'Do you hear the bell? The scene changes!' In the theatres of Vienna a bell gives the signal of the changes of scene."

I find it hard to make this out. The Italian, Lablache, present at the death of Beethoven! True, the great singer was in Vienna at the time, singing at the Kärntnertheater, and joined in the great master's funeral obsequies. Beethoven died a few minutes before 6 o'clock, P. M., March 26th. SCHINDLER wrote to MOSCHELES on the 24th: "He is conscious of his approaching end, for yesterday he said to me and Breuning: 'Plaudite amici, comedia finita est.'" On the morning of the 24th he took the sacrament. At 1 o'clock, P. M., the struggle began and lasted two days. The man who closed his eyes was Mr. Anselm Hüttenbrenner of Gärtz. Nowhere have I found any allusion to Lablache's presence, unless when Schindler says in his letter to Moscheles that, of the crowd who came to see B., "none were admitted except those who are bold and audacious enough to molest the dying man in his last hours." I will not believe this of Lablache, there must be some mistake; either Lenz misunderstood Lablache, or he has expressed himself in a way to make me misunderstand him.

P. 81. (The note to Schuppanzigh, Vol. II., p. 15:)

"To Herr Schuppanzigh,

Beauche er mich nicht mehr. Ich gebe keine academie. (Let him visit me no more. I give no academy.)

"The last billet shows in the use of 'er' [the third person singular] used only by masters to servants, the distance which in the mind of Beethoven separates a first violin from the master who writes the notes for it before hand."

And this remark of Mr. Lenz shows too the distance which separates a man from accuracy who writes a book without examining the sources of information open to him. What does the use of er show in the following sentences, written by Schuppanzigh himself in Beethoven's book, sentences relating to the same concert, mentioned above as the "Academie," or to the other which followed?

[Schuppanzigh to B.] Weiss er nicht ob Umlauf [Kapellmeister] mit den Sängern correpitirt hat oder nicht?

Again: "Wie ist es mit dem Concert? Wenn es sein ernst est, so ist jetzt Zeit Anstalt dazu zu machen. Er braucht gar nicht neues zu machen. . . Das erste concert gebe er noch im Advent, das ist ende dieses Monats."

Pages on pages might be given, but this is enough to show that Mr. Lenz has made a slight error in his inference.

P. 140. "Rome was for MOZART not much more than a mass by PALESTRINA, which he wrote out after once hearing, because by the statutes of the Sextine Chapel the score could not be seen." For "Mass by Palestrina" read "Miserere by ALLEGRI." The error is not corrected in the errata.

P. 227. (Speaking of RIES's anecdote of Stelbelt and B., Moscheles' Schindler, Vol. II., 289.) "The theme of the noble horn variations of that trio (op. 11), 'pria che l'impegno,' a favorite street song of the time, out of the 'Tree of Diana' by Martini."

Professor DEHN showed me this theme as a Trio in WAGNER's 'Corair.'

There goes the watchman's whistle, for midnight,—so, good night, Mr. Lenz.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, DEC. 17.—In spite of the very inclement weather, and a German lecture which had drawn off many of the habitual concert-goers, Dodworth's Saloon was quite well filled on Saturday night at EISFELD'S Soirée. The principal feature of the programme was a Quartet by RUBINSTEIN, of whom your "Diarist" gave us so interesting an account last winter. I was better pleased with this composition of "the future," than with that by BRAHMS, mentioned in my last. It is very comprehensible, with pleasing, though not altogether original melodies, the main idea well carried through without pretension or far-fetched effects; in a word, a sound, healthy composition. If one is at times a little reminded of MENDELSSOHN, it should not be forgotten that this is only op. 17 of a young composer, whose acquaintance one can make with pleasure, and with the hope soon to renew it in another of his brain-children. Mme. BOUCHELLE sang a most beautiful aria by MOZART: Ch'io mi scordi di te, of which I unfortunately cannot discover whether it is from one of the composer's less known operas, or an independent composition. Why cannot some of our musical young ladies, who waste time, voice and enthusiasm upon noisy Italian arias, of which even the best are entirely out of place in the drawing room, rather turn their attention to the many excellent compositions, so little known, of the great masters? There are so many arias of Mozart, from Così fan tutte, from Tito, not to mention those from Figaro, etc.; of GLUCK, of WEBER, and, beyond all these in beauty, the "Ah perfido" of BEETHOVEN, which do not require half as much execution and flexibility of voice as the bravura pieces of VERDI, BELLINI, DONIZETTI, etc., and give so much more food for the mind and heart.

But—à nos moutons: Mme. Bouchelle did not do justice either to the above mentioned aria, or to a pleasing little ballad by Mr. Eisfeld: "Oh come to me my darling love," which we have heard once before at one of his Soirées. Her singing is very coarse, to say the least, and she is often out of tune.

Anything unpleasant, however, was amply made up for by the exquisite Variations by BEETHOVEN, from one of his Quartets, op. 18, (if I remember right), which formed the middle number of the programme. Can anybody write variations like Beethoven? or I should rather say, but he, for what are all others compared to his? In the rendering of them Mr. Eisfeld and his friends surpassed themselves. Indeed I have never heard them play better than they did during this whole evening. I cannot even find a word to say against the first violin, and hardly think my neighbor of the Gazette will dare repeat his rather uncivil assertion of a few weeks ago, that there was no artist in this quartet. The concert ended with a Quintet, op. 130, of SPOHR, which appeared to me far inferior to his other compositions of the same kind, and sounded so tame and shallow after the preceding instrumental pieces, that I think even admirers of Spohr must have felt the difference. Mr. TIMM's rendering of the piano part was, as usual, faultless in point of execution: smooth, pure, polished like marble, but cold like marble, too, and to me entirely unsympathetic.

DEC. 18th.—I have just come from the Matinée of Messrs. MASON and BERGMANN, where quite a large audience were assembled, and am sorry that my report cannot be entirely satisfactory. The defect in the ensemble, of which I complained in my last, was even more obvious on this occasion. The gentlemen of the Quartet should not attempt to play music which presents difficulties that even finished players cannot surmount without long and faithful practice. The Quartet of Beethoven, op. 59, with which they commenced, belongs to this class of compositions, and instead of being) difficult to understand as it is in itself,) made clearer by a correct, distinct execution, was rendered quite incomprehensible by the confused, disjointed manner in which it was performed. So far as I could judge, I like best the Allegretto Scherzando, which was at least played so that one could distinguish its Beethovenish mixture of eccentricity and soul-stirring beauty. There were but three more pieces on the programme; quite an improvement upon that first Matinée, which was decidedly too long. The second piece was "Méditation sur le premier prélude de S. BACH, arrangé par CH. GOUNOD;" a short, but beautiful thing, in which, as far as I could understand, the different parts of the prelude were divided among the piano, violin, and violoncello. The violin had the air, and Mr. THOMAS proved by his tasteful rendering of it that in anything which lies within range of his power he is far from being without merit. Mr. MASON next appeared alone, and played CHOPIN's Ballade, op. 47, very finely. I think I prefer his interpretation of Chopin's more delicate, dreamy style, while HOFFMANN excels in his wild, stormy, restless compositions. The last piece was SCHUMANN's beautiful Quartet in E flat, op. 47, for piano and three stringed instruments. It is very characteristic of the composer, and yet not as abstruse and difficult to comprehend as many of his works. Its execution by the stringed instruments was much superior to that of the first Quartet, while Mr. Mason rendered his part very ably, with great correctness and energy, and manifested a very obvious improvement in his playing since last winter.

NEW YORK, DEC. 19th.—Sunday night was kept at the Academy of Music by a Sacred Concert for the benefit of the Ladies of St. Vincent de Paul. The soloists of the opera troupe gave the principal pieces of ROSSINI's Stabat Mater, in a most indifferent manner, as well as some other selections dubbed "Sacred," for the occasion. The vocal performances call for no particular remark, except Miss HENSLE's singing of SCHUBERT's Ave Maria. Her sweet and sympathetic voice did full justice to the melody, which, however often heard, can never become hackneyed. But for that modern nuisance in vocalism—the constant tremolo—which Miss Hensler was forced to learn when in Italy, her rendering of the song would have been nearly faultless. This concert afforded an opportunity for the debut of a new pianist, a Mr. ENGLEBERTS, from Amsterdam via London. It seems as though the more we advance in musical knowledge and perception here, the less will this be believed by musicians abroad. The bureau of the Revue Franco-Italienne, Paris, have lately sent to Mr. PAINE several artists for his troupe, who are really fitted for Kansas; and now comes this "Fliegender Holländer," with hopes of JENNY LYND enthusiasm and MISKA HAUSER purses. But Mr. Engleberts will not astonish the new world, and will probably rest satisfied with his debut. This gentleman went through with WEBER's Concert-Stück and two other pieces, one by LITTLER; when he had finished the audience were highly delighted.

Il Trovatore is decidedly the most successful opera of the season. Mme. DE LA GRANGE's wonderful vocalization, coupled with the inimitable beauties of Rossini's "Barber," fails to draw good houses; but the anvils and miserere, and the poison, stake and scaffold attract full houses always. It must be confessed that there is more reason for this now than heretofore, for, although I would not turn the corner to hear the music of VERDI's "Troubadour," I would turn many corners to hear DE LA GRANGE and DIDIER in their solos in this opera. You will probably hear them before long.

Concerts without number crowd into the remainder of the present week. Most important is the first soirée of L. M. GORTSCHALK. It is long since this brilliant pianist has been heard in New York, and his audience should be a crowded one. He stands probably at the very head of the French School of pianism; in this particular department he is undoubtedly without a superior at home or abroad. Miss MARIA S. BRAINERD, one of our best New York vocalists, gives a concert on the same (Thursday) evening; it is her first in the city, and as an American of talent, assiduous in her studies, she will deserve the countenance of the monied public. On the same evening the German Sängerbund (300 singers, with an orchestra of 50, under BERGMANN) hold out their banner at the Tabernacle. On Friday a complimentary to Mrs. BOSTWICK; and on Saturday the farewell of the Brothers MOLLENHAUER; quite enough for the week before Christmas.

MILANO.

BERLIN, NOV. 12.—Another concert last night by CLARA SCHUMANN and JOACHIM.

Sonata, E flat, (op. 7) Beethoven, for pianoforte. Popular melody, by Schumann, for violin. Romanza, in G, Beethoven, for violin. Chromatic Fantasia, Bach, pianoforte. Sonata in G, Beethoven, on pianoforte and violin. Chaconne, Bach, on violin.

I have not a single word to say!

Nov. 13.—The wisdom of the National Zeitung man, as usual, was confined to the programme last Saturday night. He reports that Joachim played at the close "two of those spirited caprices by Paganini, the greater part of which Robert Schumann has arranged for the piano. RELLSTAB is not so easily caught; he says "an Etude by Bach and caprice by Paganini."

He did get caught though, the other day. Speaking of LOEWE's "Job," he expressed his dissatisfaction that passages from the New should have been interpolated into the poetry of the Old Testament. A few days later, after a very severe criticism upon a piece of music, he says, "Perhaps I have erred, as I oft have in life—I wish it." And in a note: "As, lately, in the oratorio of Job, in regard to the passages: "I know that my Redeemer," and the "loosing the bands of Orion," which I held not to be from the Old Testament. I do but my duty in acknowledging the error."

Does not that make one respect Rellstab?

DEC. 1.—I find the following in a German paper: "The musical public of Vienna is preparing for a grand jubilee, upon the centennial anniversary of MOZART's birthday, which comes upon the 27th of January next. GLÖGGE, the music-seller, is to lead a grand concert, to be preceded by other musical festivities. The most interesting fact connected with the affair, (if it is a fact,) is a discovery which Glögge thinks he has made. It is well known that all knowledge of the exact place of Mozart's burial in the St. Marxer burial-ground, is supposed long since to have been lost. [See Holmes's Mozart, (Amer. ed.) p. 361.] Many attempts have been made to discover this, in vain. Glögge supposes he has succeeded, in the following manner. He had learned by some means that among the grave-diggers of the St. Marxer cemetery existed a tradition of there being a sign to mark the composer's grave, which is to this effect. When Mozart was buried, one of the grave-diggers then present planted upon the grave a willow for his own assistance in finding the spot when visitors came to see it. He made this known to his friends, and they to their successors, so that to this day the tradition of the 'Mozart willow' lives among them. The twig has in the mean time become a large tree, and is still to be seen in that part of the grounds where it is known that the immortal master was buried. Glögge has already taken measures to decide this matter, and if it be found that the right grave is really at length discovered, a monument will be erected there."

One must express doubts of anything decisive being the result of the investigation. A. W. T.

CONCERTS.

MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY.—The Second performance of the "Messiah" drew a large audience to the Tremont Temple, in spite of another stormy day and evening. The performance as a whole was even better than before; the choruses were many of them grandly given. Particularly effective were those livelier ones, like "All we like sheep," "He trusted in God," "Lift up your heads," "Good will to men," &c. The "Wonderful" chorus came out with a grander crescendo in its succession of sublime announcements. The first chorus: "Glory to God," to our feeling, would have more effect, more majesty, were it sung not quite so rapidly; and the same remark occurred to us in several other places, as it does in almost all performances we hear of the "Messiah," in these days. But the doctors disagree sadly on these points. As a general rule, that time in which a piece of music moves most easily and naturally, is the right time. It was pleasant to see so many of our best solo-singers scattered through the four parts of the chorus,—and still pleasanter to hear them. The great organ told with fine effect. The orchestra went somewhat smoother than before, and the conductor had not so much the appearance of doing all before and for each instrument; indeed there was a marvellous change for the better in the moderated manner of his beating time; it looked more as if the instruments could go alone, the pantomime becoming subordinate to the music.

Of the combined performances we think there was nothing on the whole quite so impressive, so satisfying in the execution, as those two plain, solid, richly and solemnly harmonized Chorales from MENDELSSOHN's "St. Paul," with organ accompaniment alone. The voices, 150 or more, were beautifully blended, and there was a continuity and wholeness in each great swelling and subsiding wave of sound, which made it at once solemnizing and refreshing as the sea-shore. Yet we think we would have gladly renounced the Chorales for the sake of retaining two more of the most important choruses in the "Messiah," to-wit, that most beautiful one: "And with his stripes," and the sublime double ending: "Worthy the Lamb," and "Amen." But it is hard to decide what to omit, where everything is great.

Of the solos we may simply say that Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS only deepened our conviction that she is much the best interpreter of those beautiful and profoundly touching contralto songs, that we remember in our Boston oratorios. "He was despised" was sung with as much truth of feeling, as satisfying richness of voice. The air from "St. Paul," too, sounded as if it were made for her to sing. Mrs. LONG sang "I know that my Redeemer," &c. with simplicity, and good voice and execution. There is rather a lack of 'unction,' however, in her rendering of such music, which is not so bad by any means as false pathos: so long as there is simplicity, with such talent, there is much to hope. In "There were shepherds," she was highly satisfactory, save only in the touching of one note, both this time and before, too high, ("Christ, the Lord.")

The opening solo, "Comfort ye," this time was sung by a soprano voice, Miss BOTHAMLY.—Whether from association or not, we could not but miss the golden, manly tenor there; but it was sung with sweetness, purity, and good expression, and (one is glad to think) without embellishment of a text so perfect in its every interval and cadence. In "Come unto him, all ye that labor," the effect of her fine musical voice was impaired by a slight drowsiness of manner; one must be in earnest with such music. Mr. GILBERT exerted himself creditably, with a very fair tenor voice; but in such pieces as: "Thy rebuke hath broken his heart," one feels the want of just the finest tenor voice and culture, musical and spiritual, to express all its depth of feeling and of beauty. Mr. WETHERBEE delivered the bass songs in a careful and well-studied manner, executing the roulades neatly and artistically.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—The programme of the third concert was made up in great part of novelties, and with the exception of the first and last piece, we think hardly proved so enjoyable to that assembly of classical music-lovers, as the two preceding. We trust the Club will not allow too much influence to the oft-renewed demand for lighter music, and occasional complaints about too much of a good thing. On the other hand, their little public has been so long used to listening to a great variety of the quartets, quintets and trios of the greatest masters, that we think the introduction of a new author occasionally, will find curious ears and help to extend our knowledge of composers somewhat, without sacrificing the primary and proper interest of such concerts. To appreciate the art, the inspiration of Mozart and Beethoven, we must sometimes hear what smaller and yet clever men have done. It is a hard thing to please everybody in the matter of programmes, and we think the Club are safe in presenting what themselves esteem the best, since their persistence in that high course thus far, in spite of the danger of going over the heads of the public for some time at first, has been rewarded by so faithful an audience from year to year. The programme was this:

PART I.

1. Quartet in G, No. 75,.....Haydn.
Allegro—Adagio—Minuetto—Finale, Allegro vivace.
2. Trio in E, op. 8, for Piano, Violin and Violoncello, (first time.).....Th. Gouvy.
Allegro—Andante—Finale, Allegro assai.
Messrs. PARKER, A. & W. FRIS.

PART II.

3. Adagio from a Sonata for Flute and Piano, arranged for Quintet,.....Kuhlen.
GUSTAV KAHN.
4. Salon Duet, op. 25, for Violin and Piano,.....David.
Messrs. A. FRIS and PARKER.
5. Posthumous Quartet in D minor, (first time,).....Schubert.
Allegro—Andante con moto—Scherzo Allegro molto—Finale, Presto.

The Quartet of HAYDN was a delightful opening, and its every movement was most keenly relished. The beauty and deep feeling of the Adagio, and the inimitable esprit and playful grace and delicacy of the minuetto and finale, were given in the happiest and most finished manner of the Club. There is no better music than Haydn's to create a sound and cheerful mood and appetite for what may follow; and this quartet in G is one of the very best of the eighty left us by the father of the Quartet.

M. GOUVY is a young French composer, who cultivates the classical forms, and whose Symphony and other works have won high praise from CHORLEY of the Athenæum, and from German critics. The Trio in E is of a light, graceful, somewhat sentimental character, and quite French. The Allegro movement seemed the truest to the Sonata character; it has pleasant themes, easily and skilfully developed, with a light running arpeggio for piano, which Mr. PARKER played with great neatness and delicacy. The Andante seemed to us more like a distinct, salon piece, than like a movement in a Sonata piece; it has a soft, nocturne-like sentiment, and considerable beauty, without much depth. In the Finale we confess we were lost, and it seemed as if the composer were lost in the vague pursuit of a fit place to leave off at with all due éclat.—But we cannot profess ourselves able to form a reliable opinion of so elaborate a work upon a single hearing.

The Adagio of KUHLAU, like most things in which a flute rests upon a quartet of strings, was rather a milk and watery affair; it was well played, however. The Duet for violin and piano was quite charming in its way; a very genuine little musical fancy, artistically worked out, and making a nice bit of relief amid longer and more brain-taxing pieces; but less appreciable in that way, following as it did upon other light things.

The gem and real novelty of the evening was that glorious Quartet by FRANZ SCHUBERT, some portions of which we remembered to have heard only once before at a soirée of Mr. DRESSEL'S. How characteristic it is, from the first chord to the last! It has all the wildness, all the sweetness, all the fire and depth of passion, in a word the genius of its gifted author. It is full of those short, march-like rhythms, so mystical in their harmony, which abound in his piano works. The Andante opens like a solemn funeral march, of profound feeling and beauty, and reveals continually new wonders in a series of most poetic variations. The Scherzo is fairy-like, and the Finale marvellously exciting; there is a reminiscence in it of the "Erl King," a snatch of the same mysterious whispered melody, sung in harmonics on the strings. Finely played, as it was, it drew every hearer, wondering, delighted, thrilled, within the circle of that thoroughly romantic genius.

"O CARA IMMAGINE." Of this beautiful aria from MOZART'S "Magic Flute," sung by Mr. ARTHURSON at the last Orchestral Concert, we translate the following description by the composer's Russian biographer, OULIBICHEFF. It occurs in his analysis of the entire opera:

"No. 4 is one of the loveliest and most wonderful tenor arias in existence. In the beginning nothing decided, no figures and almost no accompaniment; an indeterminate rhythm. Scarcely has the orchestra given the key, E flat major, when the voice utters a long exclamation: Dies Bildniss ist bezaubernd schön! (This image is enchantingly beautiful!) One of those Ahs! which contains a whole history in itself, to speak in the jargon of our modern romanticists. Some speedily resolved doubts, about the nature of his feeling, cross the growing emotion of Tamino; melodic phrases alternate with declaimed ones, besides some instrumental answers; the key seems to waver, as if only waiting, until the matter be decided, to assume a more decided course. But when at length, through question after question about his own state of mind, the young man arrives at what for him and Mozart is the weightiest thing: Were the original of this image here, what would I do! then the conscious human Me is unfolded to its most secret depths; you see it in the elaboration of the answer (89d to 42d bar). Was ever the presentiment of first love, with all its fainting ecstasy, all the thrill and trembling of a virgin organization, reproduced with such psychological truth, such a godlike charm? Do you not feel the pulsation of the heart's minutest fibres in the accompaniment, and is there anything more happy than the general pause, which fills out the 43d measure? Tamino is at length clear in his own mind; the eyes of the image, growing more and more expressive, have solved for him the riddle, but his breath forsakes him when he finds it out. What if she were there?—O, were she now to come, Tamino knows what he would have to do. He would press her to his heart, and she should be forever his. Bravissimo! This brings love to its goal, and the musical progression is at an end, wonderfully concluding the lyrical moment and letting the composer rest. After the pause no doubt prevails, there are no more declamatory and inquiring phrases. It is all clear in the singer's soul; an unbounded yearning for possession seizes it; the melody flows on in steady stream. There is nothing like this aria, even in the repertoire of Mozart."

New Music.

(From G. P. Reed & Co.)

Soirées Musicales, by ROSINI. Nos. 6 and 7.

No. 6 is a naïve, pretty Tyrolean melody; La Pastorella dell' Alpi, or the Shepherdess of the Alps. It is quite easy, in the natural key, goes up to G, modulates into a sweet strain in the relative minor, and ends with a yodling refrain. No. 7, La Gita in Gondola, or the Boat Song, is lovely, both melody and accompaniment in Rosini's best vein. It reminds us of those delicious choruses and songs in the opening scene of "Tell", by the freshness and watery coolness of its melody, as well as by the rich surprises in its modulations, by which Rosini so well illustrates his own saying to Hiller: "All great composers have fine (subtle) modulations." To those who have some little mastery of accompaniment we commend it as one of the best songs that have recently appeared. The Italian words of both are given with Mr. SPRAGUE'S clever English version.

Invocation: Hear, sweet spirit, &c. Aria by BEETHOVEN. Pp. 7.

This is an adaptation, by Mr. J. Q. WETHERBEE, to English words, quite foreign to the original subject (but the Italian: Per pietà, non dir mi addio! is also given), of that most beautiful and singable Adagio from Beethoven's famous Scena: Ah perfido! in which he so successfully imitated the Italian operatic style, while he did something worthy of himself. The whole scena were well worth the attention of our best concert-singers. The piece is here transposed from the original key of E flat to C, so that it ranges no higher than F;—a convenience to most voices, but no improvement otherwise, as it involves in one place the pitching of the very low notes up an octave, thus inverting the melodic figure.

1. The dearest spot of earth to me is home. By WRIGHTON.
2. The Village Bells. By T. THORPE FREED.

Two pleasing and popular little ballads, sung by Miss ADLAIDE PHILLIPS at her debut and second concert after her return home to Boston. The first is arranged by her.

(From Oliver Ditson.)

Three Preludes and Fugues for the Organ. By MENDELSSOHN, Op. 37. No. 1, in C minor. Pp. 9.

These of course are masterly, and the best kind of organ study next to old BACH himself, with whose music Mendelssohn become thoroughly steeped. These are pedal fugues.

Cathedral Voluntaries for the Organ. Selected and arranged by V. NOVELLO. No. 2; pp. 8.

A series of little pieces selected from the works of old English composers, such as GIBBONS, Dr. BLOW, PURCELL, BOYCE, &c. A short biographical notice of each author is appended to the first selection from him.

MANUAL OF HARMONY AND THOROUGH BASS.—By J. C. D. PARKER, A. B.

(Published by Nathan Richardson.)

In this little duodecimo volume of 150 pages we have a remarkably complete, clear and concise elementary text-book, for the study of Harmony. It contains just all that is needed to be told, to initiate one into the technical mysteries of simple choral writing in four parts. The first part of the book is about Notation, and explains the Scales and Rhythm, very happily.

The writer's end is practical; he seeks to possess the pupil with the ways of music as in general practice, and of course does not trouble him with theoretic questions, complications and laws bristling with exceptions. Hence we are not surprised that he adopts the usual confused and unscientific definition of the Minor Scale, a definition derived from the Signature rather than from the thing signified. "As this Minor Scale contains the same tones with the major scale, it must have the same signature." But the minor scale does not contain the same tones as its relative major. The scale of A minor has not the same tones with that of C major; it differs in that its G must be sharp. This the harmony requires; and the only true scale is that furnished by the harmony, i. e. the chords of the tonic, dominant and subdominant. It is true that in singing and playing, in mere melody, the strict minor scale is often modified, and it is quite common to make its sixth and seventh sharp in ascending, and flat in descending. But this is not the real minor Scale; it is only a pleasant melodic variation of it. A Scale is not a tune or phrase of melody, but a simple list or musical alphabet of the sounds used in any given key. In composition, the seventh always must be sharp, except when it occurs as a passing note, or when you modulate into another key. This the author of course knew, and had to append to his definition a note: "We shall find in Part II. that the rules of harmony require one degree of the minor scale to be altered." It is the signature, that misleads and makes this contradiction. The true signature for A minor, should not be that of C major, but should have one sharp on G. The true signature, although perhaps the one in use is more convenient. The real characteristic of the minor scale is the minor third, and it seems to us, a more complete and simple definition of it would be something like this: "The minor scale is formed from the major by flattening the Third, which by sympathetic affinity draws down with it the Sixth." But we can only hint our idea now.

In the main portion of the book the doctrine of the Intervals, principal Chords, Modulation, Suspension, &c., is laid down with great brevity and clearness; reviewed by question and answer, and enforced by exercises to be written. The essential rules for progression in writing four-part harmony are clearly stated, and exemplified by chorales from Mendelssohn and Bach. We think the book answers the purpose of a short and simple "Manual" for beginners, admirably.

Musical Chat-Chat.

To-night we have another feast of symphony and overture by a grand orchestra, with Weber's Concerto, played by our townsman WILLIAM MASON, and songs by a charming, fresh young singer. Shall not the Music Hall be crowded for the Third Orchestral Concert? Read the programme!... Tomorrow night the HANDEL and HAYDN take their turn in the "Messiah", and we shall hear ADLAIDE PHILLIPS sing those sacred songs in the Music Hall, with able colleagues in the solos, well drilled orchestra and chorus.... On Tuesday (Christmas) evening the same oratorio by the MUSICAL EDU-CATION SOCIETY.....On Monday evening the City Crier has a benefit concert: may his bell ring in a goodly audience!

The "German Trio" (Messrs. GARTNER, JUNG-NICKEL and HAUSE) give their first concert at Chickering's, next Saturday evening....Illness has prevented OTTO DRESEL from fixing the night of his first Soirée; but it will be announced in a few days. He will have the aid of Mrs. WENTWORTH, and of Messrs. SCHULTZE and JUNG-NICKEL, and will present two Trios, (one by Mendelssohn and one original), one of the latest Sonatas of Beethoven (never played here), songs from Bach and Mozart, a violin and piano piece by Schubert, &c., &c.... There is a prospect, we learn, that WILLIAM MASON will give a soirée at Chickering's on Wednesday, and let us hear a Trio by that latest new light, BRAHMS.

Lovers of great organ music will be glad to learn that Mr. MORGAN contemplates visiting our city again soon, and giving some soirées on the Tremont Temple organ....Concerts are rife in our surrounding towns. At South Boston, Mr. and Mrs. GARRET have given their annual concerts with great acceptance; and the Union Musical Institute are about commencing a series with the "Creation." In Salem, the Choral society announce MOZART's 12th Mass, and other selections, under the direction of Mr. FENELLOSA, for Christmas. In Worcester, the Mozart Society are practising the "Messiah."

A subscriber in New York takes us to task for admitting the remarks of a "Veritas" upon GOTTSCHALK's playing at a Philadelphia concert. We regret we have no room to print his letter, as our rule is to let all sides be heard. At present we can only say, we do not by publishing endorse all the opinions of our correspondents. On looking over the remarks in question, (to which we did not perhaps pay sufficient attention before the letter went to press), we are free to confess that they do strike us as too sweeping. Pray be careful, Mr. "Veritas."

ROSSINI, MEYERBEER and VERDI were all in Paris on the 26th ult....At the Grand Opera, Les Vêpres Siciliennes continued to fill the house after a run of four months (with some interruptions), and seats at a premium....CHARLES HALLE, the admirable classical pianist, has removed from Manchester to London....AUBER is engaged on a new comic opera for Mme. MARIE CABET, to be produced early in January....The Paris Exhibition ended with a monster concert, under the direction of BERLIOZ, in which there were 1250 performers, viz. 510 instrumental and 740 vocal. There were 400 sopranos and contraltos (100 of them boys,) 150 tenors and 170 basses. The orchestra comprised 140 violins, 60 violas, 50 violoncellos, 50 basses, 30 harps, and 180 wind instruments, drums, &c. Berlioz, it is said, directed this immense army by means of the newly-invented five-arm Electric Metronome, which transmitted his commands to his five sub-directors, M. TILMANT, (director of the Opera Comique), BOTTESINI (of the Italian Opera), HELLMESBERGER, (director of the Vienna Conservatoire), VAUTROL (singing teacher of the Opera Comique), and HURAND, (maître de chapelle at St. Eustache). Masterpieces of Mozart, Gluck, Handel, Weber, Beethoven, Meyerbeer, Rossini, Berlioz, and others were performed; and the effect was immense, particularly of the Prayer from "Moses in Egypt," with 30 harps in the accompaniment. This was on the 15th of November. On the 24th there was to be another such monster concert, the admittance fees being from $1 to $2, concluding a series of which the correspondent of the Picayune says:

"On the 20th and 22d the same performers will give, led by M. FELICIEN DAVID, fragments from the latter's Desert and Christophe Colomb. On the 18th and 25th, (which are Sundays) various choral societies, amounting in all to 3,000 voices will be led by M. CH. GOUNOD, the author of La Nonne Sanglante. The other days—the closing ceremonies will last ten days—the band of the Imperial Guard will give concerts lead by M. TILMANT, the leader of the Opéra-Comique."

Mme. JENNY LIND GOLDSCHMIDT has been passing some ten days in Paris on her way to London, where Mr. Mitchell, of the St. James Theatre, has engaged her to sing in the course of the winter, at Exeter Hall, in sacred music only. She is also to sing at the concert given as a testimonial to Miss NIGHTINGALE. Of course there are a plenty of puns upon the two nightingales. In Geneva Jenny gave two concerts, one for the benefit of ERNST, the violinist, and one for the poor. In Vevay, too, a small Swiss town, she said (according to the Sig-nale): "I will sing for the benefit of the poor here." But before the day came, the nightingale was hoarse and could not sing. "The poor cannot wait," she said, and sent them 2,000 francs.

L'ART DU CHANT APPLIQUÉ AU PIANO. BY S. THALBERG.

As the Piano, properly speaking, cannot render that which is most perfect in the beautiful art of Singing, namely, the faculty of prolonging sounds, we must overcome this imperfection with address and skill, and be able, not only to simulate sustained and prolonged notes, but to swell them also. Emotion renders us ingenious, and the necessity of expressing what we feel creates for us resources which never occur to the mechanical performer.

With this fact in view, the distinguished THALBERG has in this work, in which he applies the art of singing to the Piano Forte, selected transcriptions from those masterpieces of the great composers, both ancient and modern, which are most particularly vocal in their effects, and adopted a simple form as the most appropriate for true transcriptions, in order that they may be within the comprehension and executive ability of young pianists, tolerably advanced. The prominent feature of these transcriptions is the singing part, the melody, to which particular attention is given, holding to that fruitful thought of a great writer, that it is Melody and not Harmony, which lives on triumphantly through the lapse of centuries.

The work is prefaced with a series of general rules in the art of singing well, to which we would direct the special attention of all those who would aspire not only to the name, but the nature of a good performer.

The following is a list of the transcriptions:

1. QUATUOR de l'Opera I Puritani, de BELINI.
2. TRE GIORNI, Air de PERGOLESI.
3. ADELAIDE, de BREITOVEN.
4. AIR D'EGLEISE du celebre Chanteur STRADELLA.
5. LACRYMOSA tiré de Requiem de MOZART.
6. DUO de Noces de Figaro, Opera de MOZART.
7. PERCHE MI GUARDI E PIANGI, Duetto de Zelmira, de ROSSINI.
8. BELLA ADORATA INCOGNITA, Romanza dell' Opera Il Giuramento, de MERODANTE.
9. NEL SILENZIO FRA L'ORROR, Coro de Congiurati nell' Opera Il Crociato, de MEYERBEER.
10. EINSAM BIN ICH NICHT ALLEINE, Ballad tiré WERNER's Preciosa.
11. LA MEUNIER ET LE TORRENT, tiré des Chansons de la Meunier de F. SCHUBERT.
12. DUET de Der Freischütz, de WEBER.

NEW COURSE OF HARMONY, BY L. H. SOUTHARD.

The Publishers call the attention of the musical profession to this work, as one eminently calculated to lighten the labors of the teacher, and rapidly advance the pupil. It is emphatically a PRACTICAL work, serving both as a Manual of instruction on the one hand, and a Text-book on the other; and it is believed that the peculiar arrangement of the work, together with the very large number of exercises and examples, presents great advantages, to both scholar and teacher, over any similar work of the kind. Teachers highly commend the work. Mr. WILLIAM MASON says it is a work unsurpassed in the language. Mr. GEORGE J. WERN says that it is a work perspicuous in diction, methodical in arrangement, and sufficiently copious to embrace all the essentials of the general doctrine of accord. It can be ordered through any respectable Music-seller, and will be sent through the mail on the receipt of the price, ($1.75,) postage prepaid.

COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

WM. B. D. SIMMONS, Organ Builder,
(Heretofore doing business in the style of Wm. B. D. SIMMONS & Co.) and

GEORGE FISHER,

Of Cambridge, have this day formed a Copartnership for continuing the manufacture of Church Organs.

We design to keep in our Warerooms New Instruments for sale at prices from $400 to $1,500 each, and are prepared to build by contract at the shortest notice, Organs, worth from $600 to $12,000. And by prompt and faithful execution of orders hope to merit a like encouragement to that heretofore extended to Wm. B. D. SIMMONS, and which has indicated the necessity of this business connection, that his entire attention may be devoted to the more difficult and artistic parts of the business, so that an increase thereof may cause no diminution of the personal attention which is requisite for the maintenance of the CHARACTER of our instruments, upon which we rely for success.

While it will be our aim and ambition to furnish ORGANS OF A PERFECTION OF TONE AND MECHANISM, AND OF AN ELEGANCE OF EXTERIOR UNSURPASSED, we are confident of ability to offer terms MORE FAVORABLE THAN CAN BE OBTAINED ELSEWHERE, for the following reasons: Having ample means, we can purchase in large quantities at first cost, for cash; can always command the most talented assistants, and also do sufficient business to practice division of labor, which, by assigning parts to workmen skilled in their particular branch, necessarily insures better work at less expense. Our Manufactory, by its proximity to Charles river, enables us to receive lumber direct from the vessel at first cost, and having been erected expressly for the business, is in arrangement, also, convenience and its facilities unequalled, being furnished with steam engine, steam-heated drying-house, planing, grooving, matching, moulding, tenoning, boring, and other machines, together with lathe, scroll, circular and other saws, &c., all operated by steam power.

These facilities are such as are possessed by no other manufacturer of Organs in this country, and of themselves would enable us to furnish instruments, with a fair profit, at a price which those of like quality must cost builders who have work done by hand that can be better executed at half the cost by steam machinery.

Second hand Organs at all times for sale.
Orders for tuning church organs promptly attended to, and contracts taken for tuning by the year.
Orders respectfully solicited.

FIRST PREMIUM MELODEONS,

The Very Best now Manufactured.

J. S. D. & H. W. SMITH respectfully call the attention of the public to their IMPROVED MELODEONS, constantly on exhibition at their Warerooms,

No. 417 Washington Street.

By means of a new method of voicing, known only to themselves, they have succeeded in removing the harsh and buzzing sound which formerly characterized the instrument, rendering the tones full, clear and organ-like. The action is prompt and reliable, enabling the performer to execute the most rapid music without obscuring the tones. The swell is arranged to give great expression.

The manufacturers received the First Premium, over all competitors, at the Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association; also at the Metropolitan Mechanics' Fair, held at Washington, D. C.

For the Parlor, instruments are furnished at prices varying from $45 to $150.

Larger instruments, with two banks of keys, for chapels and small churches, from $150 to $300.

This last instrument, known as the ORGAN HARMONIUM, has been essentially improved by Messrs. Smith, and they have secured a patent therefor.

Persons who wish to hire Melodeons with a view of purchasing at the end of the year, can have the rents credited as part payment of the purchase money.

Chat with Rossini.

BY FERDINAND MILLER.

Translated for this Journal from the Zeitung of Cologne.

X.

We talked one day a long time about CHERUBINI. ROSSINI, who had lived in the greatest intimacy with him and his family, told me many things before unknown to me. The conversation turned upon his peculiar character, in which a genuine kindness lay hidden under a somewhat rough shell, which he frequently presented at the outset. I too was able to communicate to the maestro many a trait which interested him. "Here and there something of that occasional moroseness of his passed into his music," said he finally. "But what a great musician! and the bravest man one can imagine. But do you know any composer, who has effected such a total transformation in his style?"

—His earlier operas, to be sure, said I, give you not the remotest anticipation of the composer of the Medea. But he made no account of those works, and he wrote me once, when I asked him for some of them to look through, that they were attempts of a young man just out of school.

—Yet I caused him great pleasure one day by reminiscences from his Giulio Sabino, said Rossini.

—How so?

—He had written that opera for the tenor, BABINI, of whom I afterwards took singing lessons. Babini had sung over a good deal of it to me, which I remembered when I came to Paris. One day, after dinner, at Cherubini's, I sat down at the piano and sang to him these songs of his early youth. He could scarcely contain himself for amazement, since naturally he could not guess at the connection,—but the tears came into his eyes.

—It must have carried him some forty years' back, said I. That must have affected him!—And that you should have brought it to his hearing!

—Did you know old SALIERI too? and WINTER? asked Rossini.

—Neither of them.

—I saw the latter in Milan, said the maestro, when he brought out there his Maometto II. There were very fine things in that opera; I remember especially a Terzet, in which one person behind the scenes had a broadly laid out cantilena, while the other two carried on a dramatic duet on the stage; it was capitally made and very effective. What annoyed me in Winter, was his distastefulness (Unappetitlichkeit). He was a man of lofty and imposing exterior, but cleanliness was not his strong side.

—O dear!

—One day he invited me to dinner. There came on a huge dish of polpetti's, to which he helped me and himself in oriental manner, with his fingers. That ended the dinner for me!

—That was a fearful occurrence. And Salieri? Did you see him in Vienna? I inquired.

—Certainly, the good, old gentleman! At that time he had a passion for composing canons, and came pretty regularly to supper with us.

—To compose canons?

—To get them sung. My wife and I, DAVID and NOZARI, who commonly ate with us, formed quite a respectable vocal quartet together. At last we grew quite dizzy with those interminable canons, and we begged him to hold in a little.

—His opera, Azur, is among my earliest musical recollections, said I.

—It contains capital pieces, as do all his operas. In his Grotto di Trofonio, to be sure, he was not up to his poet; CASTI's libretto is a real masterpiece. Poor Salieri! Have they not accused him of MOZART's death? said Rossini, waxing somewhat warm.

—Nobody believes in it, said I in a pacifying tone.

—At all events, this scandal was very seriously circulated. I asked him directly one day, after a canon: "Did you really poison Mozart?" He planted himself before me proudly, and said: "Look at me closely; do I look like a murderer?" And certainly he did not.

—Yet he may have been jealous of Mozart, I suggested.

—That is very likely, said Rossini; but you will confess, it is a long way from that to mixing poison.

—Which, thank God, is not readily undertaken; if it were, composers would die off like flies. But since we are talking of those old masters, tell me something more of SIMON MAIR, of whom I know as good as nothing. Had he a strong gift of invention?

—He made himself so great a name less by that, perhaps, than by the fact that he first drew more attention in Italy to the dramatic element. Moreover in the expansion of instrumentation in our country he and PARR have had the greatest influence.

—I saw him once in his extreme old age direct a mass at Verona, said I,—or rather I heard him direct, for he drowned choir and orchestra by tapping with a roll of paper, which served him for a bâton.

—He was a worthy man, said Rossini, and one of comprehensive scientific culture. His Medea, which he composed in his later years for Naples, is a distinguished opera.

—What an expansion the Italian opera has gained though, since the time of METASTASIO, I began, when a couple of dozen arias and a little chorus formed the musical contents of a lyric drama!

—Not to forget the Recitatives, said the maestro, which were admirably treated by the good composers, and with which the best singers of that time often produced more effect and earned greater applause, than with the bravura airs. The latter, considered with reference to the text, were actually hors d'œuvres. They contained some sort of a pathetic image, and at the most repeated an expression of feelings, which had before been uttered to satiety. But METASTASIO has, after ZENO, the great merit of having peculiarly adapted our language to music. He brought into use a genuine selection of euphonious, singable words, and in this remains a model for all times. Do you know any compositions of JOMELLI?

—Church compositions, but no operas, I answered.

—He is the most genial of our composers of that time, continued Rossini. No one knew how to treat the voice so well. His slow movements especially are often of wonderful melodic beauty.

—But no one would seek to produce an effect with them to-day, said I, inquiringly.

—The forms, to be sure, in our Art are so changeable and so important, replied Rossini. Besides, no one now-a-days would be able to sing those things; they require a sustaining of the respiration, of which only the castrati were capable, whether it were owing to their thorough studies, or their bodily constitution.

—The earlier Italian singers must have taken quite other liberties than those of our time, said I, if one compares the accounts of their extraordinary virtuosity with the simple songs, which the composers often wrote for them.

—True, the opera composers of that time commonly played a quite subordinate part, and gave the singers merely sketches, which they filled out at pleasure. Nevertheless men like DURANTE, LOTTI and JOMELLI will remain great masters for all times, exclaimed Rossini.

Life of John Sebastian Bach;

WITH A CRITICAL VIEW OF HIS COMPOSITIONS, BY J. N. FOKKEL.

IV.—Instrumental Music.

There are few instruments for which Bach has not written. It was the custom, in his time, to play in the church during the communion service a concerto or solo on some instrument. He often wrote such pieces, and so contrived them that they were always a source of improvement to the performer. Most of these pieces are now lost; but for this loss we are, however, richly indemnified by the preservation of two other pieces of a different sort, viz.:—1. Six solos for the violin, without any accompaniment; and, 2. Six solos for the violoncello, likewise without accompaniment. All these twelve solos were for very many years universally considered by the most eminent performers, as the best practice extant for rendering the student complete master of his instrument.

V.—Vocal Music.

1.—Five complete annual series of church music, for all Sundays and holidays.

2.—Five compositions for the Passion week; one of which is for two choruses.

3.—Several oratorios, masses, magnificat, single sanctus, compositions for birth-days and saints'-days, for funerals, marriages, serenades, and some Italian cantatas.

4.—Many motets for one and two choruses.

Most of these works are now, however, dispersed. The annual series were, after Bach's death, divided between his eldest sons, leaving, however, to W. Friedemann the largest share, as from the situation he then held at Halle, he had most use for them. But in the end his circumstances compelled him gradually to part with them all. All his other principal vocal compositions are scattered abroad. Of the motets for two choruses, eight or ten remain in the hands of different persons. The collection of music, left by the Princess Amelia of Prussia, to the Gymnasium of Joachim, and that at Berlin contains perhaps more of Bach's vocal music, than is to be found collectively in any other quarter. Though even here the compositions are not numerous. Among them are:

1. Twenty-one church cantatas. In one of them, on the words, "Schlage doch, gewünschte Stunde," the composer has introduced bells obligato; from whence we may infer that the cantata at least was not the production of his maturer taste.

2. Two masses for five voices, with accompaniments for many instruments.

3. A mass for two choruses. The first accompanied by stringed instruments, the second by wind instruments.

4. A Passion for two choruses. The text is by Picander.

5. A Sanctus for four voices, and accompanied by instruments.

6. A motet for four voices, "Aus tiefer Noth schrie ich zu dir."

7. A motet for five voices, "Jesu, meine Freude."

8. Four motets for eight voices, in two choruses; viz. A. "Fürchte dich nicht, ich bin bey dir," &c. B. "Der Geist hilft unserer Schwachheit auf," &c. C. "Komm Jesu, komm," &c. D. "Singet dem Herrn ein neues Lied."

9. A single fugue with four voices, "Nimm was dein ist, und gehe hin," &c.

10. A cantata, with recitations, airs, a duet, and a chorus. This is a rural cantata.

To this last cantata is prefixed a notice; and to the mass for two choruses, No 3, an explanation, both written by Kirnberger, pointing out the great art shown in the composition.

Signor Masoni.

FROM THE PRIVATE PAPERS OF THE LATE MR. BROWN.

(A FANTASY PIECE.)

[Copyright secured according to law.]

II.

I reached Berlin, where I spent the next winter, in October. The day after my arrival, I saw the announcement of a "Sinfonie concert at Hennig's Garden, with grand orchestra by C. Liebig." With T. and J., and other music-loving Americans then in the city, I went out. My first glance at the orchestra showed me the fine face of MASONI. I did not seek him out immediately, choosing to observe him a little, for the strong impression which his features had made upon me had in some degree been lessened during eight months' absence, and I was curious to know if it would be renewed to the old extent. It was. I was more than ever convinced that I had met him long before. Who can he be? was the ever-recurring thought throughout the concert. His manly beauty had, if possible, become more striking, and the eyes of many a Fraulein wandered thither unconsciously. Still I fancied that I could detect evidence in his looks that all was not yet right within.

He played with no great animation, rather mechanically, through the overtures and symphony of WEBER, GLUCK and HAYDN, which were on the programme, but when the Marcia funebre of the Sinfonia Eroica, which formed the third part of the concert, came, his whole countenance changed, and the full, ringing tones of the Father Gutmann's Cremona proved that Masoni was Masoni still. All eyes sought out that first violin, and no small share of the applause, which followed the tomb-like silence during the movement, was in fact directed thitherward.

Masoni was unfeignedly glad to see me again, and the intercourse of the preceding winter was at once renewed with profit and pleasure on both sides. I found him greatly improved in mind and manners, but was sorry to see that he was often a victim to a morbid melancholy and quite without ambition; or rather, I may say, impressed with the idea that it would be vain for him to cherish that feeling. He seemed to have become weary of music. As I had already noticed, and as others told me, nothing but the Adagios and Andantes of BEETHOVEN'S Symphonies really aroused him; these never failed to do this; but when the symphony in C minor was given, he would become nervously excited and in the mighty triumphant tones of the march in the finale his instrument moved on with a dignity and power, which seemed to sweep all before it. Besides playing in the orchestra he had a few pupils, and occasionally some small composition from his pen appeared; but upon the whole his great talents lay buried in a napkin. His intellectual progress was marked, and I felt very soon that after a little intercourse in good society few young men would be fitted to take so high a place as he. I introduced him to the American students, who, during that winter (1849-50) formed so refined a circle at the house of the American Chargé des Affaires. In their society—young men who did the American name honor abroad, as many of them are already doing at home—he seemed to know and appreciate himself better, and the cloud, whatsoever it was, began to have its "silver lining" and show signs of clearing away altogether.

Liebig, as Kapellmeister to the Emperor Alexander regiment, furnishes, with such members of his orchestra as belong to the band, the music at the grand dinners of the Russian Ambassador, on which occasions his concerts are necessarily deferred until evening, at seven o'clock. One of these dinners was given a few days before Christmas, but the concert was announced by the proprietors of the Garden—they having an eye to the profits of their kitchen—at six. As the audience comes early to secure favorable seats, long before seven there were manifest signs of impatience, notwithstanding the general good humor of the Germans, as they sit in little groups around the tables, with their coffee, chocolate, beer, "butter-brod," and what not before them, and the cigars in their mouths. Some became weary and went home, claiming and receiving their tickets at the door. Most remained, and the fun grew so fast and furious that I began to look round for the Argus eyes of the police, whose vigilance at that time was redoubled by the recollection of the then recent events of '48.

Suddenly there was a general hush! hush! I looked up and Masoni was standing alone upon the stage as firm, calm and collected as if he had played the virtuoso all his life. Not belonging to the regimental band, he was here, as ignorant as others of the cause of the delay. The impatience of the audience was rising to such a height, that, though with great reluctance, he had been persuaded by some who knew his powers to try the effect of his violin upon the crowd. Once before them, all trepidation, all want of confidence disappeared. The audience in general knew nothing of him as a soloist, but his well known playing in Beethoven's symphonies was remembered, and then his personal appearance, as he stood there in all his beauty, in the prime of manhood, so collected, so self-relying, strongly prepossessed every one in his favor. This prepossession increased with every note of "The Last Rose of Summer," which he played as he alone could play it, and which had just been made the popular air of all Germany by its introduction into FLOTOW'S "Martha." The applause which followed called him out again and it was clear that the song had been but a test to try the temper of the audience. Now he began with a prelude, which riveted the attention of every artist in the house, and prepared the way for one of those immensely difficult fugues for the violin, which no one save BACH ever composed, and with which but two or three artists in a century venture to grapple; for although many may conquer the merely technical difficulties, it is quite another thing to add that soul of sentiment and feeling without which they are but lifeless bodies of musical notes. The applause which followed, I need not say, was general and loud, for the perfection of the performance was clear to every mind. With hardly a pause, a short prelude now led into a slow, measured, solemn melody, unknown to most of the Germans, although familiar to every musician, the "Dead March" from Saul! An odd selection indeed; but the effect, as he sang it upon his instrument, with bells tolling from the lower strings, now giving it the sadness and sorrow of a desolate heart, and now filling the simple chords with the pomp of a king's burial, was indescribable and thrilled every nerve of every auditor. Is there in all music an example of so much accomplished in so few notes? Truly Mozart and Beethoven were right in the lofty homage they paid to the genius and majesty of Handel!

Secure of his audience, he began to extemporize, as none even of his most intimate friends had ever heard him before. As a skilful converser watches the expression in the faces of his companions and guides himself in some measure thereby, touching some points lightly and laying greater stress upon others, so Masoni in his extemporaneous efforts was in the habit of closely watching the effect produced upon his auditors. I doubt not that this heightened the magical influence of his playing upon those before him.

His magnificent eyes had, in general, a power of fascination I have never seen in any other case; but now they were lighted up with intense excitement, and when they rested for a moment upon this face or upon that, whoever caught their glance felt as if the player was laying bare some secret of his heart for him alone. The spell upon the audience had extended even to the waiters, who stood here and there, with their white napkins in their hands, motionless as statues, and for once the incessant jingle and rattling of dishes and glasses at the distant counter ceased. Strains the saddest and most touching interchanged with others of startling joyousness and wild gaiety; passages most intricate and of unheard difficulty, with melodies simple as a child's song. I can now believe all I have heard of the effects of Paganini's performances. He allowed no opportunity to his hearers to vent their feelings in applause. At moments when it seemed impossible to restrain a general burst of admiration, some turn in the music would be so skilfully and happily introduced as again to secure unbroken silence. For instance, just before he closed, he had reached a climax of the wildest, almost diabolical glee, in which his instrument spoke, as if possessed by a demon. "Bravo! bravo!" was heard lightly spoken, and every one was but waiting for the closing chord to give loud utterance to his hearty delight; but instead of the expected close, every hand was arrested, every voice silenced by an instantaneous change in the entire character of the music, which fell in the twinkling of an eye into a plain, homely, but the saddest of all American Negro melodies!

My own feelings during all this may be judged by what I have written. It was a new experience, a new revelation to me in music. Moreover the old feeling that I had formerly seen Masoni, and that I ought to know him had grown stronger with every note, until it was absolutely painful. And now as those sad, rude sounds from home met my ear, memory was illumined as by a flash of lightning, I was carried back a dozen years, the whole history was before me, and I involuntarily uttered a loud exclamation, which called forth a volley of hisses from my neighbors.

With this melody, which he gave in all sorts of wonderful forms, he closed. From the more thoughtless of the audience a storm of applause followed; the truly artistic portion arose in silence, took their cloaks and hats, and quietly departed—they wished for no more music that evening! I hurried to Masoni. Several persons surrounded him, and were congratulating him upon his success. He listened as in a dream, hardly hearing what was said.

"Come, Masoni," said I, "you are too much excited to stay; I dare not leave you here. There comes Liebig; excuse yourself and go home with me."

Liebig gave his consent; I packed up the Cremona, threw his cloak over his shoulders, took him out, and finding how much he was exhausted by the unwonted excitement, called a droschky, and ordered the man to drive us to my room in Marien St. Masoni sank into a corner of the vehicle, and we rode through Invaliden St. and the New Gate in silence. As we passed down Louisen St., I called his attention to the numberless Christmas trees, which the people, old and young, rich and poor, were carrying, or having conveyed to their homes. Receiving no answer, I looked round and found him with his face buried in his cloak, his overtaken nervous system quite given way, and weeping like a child.

Madam Rosenhagen made us a pot of strong, fragrant tea, of which I forced him to drink freely, and under the influence of which he gradually cheered up, and recovered his equanimity. We sat an hour or two, discoursing upon books and indifferent matters, until he had fully recovered himself; and then, turning partly away from him, as he reclined upon the sofa, I began:—

"Masoni, I have a story to tell you."

"Go on."

"Ten or twelve years ago, being, like most very young men in America, a very great politician, I went to Washington, to be present at the opening of Congress, and make a personal inspection of the 'assembled wisdom.' When the Christmas vacation came, I went down into Virginia, and sought out an old college acquaintance or two. A near neighbor of one of them was a great corn and tobacco planter, a Mr. Mason, who, though not at all connected in blood with the many Virginia politicians and public men of that name, was a descendant and the representative of one of the oldest families in the 'Ancient Dominion.' He was a gentleman of the old school, and kept up many old customs upon his plantation. Among them was the observance of Christmas. The holidays were a time of general festivity, as well for his numerous slaves, as for his family and the many friends who collected there. A large out-building was cleared of its contents, trimmed with pines and other evergreens, and devoted to the merry-makings of his people, where they could enjoy themselves for a week or ten days, without let or hindrance. My friend took me over one evening to witness their proceedings at a ball. I found the affair amusing, and could not help heartily sympathizing with the dancers in their enjoyment. It would however have made little impression upon my memory, had I not been so much struck with the performance of the young slave, who officiated as fiddler upon the occasion. He was so perfectly free from all marks of an African origin, that I did not dream of his being a slave, until in reply to my question, 'who is the violinist?' my friend said: 'He is one of Mason's boys, and is thought a great musical genius in these parts.' I took him to be about eighteen years of age, but young as he was, his mastery of the instrument, a poor old plantation fiddle, struck me as beyond anything I had then ever heard. Fond as the negroes are of dancing, they seemed to enjoy his playing even more. And after each dance, he must give them a tune or two for the sake of the music, to which they listened with a silence and attention seldom to be found in audiences of greater pretensions to refinement and musical culture. The well-known impressibility of the African race to the effects of music was here exhibited in a high degree; but, for that matter, the whites, who were there as spectators, were not unmoved. I should not like to risk in a romance a description of the power of music, as I saw it exerted that evening, upon those poor untutored beings. Old songs, Methodist camp-meeting tunes, negro ditties and simple plantation melodies were the groundwork of his music, but they became transmuted into sterling gold under his bow. It was a mystery to me how it could escape the notice of masters and overseers that in these simple forms the player was pouring out his whole soul, and discoursing of oppression and sorrow, of freedom and happiness, of affections crushed and hearts desolate, of longings infinite for home, family, and a recognition of the humanity inborn. Now his violin wailed in anguish, and then it would burst out into indignant tones, the Marseillaise of the slaves. Every change in the mood of the player was reflected in the faces of his auditors. Their dark faces were mirrors, which reflected each passing emotion as the stream of music went on. In one of his bursts of indignant—perhaps I may say, insurrectionary feeling, some of the young, strong and more untamed of the field hands began to breathe hard; a fierce expression lit up their dark eyes, and a boding restlessness was observable.

"'Quit that,' said a harsh voice, 'and play something lively.'

"The current changed to a lively measure, and in a moment the floor was covered with dancers.

"Masoni, that evening has come back to memory as distinctly as if it was an event of yesterday. What became of that young man, of course I never knew—but"

I turned suddenly round, and saw Masoni sitting upright, his face deadly pale, and his eyes fixed upon mine with an expression—shall I say, of horror?—"this evening I have found him. You—"

"Are that slave!" he gasped, rather than said. "Brown, I am that slave," he continued, after a moment's struggle with himself, and bowing his head as if my knowledge of the fact had reduced him again in reality to that condition—"I am that slave. And it is the crushing consciousness that I am an American slave, the personal chattel of a man, liable to be caught, imprisoned, flogged, sold, any day, should I ever see home again, that is crushing out all the manhood within me. This damning consciousness is killing me. Since the death of Father Gutmann, this thought has been gaining ever increased power over me, and I now bear it about with me continually, an incubus weighing me down, ponderous as a world. When I made my unlucky appearance in Leipzig, I was full of hope and ambition, and went forward with all confidence; but as I raised my bow for the first touch, the sickening thought came over me, like a sneer from a demon: 'Ho! ho! pretty well for a Virginia slave!' From that moment the thought has fastened itself upon me, and seldom, except with you, is its crushing weight lifted. There are those, who as soon as they are free become men! It elevates and ennobles them to breathe free air. My temperament is different. No woman can be more sensitive, and when in social circles I find myself honored and treated as I feel I do in fact deserve to be treated, my happiness is blasted by the grinning devil's: 'Oh ho! pretty well for a Virginia slave!' Christmas—and you now know why—is to me a period of strange sorrow, regret, indeed of an infinite conflict of emotions. This evening I forgot myself entirely. As I stood before the audience, I was again on the old plantation, the people lost their identity, and I was playing to the poor beings among whom I was born, and over whom I had so often exerted my power. But I say, Brown," said he suddenly, while a triumphant look gleamed from his eyes, "the Cremona has as much power as the old fiddle had, though!"

"Yes, Masoni, it was the most wonderful thing I ever witnessed—but that old plantation melody revealed you. Ever since I first saw you in Leipzig, as I was going to the Post-office, your face has been a mystery to me. But now, my good fellow, I know your secret; you will find it easier to bear, now that it is one no longer. You are no slave to me, and here is my hand in token of the sincerity of my heart, as I welcome you as an equal—musically a thousand times my superior—among 'free white folks.' Go home now and sleep, and come to-morrow and tell me your history."

With a look of gratitude and affection, Masoni left me.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.—We copy the following just tribute to our noble hall from the Daily Advertiser of Dec. 28. It is plainly from the pen of one who can speak with authority in such matters.

Having but recently established a fixed residence in the city, I visited this hall, for the first time, on the occasion of the orchestral concert on Saturday evening last, partly with the view of noticing its adaptation to give a pleasant effect to vocal and instrumental sounds to all of a large audience. It is well known the edifice was carefully designed by some of our own liberal scientific gentlemen for this especial purpose. Other structures have had the same object in view. Among the best known are Exeter Hall, at London, the Grand Opera House in Paris, and the theatre of San Carlo, at Naples. All of these I have had the pleasure of testing, and it is a source of great satisfaction to observe the superiority of our own edifice. Detailed accounts of the principles of construction of the Music Hall have been published, but there is always a satisfaction in looking at a good thing and remembering when we are well off. The curved surfaces so commonly used in the larger audience rooms will always have the effect to throw the sound more about certain points; in one place you are deafened, and in another the sound appears half a mile off. In aristocratic countries, where only half the world are privileged to have the best, possibly they could find suitable places. But here, where the public respects itself, all provision must be as good as the best. The common ornaments, decorations and fittings, are another disadvantage. The sound seems to be absorbed and lost, like light upon a dull black, so that among the boxes, projections, recesses and drapery, you might imagine yourself looking through a telescope, where things appeared near but sounded distant. So apparent was this defect in the House of Lords, in the new Parliament House in London, that the noble occupants found themselves in a great degree of privacy from the galleries, and even from each other, on different parts of the same floor; their words seemed to be mysteriously snatched away out of their mouths and smothered in a faint echo. Punch, with his usual kindness, proffered a set of signs and motions, so that by means of violent gesticulation with hands, arms and umbrellas, the members might get through a tolerable speech, in spite of the impracticable nature of the magic apartment. I was pleased to find all parts of the Music Hall so nearly alike. Distant or near, above or below, the beautiful performance, following now the rustling of the leaves, and the purling of the brooks, and now the grandeur of the thunder storm, was clear and distinct, and fully enjoyed. The chaste and classic exhibition, both vocal and instrumental, was of a high order, and deserves a longer notice, but I have only designed to call attention to the rational enjoyment and continued satisfaction which such a hall, and the art and taste naturally cherished by it, will, year by year, bestow upon us. Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, JAN'Y 1, 1856.—I have merely time to-day, to wish you, Mr. Editor, as well as the Journal, a very happy New Year, and to give you, in outline, my impressions of GOTTSCHALK, whom I heard for the first time last Thursday. His second Soirée was even more crowded than the first, and most of the audience seemed delighted with what they heard, and perhaps, too, with what they saw. It is indeed curious to see those hands thrown about so at random, and yet never once losing a note. As far as mechanism is concerned, I think I have never seen Mr. Gottschalk's superior, unless it was LISZT. Nor is it the pretty, flaggee-work mechanism of HERZ and the like. There is foundation and character enough in Gottschalk's playing to make the true lover of music regret that these qualities are not applied to something higher than the music he gives us. I am always suspicious of the true artist spirit of a musician who brings before us none or hardly any but his own compositions. Now on Thursday night the only piece not by Gottschalk was WEBER's Concert-stück, to which HOFFMANN played the orchestral accompaniment on a second piano. Some Variations and a Finale of BEETHOVEN (from the "Kreutzer Sonata"?) which were at first on the programme, were omitted. Of the first pieces I liked best the Bullade and the Marche de Nuit, which were played with much expression. The "Banjo," which you know, I thought curious, not as a composition, but inasmuch as its notes sound for all the world like those of a Banjo, and totally unlike those of a piano. But is not this a desecration of the instrument? It really gave me pain to hear that beautiful Chickering "Grand" put to such a use.

The other numbers were the composer's "Italian Glories" and "Jerusalem Marche Triumphale," which struck me as very noisy, and abounding in difficulties. In the last piece, the latter, for ought I could see and hear, were conquered with no more ease by Gottschalk than by Hoffmann, who, even in the inferior part which he played on this evening, maintained his position as the true, earnest, unassuming artist. When I hear Gottschalk render works of the great standard composers as well and truthfully as he does his own, I shall begin to think him too a true artist. But the Concert-stück proved him still far from this point, for though its technical execution was wonderful, it was very much wanting in fire and inspiration.

I have heard that GOTTSCHALK, MASON and SATTER will, before long, give us a joint concert; though nothing definite is known about it yet.

To-morrow night the MOLLENHAUERS take their leave of New York and America. I wish them a full house; but do not know whether I shall be able to hear them.

MME. JENNY LIND GOLDSCHMIDT'S RE-APPEARANCE.—The eagerness with which every movement of the great singer of our age is chronicled and read, is proof how deep and lasting is the impression of her Art. We can but follow suit, therefore, with all the newspapers, in copying the following notice from the Times, of her performance in oratorio (after an absence of six years) in London on the 10th ult.

* * * The professional life of Jenny Lind, up to this period, has been without exception the most extraordinary on record; and it is no little to say in her favor that the almost ridiculous fanaticism with which she has been idolized, the preposterous exaggeration that has been associated with her name, the manner in which the very nobility of her heart and the inborn generosity of her nature, have been made a traffic of by speculators for exclusively sordid purposes, have left her still an artist—a great artist in the simplest and truest acceptance of the term. Like the hero and heroine in Mozart's fantastic Zauberflöte, she has passed through the ordeal of fire and water, and come forth pure.

Last night the first of a series of concerts, undertaken by Mr. Mitchell, and musically directed by Mr. Benedict, took place, when Haydn's oratorio of the 'Creation' was performed—the soprano music of the angel (Gabriel) and of the woman (Eve) being undertaken by Madame Jenny Goldschmidt-Lind. The hall was crammed to suffocation by an assembly almost as fashionable as in the full blaze of the Italian Opera. The prices of admission were dear—although perhaps, considering how rare must be the opportunities now of hearing Madame Lind in London, not too dear. * * * * *

Mme. Jenny Lind has already been heard in the 'Creation'; but as that otherwise comparatively feeble work (the smallest of those which, coming from a "classical" source, have been stamped and passed current as "great") contains some of the most effective, if not absolutely beautiful, airs, &c., for a soprano voice which the whole domain of sacred music can furnish, her choice can hardly be pronounced otherwise than discreet. Her singing, for the greater part—we may as well say, at once—was wonderfully fine, and no insignificant part of its attraction was traceable to its unadorned simplicity. In sacred music the most difficult thing to attain is this. To sing, as it were, with a reverence for the text—to make, without apparent effort, the signification of the words more clear and emphatic through the medium of their musical expression—to forget, in short, mere artistic acquirement in rendering art subservient to a higher purpose than display—should be the aim of every singer who wishes to excel in sacred music. This entire command of mechanical powers, this oblivion of the artist's self in the task set down, this art of concealing art where its egotistical exhibition would, to a pure and candid mind, be irrelevant, is a gift so rare that we can scarcely remember to have noted it in more than one or two. But Mme. Jenny Lind possesses it in a remarkable degree, and seems so well to understand its value that she never, in a single instance, fails to follow it as a guiding rule. Hence, among other less eminent qualities, her excellence as a performer in sacred oratorio.

The great recitative and air, "With verdure clad," showed at once that Mme. Lind's voice was what we remember it—the upper notes bright, liquid and powerful; the middle forcing their way (like Mario's) through what musicians metaphorically term a "veil," which cannot hide their beauty; the lower somewhat weak and toneless. It was changed neither for better nor for worse, but exercises its ancient fascination to the full. In her vocal execution (we have said enough to suggest that we consider her style and expression irreproachable.) Mme. Lind exhibits the same manifold excellencies and the same one defect—if a certain heaviness in the delivery of florid divisions, which is peculiarly German, may be strictly called a defect. Her intonation last night was for the most part exquisitely true; but we have heard it, on other occasions, more invariably faultless. One objection alone, however, can fairly be made, by the most uncompromising connoisseur, to her generally splendid, and indeed unrivalled, singing of "With verdure clad;" and this has reference to the passage where the voice part leads, through a scale, from G up to B flat. That this B flat, when (as in the case of Mme. Lind) it is a rich and powerful note, should also be a pet-note may be readily understood; but Haydn has not indicated, in the course of the three times of its recurrence, that a pause should be made upon it. We are almost inclined to admit that this is hypercriticism; but the fact is, without being a little hypercritical, it is rather difficult to criticize Mme. Lind at all in sacred music.

In the trio and chorus, Part II. ("The Lord is great"), the voice of the Swedish soprano, by its clearness and resonance in the higher notes, gave an importance to the principal solo that conducted greatly to its effect. The recitative and air, "On mighty pens," was a very fine performance, but, at the same time, so staid and sober that it almost appeared as though Mme. Lind was of opinion (and, if so, we share her opinion) that such a quaint bravura, full of shakes and triplets, was scarcely the fittest musical expression for that part of the text which refers to the creation of birds. A very happy change was made in this, upon the words "to the blazing sun"—where the singer introduced one of her favorite high notes (in place of Haydn's somewhat tame passage) with consummate effect. In the third part Mme. Lind was beyond criticism. The duet for Adam and Eve, "Graceful consort," was quite perfection. The audience were raised to enthusiasm, and the applause was so genuine, hearty, and unanimous, that it was cheering to listen to.

Paris.

[From Correspondence of London Musical World.]

The season of 1855 has been fatal to every kind of concert, vocal or instrumental. It was ended as it began.

On Sunday last a monster concert was advertised "per ordre," at the Palace of Industry. Enormous placards, some four yards square, were posted in every direction, and announced the tidings to the Parisian world. Upwards of 4,500 singers were to take part in this musical fête, and to march, banner in front, to the Industrial Palace. The following societies were furnished by the capital; L'Orphéon, of Paris, Les Enfants, of La Parisienne, Les Enfants of the Seine, La Chorale de L'Odéon, Les Enfants de Choisy-le-Roi, L'Orphéon of Nogent, Les Tyroliens, Les Enfants de Galia (Chapelle-Saint-Denis), L'Orphéon de Vaugirard, and L'Orphéon de Vanves. From the provinces came the choral societies of Strasbourg, Lille, and many others. Finally, from Belgium came the Les Echos d'Outre-Meuse, Les Amis Réunis, of Liège; La Société d'Orphée, La Société Lyrique, and L'Harmonie, from Mons; La Société des Etudiants, and La Société d'Orphée, of Ghent, &c. &c.

M. Berlioz was dethroned to make way for M.M. Gounod and Delaporte, as joint conductors, and four military bands, supplied with all M. Saxe's latest and most formidable inventions in the way of brass instruments, were destined to accompany this truly monster chorus. The following was the programme:—

God save the Queen.
Chorus: "Saint Hubert,".....Laurent de Billé.
Chorus: "La Muette,".....Auber.
Le vin des Gaulois,.....Gounod.
Aux armes,.....Clapissou.
La Retraite,.....Laurent de Billé.
O Salutaris,.....Dagué.
Vive l'Empereur,.....Gounod.

This programme formed a marked contrast with that put forth by M. Berlioz: and M.M. Gounod, Clapissou, and Laurent de Billé made but sorry substitutes for Beethoven, Mozart, and Rossini. The tickets were seven francs each, and the concert was announced for half-past one.

About one o'clock the public began to arrive, and at the hour appointed, half past one—the audience numbered some 10 or 12,000. The day was foggy, raw, and bitterly cold: the building comfortless, and the thermometer inside very little above freezing point. It was announced that the King of Sardinia, in company with the Emperor and Prince Napoleon, would honor the concert with his presence, but unfortunately his Sardinian Majesty had chosen the same day for the reception of the corps diplomatique. Whether it was that the diplomatists were more than usually prosy, or that the King dreaded the effect of M. Clapissou's music, the result was most unpleasant for the public. Two o'clock sounded and no royal or imperial majesties appeared. Point de roi, point de concert, seemed M. Gounod's idea, for he gave no sign of commencing.—The "audience"—quasi lucus a non lucendo—having nothing whereto to listen, began making noises on their own account, more significant than pleasant. At length M. Gounod favored them with his own cantata, "Vive l'Empereur." Its effect was extraordinary, and for nearly an hour no further sound was heard from the audience, who evidently dreaded lest the conductor should accept it as a signal, and favor them with a repetition of what they had just endured. Three o'clock came, and still the concert was uncommenced. A few minutes afterwards, however, the imperial party arrived, and took their seats while "Vive l'Empereur" was repeated. They seemed to feel the icy cold of the interior, and shortly after their arrival the Emperor whispered to the King, who immediately put on his hat, as did also the Prince Napoleon. The concert began, and proved a most entire failure. Auber's lovely chorus met with an encore, and was the only thing that in any degree thawed the ice of the audience. The imperial party left at four, and choristers, bands, and public soon afterwards dispersed.

The Trocatore has been given at the Italiens with great and well-deserved success. Mario was the Trocatore, and on the first night of his performance many of the audience seemed disappointed that he would not strain his voice like Baucardé, and compete with the anvils, bells, &c., which play so prominent a part in the opera. His success was therefore somewhat undecided. On further reflection, however, the public evidently concluded that he was in the right, and that such a lovely and cultivated organ as he possesses, wherewith to interpret the music of Mozart, Rossini, and Meyerbeer, should not be sacrificed at that shrine which has (according to Madame Jenny Lind) been the ruin of half the voices of Young Italy. On the second night he achieved an undeniable triumph, and was recalled after the "Miserere," and twice at the conclusion of the opera. Madame Borghi-Mamo confirmed and strengthened the favorable impression caused by her performance of Azucena last year. Her singing was admirable, particularly in the recitative of the second act; and in the prison scene she met with loud and well-won applause. Madame Penco—for whom the part of Leonora was originally written—was effective, and Signor Graziani displayed his fine voice to advantage, though he is getting too much into the habit of singing loud.

Roger is engaged for a term of four years at the Opera. This engagement is most satisfactory, for Roger is unquestionably the only good tenor at present on the French stage. He has accepted the principal part in Signor Biletta's new opera, La Rose de Florence, which is now in rehearsal.

I fear that next month will be the last that Mlle. Cruvelli will remain on the stage. Nothing can exceed the liberal offers made by M. Crosnier, and every inducement is held out in the hope of retaining so rare a prima donna.

BERLIN.—At the Royal Opera House, Herr Dorn's opera, Die Nibelungen has been revived, with Mlle. Johanna Wagner as Brunnhilde, her original part. Great activity still prevails in the world of concerts. At the last one given by Herr Joachim and Mme. Clara Schumann, the programme was particularly attractive, containing specimens of Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven, most admirably interpreted by Herr Joachim. Mme. Clara Schumann performed Beethoven's Sonata, "Les Adieux," "l'Absence, et le Retour," the Scherzo Capriccio in F, by Mendelssohn, and a Jagd und Schlummerlied, by Schumann. Mme. Mecklenburg diversified the purely instrumental character of the concert, by singing the first air from Iphigenia in Tauris. The second Quartet-Versammlung of Herren Zimmermann, Ronneburger, &c., took place in the Cecilia Hall at the Singacademie. Among other pieces, the programme included Beethoven's quartet in B major (Op. 127), Haydn's in E (Cah. 12, No. 3), and a fragment consisting of a Scherzo and Andante from Mendelssohn's posthumous works. Herr Wendt's new quartet was successfully repeated at the last Quartet-Scène of Herren Oerling, Rehbaum, Wendt, and Birnbach. At the second of a course of lectures he is now delivering, Professor A. B. Marx gave a comprehensive and interesting sketch of the musical instruments of the Chinese and Indians, with practical illustrations. Dr. Franz Liszt is announced to appear on the 5th inst., at a concert of the Orchester-Verein. He was received at the railway station by the committee, consisting of Herren Marx, Dorn, Stern, von Bülow, Grell, Laub and Bock. It is proposed to invite him to a grand supper before his departure. Herr Joseph Wieniowski is stopping here for a few days.

CONCERTS.

THE GERMAN TRIO.—Under this collective title Messrs. GARTNER, HAUSE and JUNGnickel, gave the first of six subscription concerts in the Chickering saloon, last Saturday evening, and performed the programme published in our last. The night was stormy and the audience small. The best thing of the evening and the most agreeable to most was the first piece, the Quartet in B flat by HAYDN. The sunny cheer, the playfulness, the elegance and delicate fineness of the first and last movements and the Minuetto, belonged unmistakably to childlike "father Haydn." The Adagio, a smooth, melodious, pensive, sentimental composition, seems for a long space made up of melodic turns and phrases out of the "Creation," but develops at last into something fresher and more essentially quartet-like, more in the genius of pure instrumental music. The execution (by Messrs. GARTNER, SCHULTZE, EICHLER and JUNGnickel) had many merits; some of the delicate, pianissimo intentions indeed were finely realized; but some of the strong parts were overdone; the contrasts were exaggerated; the first violin, so capable in passages of really exquisite rendering, indulging at times in altogether a too head-long sort of energy, as if not remembering that violence is sometimes the opposite of power. Such excess works double harm; it makes the tender and subdued parts appear sentimental and excessive also in their way. We simply point out a tendency, which is only to be controlled to ensure remarkably good quartet-playing.

Naturally the audience awaited with some curiosity what might develop out of the next announcement: "Song . . . Amateurs." It came in the singular number, in the shape of a blonde maiden, whose rich contralto voice and modest, truthful manner, have added a pleasant feature to several concerts in the remembrance of our readers: namely, Miss TWICHELL, who sang on this occasion a German song (to English words), which might have been by ABT or some composer of that ilk, a long-flowing, serious, somewhat sentimental melody, quite pleasing of its kind, with accompaniment in continuous triplets played by Mr. HAUSE, a little too loudly perhaps, but gracefully and neatly. The song was much applauded. For the more florid Italian passages of her second piece: Deh non voler, from "Anna Bolena," the voice of Miss "Amateurs" was not so well suited; her tones, so rich and full and honest when once out, do not come out with sufficient ease and freedom, do not extricate themselves readily enough from a certain filmy obstruction, for such fluid melody.

Each song preceded a "Grand Duo" instrumental. The first, for piano and violin, on themes from LAFONT, amplified to the large and dazzling proportions of modern virtuoso pianism by LISZT, made a brilliant show-piece for Messrs. HAUSE and GARTNER. The former gentleman displayed an astonishing strength and flexibility of finger and achieved the most difficult passages of all kinds with triumphant ease, and with considerably more regard to light and shade than we have noticed in his performance in past years. In execution he has surely had few equals here. In the other Duo, for violin and violoncello, the work of VIEUXTEMPS and SERVAIS, we could find nothing but the most noisy, senseless and cacophonous extravaganza upon themes from Les Huguenots. Fantastic were too good a term for anything so unilluminated by a spark of fancy. It was more suggestive of the incoherent ravings of far-gone, stupid, boisterous orgies. How Vieuxtemps could have written such an affair, we wonder. It might have been extemporized, in the manner of a quodlibet, by two clever instrumentists towards the end of long and mad carousals, after all the champagne life had effervesced. In such an extravagant composition it would perhaps have been unreasonable to expect that strings, scraped and lashed to madness, would keep always in tune and not scream in their agony.

This concert gave us another opportunity to hear the Trio by BRAHMS, played for the first time here last week in WILLIAM MASON's concert. That we were somewhat more interested in following its ideas, or strivings for ideas, we freely own. Of its general character, however, we found our impression unchanged. That it shows rare power for a youth of fifteen, who could doubt? Whether that power amounts to genius, contains the germ of future greatness, is a problem we had rather leave to time. We thought the Trio well performed by all the instruments.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.—The "Messiah" was repeated, under favor of another splendid winter Sunday evening, to almost another overflowing audience, (making the fifth performance of that oratorio—by all three societies—during the last month.) We too, under favor of a better seat, enjoyed it much more than before. Some of the choruses may not have been in all particulars mechanically as clean and accurate as we have sometimes heard them, yet they were all sung with spirit, and some of them admirably well. At all events we felt the noble music; the oratorio as a whole wrought its effect on us, and we doubt not on many a listener. Were we to notice any chief defect, it would be the want of a better balance in the four parts. That glorious mass of bass, naturally composed of the more permanent and thoroughly inducted members, is much more than a match for the moderate supply of contralti—better in quality than quantity—and not insignificant at that when they lead off alone;—still more so for those thin and shrill sopranos, which with all their numbers often emit what seems but the sound of a dozen voices. When will real love of music, true refinement, so far prevail over fashion in this land of freedom, that ladies of the highest culture shall take part, as they do in Germany, in great choral rehearsals and performances, and social and domestic advancement shall no longer rob the choirs of their best female voices just as they begin to be of real service?

With every hearing we are more pleased with Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS's rendering of these sacred songs. A slight cold perhaps accounted for some feebleness of voice in the beginning of O thou that tellest; but the intrinsic, solid richness of the voice soon got the better of it, and style and feeling did the rest. In such an air as He shall feed his flock, you rest upon the satisfying comfort of such warm, large tones. What a contrast with the fine, silvery, childlike soprano of Mrs. WENTWORTH, who continued (in a higher key) the melody: Come unto Him, with all that sweetness and conscientious finish of expression, which one expects of her as a matter of course. In He was despised, Miss Phillipps was even better than before; if there was any defect at all, it was simply technical, in the matter of breath or so, which one could scarcely think of in so large and pure and heart-felt an utterance of that most pathetic music. In the great song of faith: I know that my Redeemer, very few singers, (though it is properly a soprano song) have ever given us so much real satisfaction. This time it was all true in intonation, while in feeling, in devotedness and nobility of style it was a new revelation of the singer's soul. No one could but listen with deep interest and respect; no one could but feel the music.

Mrs. LEACH's voice, though sweet and flute-like for the most part, has hardly character enough for: There were shepherds, for Rejoice greatly, &c., and moreover, in the effort apparently to do greater things than lay easily within its sphere, was often just a disagreeable shade or two aside from the true pitch. Mr. LEACH gave the bass songs with his usual good taste and judgment. On Mr. MILLARD's rendering of the tenor solos we make no comment, more because we have nothing to add to or taken from the credit which we gave him last time, than in compliance with the following strange request, which cannot, in the nature of the case, with due regard to our own duties and our readers' rights, be granted.

Mr. J. S. DWIGHT, Ed. Journal of Music.

Dear Sir:—I would esteem it a particular favor, if in your notices of musical performances, where I may take part, you would omit altogether my name and all comments upon my performance.

With great respect, I am yours truly,
HARRISON MILLARD.

Boston, Dec. 29, 1855.—No. 6 Tyler St.

Further comment upon that performance is, we trust, unnecessary.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—The fourth chamber concert, Thursday evening, was particularly enjoyable, both as regards selections and performance. We scarcely remember when, throughout an evening, the Club have played so well. The programme follows:

PART I.

1. Sixth Quintet, in A, op. 108, Clarinet Principale,.... Mozart.
2. Piano Quartet, in B flat, op. 13, (first time),... C. C. Perkins.
Messrs. PARKINS, A. & W. FRIES, KESS.

PART II.

3. Andante and Scherzo from the 84th Quintet, in E, op. 82,..... Onslow.
4. La Romanesca: Solo for Violoncello, on a Dance Air of the 16th century..... Servais.
WOLF FRIES.
5. Posthumous Quartet, in D minor,..... Schubert.

Here is both old and new, yet all as good as new to any American audience, all choice and worthy of a place by right either of well-established mastery and genius, or of interesting promise, or of graceful alternation and relief. Of the Quintet with Clarinet, we can say no less than that in all its movements the composition is perfectly lovely, one of those pure, felicitous creations, that sprang from the imaginative brain of MOZART whole. The clarinet has character enough to take its place and even preside in the quartet of strings, at all events when such a master finds it in his thought to blend such elements. And beautifully, with a rich, mellow and expressive tone did Mr. RYAN play it.—To three movements at least of Mr. PERKINS's new piano Quartet we listened with great interest. It is said that nothing is so difficult in this kind of composition as to write a good finale,—one into which the vital impulse of the whole work shall naturally prolong itself and there gracefully conclude and justify the whole. Even Beethoven's finales have by some been complained of as containing too much, being too long, opening new worlds beyond the world they should round off, &c. Naturally then, young composers strive for grand conclusions, painfully elaborating a suggestion that will yield no more, or laying out more form without wherewith to fill it save by thankless make-shift. It was in the finale this time that we found our attention flagging, the magnet having lost its hold upon whatever it was in us. Perhaps it was our fault. But the Allegro opened with interesting, well-developed themes, in the working up of which after the repeat, however, we once or twice felt lost. The Scherzando and the Andante had a great deal of beauty, in their several ways; the former very rapid, light, graceful, the latter having considerable richness of harmony and tenderness of sentiment. As a whole this Quartet seemed to us really in advance of its author's previous efforts. His own execution of the piano part—by no means an easy one—suffered only from the natural nervousness of one placing himself in so strong a light.

The two movements by ONSLOW impressed us more than almost anything we ever heard by that eminently classical, elegant, but not decidedly original composer; especially the Andante, which is large and grandiose. What an industrious writer was Onslow! His thirty-fourth Quintet! This was making up for beginning the musical career so late as he did in life. The violoncello solo, a quaint, naive and graceful dance—one of the wildflowers of melody from a past age,—was exquisitely played by WOLF FRIES. But the glory of the programme was that SCHUBERT Quartet again. It was more perfectly played and more fully appreciated this time. Each successive movement seemed more interesting than the last; each a fresh yield of spontaneous inspiration, and vitally a member of the whole, as much as any scene or character in a Shakespearian drama. The Andante, with its march-like theme, so solemn, wild and thrilling, and its wondrous variations, was long and eagerly applauded. Our memory was at fault last time (writing so long after, and having heard so many things) when we spoke of the Scherzo as "fairy-like;" it is anything but that; an exulting, fiery war dance, rather;—heroic, fearless; the intoxication of a noble purpose uniting many hearts and hands; with a dash of tenderness and sadness in the Trio, as of leave-taking. The Finale Presto is most exciting and imaginative. What composer, unless it be BEETHOVEN, becomes so prophet-like possessed with each happy theme or musical idea, and loves to repeat it over and over, and let it ring through the day's life, as it were, seeming newer and more significant at each recurrence, as FRANZ SCHUBERT.

Next time the Quintette Club resume their regular Tuesday evening; namely on the 15th.

THEODORE GOUVY, the author of the Symphony to be performed at the Orchestral Concert this evening, is a young French composer of much promise. Educated at the Conservatoire in Paris, he afterwards continued his studies in Germany, and on two subsequent visits, has had the honor of having this Symphony, and a later one, performed with much applause at the Gewandhaus, in Leipzig;—an honor rarely accorded to young composers of any nation. Having been present in 1853 at the performance of his Third Symphony, I remember the great pleasure evinced by the audience at the charming themes, well developed phrases, and clearness of thought, in idea and orchestration, displayed by the composer, who himself directed its performance. Gouvy's compositions consist of three or four Symphonies, Sonata and three Serenades for piano, a Trio for piano, violin and 'cello, &c. &c. P.

BRAHMS, THE YOUNG COMPOSER.

MR. EDITOR:—Your notice of the Piano-Forte Trio by BRAHMS (in last Saturday's paper) ends thus: "Brahms is still 'future' to our humble comprehension." I heard this composition at the Soirée of the "German Trio," and make bold to say that to my humble comprehension that "future" promises another BEETHOVEN. "Abrupt starts" (as you justly say) there were, coming from a boy of fifteen, but what a rich vein, yet hidden, is perceptible in these starts! WM. KEYZER.

Something for Chorus Singers.

MR. DWIGHT:—It is often supposed that Music with its beautiful melodies, its sense and soul-delighting harmonies, tends to make exquisite the nature of them who practise it; and there is plenty of poetical prose relating to its salutary influence in the family and in the day school, to make the unruly disposition docile, and the snarlish temper peaceable; gradually refine the temperament and almost bring heaven down to earth, and the nature of angels along with their songs.

This theory is charming; perhaps, after all, it is true; but "facts are stubborn things," when they resist theories, and it is too bad, that now they oppose our poetical philosophy, about the genial aid of Music as an educator.

The distant spectator, as enchanted he sits, it may be in the balcony, opposite a chorus of two hundred and fifty voices, and hears them echoing each other's praises of the "Wonderful," "Counsellor," the "Lord of Hosts," and again responding "Hallelujah," is moved unless he is "fit for treasons," and enthusiastically supposes that these are a company of fine-souled singers, or else a chorus of spirits, with half a dozen higher seraphs interspersing solos

"Distance lends enchantment." If the spectator would change his seat and be himself a participant, and in the midst of them who sing the "Messiah," he would also hear a low discord of sound and silliness. There was something in your last week's Journal about the disagreeable inconsistency of them who go to a place for the purpose of spending two hours in listening, then change their mind, and devote the time to conversation. That is surprising, but less so, than that the very ones who associate weekly in improving rehearsals, who are probably in other ways, and in general habit, more or less musical; that their natures are still insensible to the beauty of a solo or a symphony, is "passing strange." Indian savages would be still to hear that German orchestra play the "Pastoral Symphony;" and less acute than the ear of barbarians is the hearing of those choir singers who can whisper long sentences while Mrs. WENTWORTH sweetly sings of "Him who was meek and lowly in heart," and ADELAIDE PHILLIPS sadly utters: "He was despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief." Aside from all musical love and high feeling, are not these whispering singers thoughtless at least, if not ungenerous?

Being a stranger in the city of Oratorios, and not entirely familiar with arrangements, and ways, and reasons for doing things, we are not positive about the design, but infer that the organ in playing the Opening is intended merely as a great bell; for its deep strains can effect no other purpose upon the hundreds who are at the same time in the flurry of issuing from ante-rooms, mounting the stage and getting seated. Please state whether it is or is not intended to be a part of the evening's entertainment.

With the faint hope that "There's a good time coming," when human spirits and circumstances will be in tune as well as human voices,

I am afflictedly yours in the cause of general harmony,
B.

Musical Chat-Chat.

The fourth ORCHESTRAL CONCERT takes place to-night; the programme is not quite so rich with great names as those that have preceded, and therefore possibly it may be regarded as more "light" by some and so attract a larger audience. Yet it will not be without its features of peculiar interest. The Symphony is by a new name, which may win over some objectors—certainly, to judge from the rehearsals, a very pleasing, clear, euphonious work, if not a great one—composed by GOUVY, of whom a friend helps us to some knowledge in another column. BEETHOVEN's airy Allegretto and the Semiramide overture never fail to charm, and there be those in plenty, we doubt not, who will not find a reminiscence of Italian opera and Edgardo's sorrows strangely misplaced amid symphonies and without voices. Of violin solos who, save Beethoven and Mendelssohn, in their one or two, has written finer ones than Spohr! Then there is the attraction of ADELAIDE PHILLIPS, who will sing that air of GLUCK, which made so great an impression at one of her own concerts. The fuller the house this time the greater the chance of fine programmes in the concerts yet to come. Those who love the best of Chamber Music will not miss OTTO DRESEL's first Soirée at Chickering's next Wednesday evening. His selection will be very choice, including for solids a Concerto of Bach for three pianos (not the same played two years since) and Schumann's Quintet with piano (the Mendelssohn Quintette Club aiding); for lighter musico-poetic fancies, some of those piano solos by Chopin, Mozart, &c., which no one renders so poetically as Mr. Dresel; and for vocal, a quaint and joyous old song, with violoncello accompaniment, by Bach, and other good things, sung by Mrs. WENTWORTH.

The second Concert of Mr. & Mrs. GARRETT, at South Boston next Tuesday evening, offers good attractions both of programme and performers. The Serenade Band, led by SCHULTZE, will play an overture, the "Wedding March," &c.; there will be instrumental solos, songs, quartets, from Mendelssohn, Donizetti, Verdi, Kücken, Rossini, &c. &c., performed by the Concert-givers, Miss TWICHELL, Miss HOLLIS, Mr. FRANK HOWARD, Messrs. SCHULTZE and HEINICKE;—quite above the average of such miscellanies. . . . The MUSICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY have taken a new hall in the Mercantile Library building (new block in Summer st.) for the Monday evening rehearsals. The Society propose soon to give several performances of "Jephtha" in the Music Hall on week-day evenings. Difference on the Sunday evening concert question has, we hear, defeated certain plans of fusion between this and the MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY. The latter are still rehearsing "St. Paul," which we hope the public will soon have (earn) a chance to hear.

The long-agitated BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL, in connection with the inauguration of Crawford's Statue in the Music Hall, will probably form the grand finale to the series of Orchestral Concerts. Whether it will make the sixth of the regular series, or form a seventh extra concert, will depend very much on the public support given to the next two concerts. . . . The 27th of this month is the anniversary of MOZART's birth-day, which will be musically celebrated in various parts of Germany, also in Philadelphia, and why not in Boston? It falls on Sunday. We suggest to our brother Directors of the Orchestral Concerts that the sixth be anticipated a few days, bringing it upon Saturday, the 26th, and that it be made a MOZART night, with "Jupiter" Symphony, Overtures, Concerto, selections from his Operas, &c., all which might be quite well done, without long practice, the best things being already so familiar. After that, take time for BEETHOVEN.

"Spiridon," the sprightly correspondent of the Boston Atlas, says in his last letter:

M. Eugene Guinot gives a story about Mme. JENNY LIND, in his Sunday's gossip, which is laughable, but which I suspect he owes rather to his imagination than his memory. It is as follows: "We have heard a good joke about the songstress' journey. It is laid at Calais—at Boulogne, if another version may be credited—it is indifferent whether it was at Calais or Boulogne, Havre or Dieppe. Jenny Lind quitted Paris by railway, and reaching the port where the steamboat lay she remained all night to repose from the fatigues of travelling. Great artists are careful of themselves. So she reckoned on sleeping soundly, and determined to cross the channel the next morning. At Calais—or Boulogne—her arrival made some stir. That city contains eminent amateurs and dilettanti, who would be delighted to hear the Swedish nightingale, but Philomel is mute in the provinces, as well as in Paris; Jenny Lind has banned and barred all of France. Poor France!

Some of the provincial dilettanti boast of being astute and intrepid. Should they cross the channel to hear the songstress at London? What would be the advantage of possessing audacity and talents, if they were reduced merely to this excursion, in the reach of anybody who has some louis d'or and some hours to expend. It would be admirable to hear Jenny Lind without paying any money away, and without quitting the town; it would be to make her break the obstinate resolution she has formed of never singing in France. What a triumph and what an honor, if anybody should succeed in such an undertaking! But how could success be hoped? The songstress was scarcely installed in the suite of rooms prepared for her, when these gentlemen appeared. They forced the orders which had interdicted the door to all visitors; they entered as possessing authority. Their severe attire, their magistrate's air, their coldly imperious manners, announced them as persons charged with a grave mission. One of them spoke to the songstress, whom he addressed without saluting her, saying in a dry, abrupt tone, "Give me your passport, Madam." Jenny Lind, astonished, but faithful to her resolution of silence in France, gave up her passport without proffering a word. The gentleman read and examined it with an attention which denoted the profoundest distrust; then he added, with a rudeness mixed with irony, "Oh, we know you have neglected no precaution, and that you travel under an assumed name!"

"For whom do you take me, pray?" asked Jenny Lind, obliged to speak. "Don't hope to deceive us. You will see we are well informed. An intriguante of the most dangerous species has been staying in Paris for some time past, where she made numerous dupes, and after having secured a good deal of money, she is now attempting to reach England." "And do you suppose, perchance?" "That you are the woman, yes Madam; your face, your person suit with the description we have received. Our information is most exact."

The songstress exclaimed, became indignant, protested that she was Jenny Lind. Her earnest denials made no impression on an ironical incredulity. The spokesman of the party asked if she had any friend who would be the security of her identity, if she possessed no means of proving her right to the name she claimed. Jenny Lind knew nobody. "Then, Madam, we must take you temporarily into custody." At these words the protestations of the great artist became more animated than ever; she was interrupted in them by the following proposition:

"Now, Madam, you may very easily convince us. You pretend to be Jenny Lind, eh? If you speak truly, you have no need of surety, nor of testimony; you have in your own power the striking proof of your identity. Nothing is easier for you than to prove that you are indeed a great artist, possessor of incomparable talents and an admirable voice. I know enough about music to judge of that. Then exhibit to us your proof." There was no answer to avoid the force of this appeal, and the songstress placed in a dilemma, hesitated which way of escape to adopt. "Ah! I was sure of it," added the author of the proposition; "you are confounded. Abandon that disguise, which betrays you, and profane no longer an illustrious name!" "It is mine, sir!" "Enough! enough! Madam, your affirmations are denied by the impossibility you find yourself in, of proving what we ask you to demonstrate. To gaol, Madam, to gaol!" "Well!" said the songstress, conquered and resigned, "if it must be done, listen and judge!"

Then, after a moment's silence, that her vexation might be silenced, she sang the cavatina of Norma. That pure, powerful, melodious voice lavished all its wealth. The three gentlemen were delighted beyond expression. Their manner made Jenny Lind detect the trap into which she had fallen. The gentlemen avowed their guilt, and implored her pardon with so much grace and eloquence—adding, "if you will pardon us, our benevolence shall make the poor bless your name"—Jenny Lind was touched. She pardoned their impertinence.

CHURCH ORGANS.

COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

WM. B. D. SIMMONS, Organ Builder,
(Heretofore doing business in the style of Wm. B. D. SIMMONS & Co.) and

GEORGE FISHER,

Of Cambridge, have this day formed a Copartnership for continuing the manufacture of Church Organs.

We design to keep in our Warerooms New Instruments for sale at prices from $400 to $1,500 each, and are prepared to build by contract at the shortest notice. Organs, worth from $600 to $12,000. And by prompt and faithful execution of orders hope to merit a like encouragement to that heretofore extended to Wm. B. D. SIMMONS, and which has indicated the necessity of this business connection, that his entire attention may be devoted to the more difficult and artistic parts of the business, so that an increase thereof may cause no diminution of the personal attention which is requisite for the maintenance of the CHARACTER of our Instruments, upon which we rely for success.

While it will be our aim and ambition to furnish ORGANS of a PERFECTION OF TONE AND MECHANISM, AND OF AN ELEGANCE OF EXTERIOR UNSURPASSED, we are confident of ability to offer terms MORE FAVORABLE THAN CAN BE OBTAINED ELSEWHERE, for the following reasons: Having ample means, we can purchase in large quantities at first cost, for cash; can always command the most talented assistants, and also do sufficient business to practice division of labor, which, by assigning parts to workmen skilled in their particular branch, necessarily insures better work at less expense. Our Manufactory, by its proximity to Charles river, enables us to receive lumber direct from the vessel at first cost, and having been erected expressly for the business, is in arrangement, size, convenience and its facilities unequalled, being furnished with steam engine, steam-heated drying-house, planing, grooving, matching, moulding, tenoning, boring, and other machines, together with lath scroll, circular and other saws, &c., all operated by steam power.

These facilities are such as are possessed by no other manufacturer of Organs in this country, and of themselves would enable us to furnish instruments, with a fair profit, at a price which those of like quality must cost builders who have work done by hand that can be better executed at half the cost by steam machinery.

Second hand Organs at all times for sale.

Orders for tuning church organs promptly attended to, and contracts taken for tuning by the year.
Orders respectfully solicited.

FIRST PREMIUM MELODEONS,

The Very Best now Manufactured.

W. S. D. & H. W. SMITH respectfully call the attention of the public to their IMPROVED MELODEONS, constantly on exhibition at their Warerooms,

No. 417 Washington Street.

By means of a new method of voicing, known only to themselves, they have succeeded in removing the harsh and buzzing sound which formerly characterized the instrument, rendering the tones full, clear and organ-like. The action is prompt and reliable, enabling the performer to execute the most rapid music without obscuring the tones. The swell is arranged to give great expression.

The manufacturers received the First Premium, over all competitors, at the Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association; also at the Metropolitan Mechanics' Fair, held at Washington, D. C.

For the Parlor, instruments are furnished at prices varying from $45 to $150.

Larger instruments, with two banks of keys, for chapels and small churches, from $150 to $300.

This last instrument, known as the ORGAN HARMONIUM, has been essentially improved by Messrs. Smith, and they have secured a patent therefor.

Persons who wish to hire Melodeons with a view of purchasing at the end of the year, can have the rents credited as part payment of the purchase money.

Chat with Rossini.

BY FERDINAND HILLER.

Translated for this Journal from the Zeitung of Cologne.

XI.

In the summer of 1836 ROSSINI came to pass a week at Frankfort. FELIX MENDELSSOHN was there at the same time, and I had the pleasure of seeing these two men, the one of whom had written his last, the other his first great work, together almost daily in my father's house. The engaging manner of the celebrated mäestro had its effect also upon Mendelssohn, and he played before him as much as he wanted, and what he wanted, both of his own and others' compositions. Rossini thought with great interest of those days, and often led the conversation back to the master snatched so early from us. He told us he had heard his Octet well performed in Florence, and I had to play to him the Symphony in A minor, for four hands, with a very clever pianiste from Paris, Madame PFEIFER, who was then in Trouville. With what fineness, what esprit Mendelssohn knew how to treat the smallest motive! said he after it was done. But how comes it, that he wrote no opera? Had he not applications for them from every theatre?

—You do not know our German theatrical management, dear mäestro. We try the works of all times and nations, from GLUCK to BALFE, to VERDI, and let the living German composers make a trial when they can; to order an opera is a thing which seldom occurs to any theatre direction.

—But, exclaimed Rossini, if young talents are not encouraged, if you do not give them opportunity to get experience, nothing can ever come of it!

—And nothing will come of it, I answered.

A BEETHOVEN, a WEBER write for once a couple of masterpieces, but from a living and progressive German national opera we are as far now as ever. Moreover I believe that the German composers will always incline mainly toward instrumental music.

—They commonly begin with instrumental music, said Rossini, which perhaps makes it hard for them to accommodate themselves afterwards to the conditions of vocal music. They have difficulty in being simple, whereas it is hard to the Italians not to be even flat.

—You are very severe, mäestro; indeed it may be the most difficult of problems to remain noble in simplicity. Speaking of that, I must come back again to my lament, that you did not continue after "William Tell" to write for the Grand Opera. Had you not the intention to compose a Faust?

—It was long a favorite thought of mine, and I had already sketched out a whole scenario with JOUY. Naturally upon the basis of GOETHE'S poem. But about that time a real Faust mania sprang up in Paris; every theatre had its a parte Faust, which quite destroyed my relish for it. Meanwhile came the July revolution; the Grand Opera, formerly a royal institution, passed into the hands of a private impresario, my mother had died, my father found it intolerable to live in Paris, since he understood no French,—so I dissolved the contract, which pledged me to furnish four more grand operas, preferring to remain quietly at home and cheer the last years of my aged father. I was far away from my poor mother when she breathed her last; that had been an unspeakable grief to me, and I felt the greatest anxiety lest the same thing should happen to me with regard to my father.

—And so you went home to your Bologna, where I found you in '38, when you were signing cards of admission to a public rehearsal at the Lyceum. You took great interest in that institution at the time.

—I have done all that was in my power for it during my whole residence in Bologna down to the year '49. It was the school in which I got my education! And I had my fun also in having all sorts of works played to me by the pupils, who formed a complete orchestra. It often sounded, to be sure, like greens and turnips; still it was young and fresh and entertaining.

—You preferred Bologna to Florence for a residence? I asked.

—Bologna is my proper home, and an unconstrained and genial activity prevails there. Florence is more of a court city, and that is nothing to me, although I like to think of all the friendliness continually shown me by the Grand Duke.

—But it appears to me, you never found it very irksome, illustrissimo mäestro, to have intercourse with high and even supreme powers, and you have had opportunity enough for it. In fact you took part in the Congress of Vienna.

—I went there at the invitation of Prince METTERNICH, who wrote me a most amiable letter. Since I was le Dieu de l'harmonie, it ran, he hoped I would come there, where there was so much need of harmony. If Cantatas could have done the thing, I should have accomplished it. I had to compose for them at the shortest notice five pieces, for the Negozianti, and for the Nobili, for the festival of Concord—and what not?

—But how did you contrive to do all that?

—In part I patched old things together and put a new text under it—yet that too was a labor, with which I could scarcely get through in season. In a chorus about Concord it happened, that the word Alleanza (Alliance) stood beneath a sorrowful chromatic sigh; I had no time to alter it, but I thought it fit to warn Prince Metternich beforehand of that mournful trick of accident.

—He recognized in it perhaps the work of a higher destiny, said I.

—At all events he submitted to it smilingly, proceeded the mäestro. But the festival, which took place in the arena, was wonderfully beautiful, and is still vivid in my recollection. The only thing that plagued me there, was that I, to direct my Cantata, had to stand under an enormous statue of Concord, in constant terror lest it should fall upon my head.

—Concord would certainly have had a downfall then!

—Merci! But there were fabulous carryings on at that time in Verona. I was presented there among others to the emperor ALEXANDER. He and king GEORGE THE FOURTH of England were the most amiable crowned heads that I ever met. Of the personal attractiveness of the latter one can scarcely form an idea. But Alexander also was a splendid, really imposing man. I went from there to Venice, to write Semiramide. There again I found many of those high personages, and also Prince Metternich, who interested himself in an uncommon degree for music and really understood something of it. He was present every evening in the Fenice at the rehearsals of my new opera, and seemed to be very happy to be able to escape there somewhat from his political circles.

—Apröpos of that story of the chromatic Alleanza, said I, it occurs to me it used to be related how, during the occupation of the Church States by the Austrians, you received an order from the new governor of Bologna for a Cantata, and you executed the commission in such a way, that you roguishly set the new text to a much sung patriotic song of your composing.

—There is not a word of truth in it. They left me quiet, and I really had no desire to joke with those stern gentlemen. I have never mixed myself up in any way in politics. I was a musician and it never occurred to me to wish to be anything else, although I take the liveliest interest in what is going on in the world, particularly in my country's fate. In truth I have lived through and seen all sorts of things.

Life of John Sebastian Bach;

WITH A CRITICAL VIEW OF HIS COMPOSITIONS, BY J. N. FORKEL.

CHAPTER X.

I have already noticed the careful manner in which Bach, all his life through, revised his works. I have had repeated opportunities of comparing together the various copies of the same work written in different years, and have felt both surprised and delighted at the diligence and ingenuity with which he contrived to make the indifferent good, and good better, and the better perfect. Nothing is more improving than such a comparison for the connoisseur, and the student eager in the prosecution of his art. It would be a very desirable object to add to the complete edition of Bach's works, a supplement containing the most important and instructive variations from his best works. And why should not this be done with the composer, the poet of tones, as well as with the poet in words.

In some of Bach's earlier works it not unfrequently happened that he repeated the same idea as it were in other words; as for instance, he perhaps repeated the same modulation in the same octave or in a lower one, or with a different turn of melody. In his maturer age he could not tolerate such meagreness; and wherever he found faults of this sort he never failed to discard them, no matter into how many hands the piece had passed, or however highly it was approved. Two most remarkable instances of this occur in the two preludes in C major, and C sharp major, in the first part of the "Well-tempered Clavichord," both of which are in this manner shortened by one half, while they are thus freed from all useless superfluities. In other pieces it sometimes occurred that Bach did too little; his idea was not fully expressed nor sufficiently carried out. I find a remarkable example of this in the prelude in D minor, in the second part of the "Well-tempered Clavichord." I possess several copies of this piece. In the oldest of them the first transposition of the theme into the bass is wanting, as well as several other passages which were necessary for the complete development of the thought. In the second copy this transposition of the theme into the bass is inserted whenever it occurs in the modes most nearly related to the original one. In the third several passages are more fully expressed, and more neatly connected together. Still there remained some turns and figures of the melody which did not agree with the style and spirit of the rest; and these inaccuracies are so carefully amended in a fourth copy as to render this prelude the most beautiful and perfect in the whole collection of the "Well-tempered Clavichord." Many persons preferred the piece in its original form, and thought it disimproved by these successive corrections. Bach, however, never suffered himself to be thus misled, but persevered in his corrections till it pleased him. At the beginning of the last century it was as much the fashion to overload instrumental music with running passages on single principal notes, as it has since been with vocal music, and Bach showed a passing conformity to this fashion, inasmuch as he wrote a few pieces in this style. One of these is the prelude in E minor, in the first part of the "Well-tempered Clavichord;" but soon returning to his own natural good taste, he altered it to the form in which it is now engraved. Every period of ten years has some new form or style of melody peculiar to it, but which quickly grows out of fashion. A composer who wishes his works to descend to posterity should avoid these transient peculiarities. Bach, however, did not escape this rock in his early years. His first compositions for the organ, as well as his two-part Inventions in their original form, are full of flourishes agreeably to the taste of that day. His organ pieces have remained as they were, but his Inventions have been much improved. The public will soon have an opportunity of comparing the ancient with the later form, as the publishers have formed the praiseworthy resolution of suppressing the first edition, and delivering to subscribers an improved one in its stead. The methods of improvement hitherto spoken of extend, however, merely to the outward form; for instance, to the redundant or insufficient expression of an entire thought. But Bach frequently employed means to perfect his works so nice and refined as almost to defy explanation. Unity of style and character are often marred by the admission of one single note which, though it could not possibly be objected to by the most rigid musical grammarian, would yet offend the nice perception of the connoisseur. The most commonplace passages may frequently become the most elegant by the substitution, addition or subtraction of a single note. But such cases can only be decided by the purest feeling and most finished and experienced taste; and these qualities Bach possessed in an eminent degree; and he gradually so improved both, that no single idea was tolerable to him which, in all its points and bearings, did not agree and harmonize with the rest. His later works, therefore, are as if all cast in one mould; so smooth, even and harmonious is the rich stream of the most diversified ideas artfully blended together. This is a pinnacle of perfection in the art, which none has ever so effectually attained to as John Sebastian Bach.

Signor Masoni.

III.

Upon reflection I clearly saw that the cause of Masoni's unhappiness lay in the false step of concealing his origin. Had he come into society as a rescued slave, this fact alone would have won him notice, and his noble and beautiful mind and character, leaving out of view his great artistic powers, would have done the rest in securing for him all of happiness that falls usually to the lot of man. I had afterwards a long and serious conversation with him upon the subject, and advised him to let his history be made known, and thus drive the "devil," as he expressed it, from his imagination. For him, however, this was a step of almost unconquerable difficulty. The trace of African blood in his veins, which, however, it was utterly impossible for the most experienced overseer or negro-trader to detect, had during the years that he had passed on equal terms with the students at Leipzig, and other places, become a bugbear of portentous size. As the idea became familiarized to his mind, it lost in some degree its terrors, and I think success would have crowned my efforts, had not opposing circumstances intervened. But I must give the outline of Masoni's story. He was born on the plantation where I had first seen him—was the pet plaything in the family until he was five or six years old—was then turned out among the other children until he had grown up a pretty boy, when he came again into the house for a few years, and was thence transferred to the stables. His master always treated him kindly, and he still cherished some degree of affectionate remembrance of him. His turn for music was remarked while he was still very young, and time and opportunity were given him to practice the fiddle with superannuated old Pompey, and to fit himself to succeed him as plantation fiddler—then the height of his ambition—when the old man should "hang up the fiddle and the bow," which event happened when Masoni was still but a boy. Pompey's course of instruction was hardly one which would be admitted into an European conservatory;—hence the great excellence the pupil attained was owing to a never-tiring industry and perseverance, in seeking the means of expressing upon his instrument the tones which, sleeping or waking, were always ringing in his inward ear. No one—and he a slave—could be more happily situated than he; yet something within refused to be contented with his lot, and ideas of freedom, vague and uncertain—whence they came, how begotten, he knew not—began to mingle in his dreams and musings, and make him miserable. Upon such topics he could not speak, but his thoughts and feelings began gradually to find utterance in strange tones and peculiar effects of his instrument. The discovery of his power over those who heard him play, drew him on to new efforts. He gave himself so entirely to this one object of his existence, as to bring him into difficulty with his master.

And for a time his fiddle was taken away.—"What I suffered then! what I suffered then!" exclaimed he; "I believe no tophet could be fuller of torment." The loss of his instrument affected his health seriously, and at last his good-natured master, partly on his own account, partly for the sake of the other slaves, whom he would not deprive of this small enjoyment, ordered it to be returned, cautioning him to beware how he allowed it to spoil him for his daily tasks.

Mr. Mason was a good-natured, easy man, proud of his descent, proud of his fine plantation, of his horses, his dogs, his social position, and of his well-fed, contented slaves, because nature, beyond a very handsome personal appearance in his youth and early manhood, had given him nothing else to be proud of. His wife and children were all, like him, very moderately endowed with mental advantages—good, respectable, fashionable people—save the second daughter, Miss Sarah. Masoni, speaking both from recollection and from the representations of Father Gutmann, pictured her as possessing all the intellectual gifts denied to the rest of the family, and as being proud, headstrong, and domineering in like proportion. While still a little girl of some ten or twelve years, she was more feared and disliked by the people, than all the rest together. It is one of the great disadvantages of plantation life, that unless the mother is able to understand, appreciate and guide the development of a rich and productive intellect, it is in a great measure left to its own resources, and being surrounded by so many unfavorable influences, the chances are many to one that the results will be in a high degree unfavorable. Miss Sarah was a source of infinite perplexity to both father and mother. She tyrannized over them, and over her brothers and sisters—how much more, then, over the poor people of the plantation. Her teachers could do nothing with her, and yet she by the mere force of her talents far outstripped the other children in her acquirements. She had one passion—Music. Tired of the shallowness and pretensions of the successive teachers she had had, and whom she had one after the other fairly driven from the place, the winter when I was at the Christmas festival before described, she was spending in Philadelphia, that she might at length find some one able to afford her such instruction as she felt she needed. There she found Father Gutmann. He saw at once her capacities, and won her respect by introducing her immediately to the best piano-forte music of his “Fatherland.” She soon found in him a man who was disposed to treat her airs and domineering tone with a cool contempt, which at the same time incensed and attracted her. She found it was a matter of entire indifference to him whether a girl of fifteen was disposed to continue her lessons or not, and after one scene, in consequence of which she was forced to humble herself to him, or lose the delights of the new world into which he had brought her, she treated him with perfect respect. When Spring came, she would take no denial from her father or from Gutmann—he should go with her to Virginia, and continue his instructions until the usual period when the family left home for the summer tour. Thus it came that Father Gutmann became acquainted with Masoni, and discovered his genius.

“My highest delight,” said Masoni, “at that time, was to leave the stables after my work was done, and listen under the window to the (to me) wonderful music of the piano-forte and Father Gutmann’s violin. The new world was thus opened to me also, and when I had a leisure moment for my own practice, oh how I labored to reproduce the musical thoughts I had heard! The old man took no notice of me, as I then supposed, nor could I in my position as slave presume to speak with him upon a subject which filled my thoughts night and day. He did, however, observe me, and as it afterwards proved, most carefully, and would gladly have set me free, had it been by any possible means in his power. The time came for Gutmann to depart. He had made himself respected and liked by every member of the family, who could not in their hearts thank him enough for his restraining influence upon the daughter and sister, whom they could not comprehend, and who lorded it so haughtily over them all. His request therefore, that Dick might drive him to the stage office was at once allowed, and to my joy I first found myself alone and in a position to speak with the good old man. For some time little was said as we drove along. But just before reaching the office he began:—

“So, Dick, you are the musician there, it seems.”

“Yes, massa.”

“And you are quite a famous player, they say.”

“Oh! massa.”

“Dick, I have heard more of your music than you think. If you were only free, I would make a man of you. Let’s see: I say, Dick,” and here he fixed his eyes full upon mine, “if—you should ever find your way to Philadelphia, go to the first shop in whose windows you should see a collection of musical instruments, present this letter, which is directed to me, and you will hear where I am. Mind, I say nothing of running away, and following the North star into Pennsylvania; I only tell you that should you happen to be in Philadelphia, don’t forget, I’ll make a man of you. Let no living soul see the letter, except the man in the music store, or it may be the worse for you and for me.” Nothing farther was said, and Father Gutmann bade me good bye in the presence of the stage-office people as unconcernedly as if he had never seen me before.

I had been so happy in the possession of my fiddle again, as to be quite content with my lot, and this encounter with Miss Sarah’s music-teacher, strange as it was to me, was soon almost forgotten. But after the return of the family from their tour, things were changed. Miss Sarah was prouder, haughtier, less amiable, if that was possible, than ever. The monetary crisis of 1837 in the commercial world had at length reached in its influence many of the Virginia planters; my master among the rest. Cabin after cabin began to lose a tenant, sold away. My situation became less easy. My leisure hours became fewer. The order to stop that eternal fiddling was issued. And so the idea of being “made a man of” and of seeking out Father Gutmann, became more and more prominent in my mind. Still this idea would probably have led to nothing, had not an accident happened to Miss Sarah’s horse, for which I was in truth not to blame, but for which, with eyes flashing and face flushed with rage, she demanded that I should be flogged. There could be no peace in the house until this was done, and so for the first time since I was a small child, I was stripped, tied up and flogged. Yes,” continued Masoni after a pause, in a husky voice, “flogged until the blood ran in streams. The scars are there now, and” with his eyes gleaming with a fierceness which I had never seen in them before, he added, “I would give my life willingly for revenge!” “According to the reckoning of old mammy,—of my own mother I know nothing—I was then about nineteen years, and felt as much like a man as a slave can; and the injustice done me at the instance of that young girl quite changed my nature. I began to brood over the words of Father Gutmann, and at last—I did run away! Night after night as so many others have done, I followed the North star, and was so fortunate as to reach Pennsylvania in safety. But I was far from Philadelphia. Luckily I was so white as to avoid suspicion, and as I had succeeded in retaining my old instrument, I fiddled my way to the great city. My letter was safe, and I presented it at several shops where musical instruments were displayed, and at last found one where the address was known. Father Gutmann was in New York!

“I fiddled my way to New York, and after repeated efforts, learned in the same manner that the old musician was somewhere near Boston. I fiddled my way to Boston, but there I sought him in vain. He was not known there.”

In Boston he made his case known to some of the anti-slavery people, who procured a place for him in a stable at the North End, the owner of which was a kind-hearted man and gave him time to earn many a quarter of a dollar as the musician of the poorer people. It was in the winter of 1840–41 that a distinguished German violinist came to Boston and announced a series of concerts, (I think this must have been Herwig.) Masoni had been long enough in the free states to feel in some degree a full man, and to find that no one suspected his faint trace of African blood. He heard the new artist spoken of by his masters’ customers, and an irresistible longing seized him to hear him play. With a trembling heart he asked permission to attend the concert. The request was received with a laugh, but granted. It was interesting to hear him describe the feelings with which he joined the crowd at the door of the Melodeon, and by slow degrees made his way to the ticket box, half afraid, notwithstanding that he was well, nay, handsomely dressed, and looked quite the gentleman, of a repulse, with the rough question, “What the nigger was there for?” But no, as he laid down his dollar a ticket was handed him, and he passed in, taking a programme at the door, which he only knew was right end up by noticing that other people had the large letters at the top.

“The happiness and misery of that evening are not to be described—happiness at hearing the real powers of the violin, and seeing what it was to be “made a man of”—misery at the idea of having lost Father Gutmann forever. On the whole, however, I was enchanted. The vocal pieces, indeed every thing but the tones of the master fell upon deaf ears—for them I was all ear. I trembled, laughed, cried, and the people near me in my distant corner looked upon me doubtless as a crazy man or a fool. And now my only thought was of the old music teacher; where to seek him; how to find him; I repeated my visits to every music store in the city—the same old answer—the name upon that letter, now becoming well worn, though kept as my greatest treasure, was unknown to them.

I heard that the last concert of the artist was announced. I could not withstand the temptation, and went; but not a note of the music did I really hear; violin, voices, pianoforte appealed to senses too much preoccupied, for as I cast my eyes upon the audience below, from my seat at the end of the gallery, they fell upon the serene features of Father Gutmann, who sat in a chair directly in front of the stage. Heart in mouth, every nerve quivering, the last note had hardly ceased to sound, when I hastened down, pushed my way through the retiring audience, regardless of the black looks of the people whom I crowded anything but gently, and reached the space in front of the stage only to see the good old man pass the door of the private room, whither the virtuoso and his countryman had retired. For a moment I hesitated. But I could not lose him now—it would kill me. I rushed after him, he was talking with the great man in German, but turned at the noise I made in entering, and recognized me at once.

“Oh Massa Gutmann! Massa Gutmann!” was all I could say. He laid his hand so gently and kindly upon my head. “So Dick, my boy, you are here at last. You want to be made a man of, then?”

“Oh, Massa Gutmann!”

“Well, Dick, tell where you are to be found. I will see you to-morrow.”

I told him.

“Go home now, I wish to talk with this gentleman. I will certainly see you to-morrow.

“Do you think, Brown, that I slept that night?”

The next day the North End stable keeper lost his musical servant. Mr. Gutmann took him to the small country town where he was then living, placed him under the care of the clergyman of the village, by whom he was instructed, and whom he repaid by his labor as boy and man of all work. Mr. Bigelow's family was small, consisting entirely of women, except the head, and as is, or was, common with New England country clergymen, no distinction of rank between master and servant was made, and Dick's great industry and engaging qualities soon made him more like a son than a servant.

After my return to America I sought out Mr. Bigelow, and had a long conversation with him in relation to his former pupil.

Father Gutmann had confided to him the history of the young man, but, though at that time the notorious fugitive slave bill had not been passed, it was judged the safer course to keep that history secret. The name Masoni grew naturally out of Gutmann's German pronunciation of Mason. Mr. B. described Dick's progress in learning as the greatest phenomenon he had met during a long life, in which since his academy days he had seldom if ever been without pupils. It was but natural that such rich soil so long fallow should produce abundantly. For three years (the happiest of my life! said Masoni), he had his daily lesson in literature from Mr. Bigelow or his daughters, in the German language and in music from his protector. And then when Father Gutmann felt that his pupil had reached the limits of his powers of instruction, he took him from the quiet routine of his New England village life, brought him to Paris for a few months to give him rest and relaxation, to show him somewhat of the great world's life, and to lay a good foundation for the study of the French language. Thence they came to Leipzig, to Mendelssohn, as before recorded.

"But why was your history still kept a secret?"

"I don't know whether Father Gutmann had any special reason for it. In fact the matter had rather passed from our memories, so occupied were we both with other absorbing topics of thought. It may be that the old gentleman, who hated the system of slavery beyond description, had some vague idea of proving through me, that, had we the same advantages as our masters, we should not fall behind them in other accomplishments, and only in case I took the high position he hoped, did he intend to lay bare the secret. But his plans now lie buried with the old man in the Gottesacker at Leipzig. While he lived the evil spirit kept at bay, but his death changed everything to me. You cannot conceive what it is for one, whose whole life has been spent either in the condition of a slave or under the care of such a parent or protector as I had, to be thrown at once upon himself and his own resources. My grief at my loss had hardly in some degree subsided, when the feeling that I am but a runaway slave began to gain possession of me. I cannot conquer the weakness. I want some one to lean upon; oh, if I could be always with you!"

"You would find me but a poor support!" said I. "I am alone in the world, and this evil in my lungs is already warning me to look forward with calmness and resignation to the day when I shall lie down, I hope to pleasant dreams, with the rest of the Browns, in the little churchyard at Hildale. A poor support I! But you must not give way thus. Get Satan behind thee—get out of your false position, and you will find no need of support."

"Perhaps!"

After some minutes' silence he continued: "To confess the truth, I have been growing better, since we parted last Spring. Whenever the demon gets possession of me, the smart of that flogging seems to return, and a terrible desire for revenge is strengthening itself gradually. Every time the idea that a great gulf does in fact separate me from those with whom I associate, though they know nothing of it, comes up, this craving for revenge is sure to accompany it. I have in fact been brooding over this thought for many weeks past, and your presence is a blessing from heaven, as it relieves me from that idle torment. That I have labored hard to improve myself you know—you see the fruits of these labors—and yet the motives to them have been continually becoming weaker. I am a fool, but the knowledge of the fact does not help me."

Under the influence of the foolish idea which had possessed him, Masoni had sunk quite into a state of despondency. There was in him a constitutional want of energy; or rather, a tendency when the critical moment came, to fail, through a latent suspicion of his own powers, a suspicion which only at such moments exerted any actual influence. He could push through any and all difficulties in search of the golden apple, but when it hung directly over his head he hesitated to stretch forth his hand to pluck it, from fear that it was beyond his reach. I have known such men in literary walks; conscious of their own powers, yet gaining no credit for them, because they needed the recognition of them to give the strength to prove their existence. Like Masoni, they need some one to lean upon, some one to encourage them. Are they not the Churchills of Longfellow's recent tale? Masoni's affection for Father Gutmann had made him supernaturally strong and enabled him to press onward with a steadiness and perseverance, which neither ambition nor his love of music might have given him. Just now some new motive was necessary to elevate him from the state into which he had sunk, and push him onward in his career.

That motive came.

The Opera in New York.

In the Tribune of the 5th inst. there is a long and interesting article from the pen of W. H. FAY apropos of the close of the season at the Academy. He reviews the whole history of the attempts to establish Italian Opera in New York, points out the causes of their failure, and hints at sounder and more practicable methods, in a style and with a force of argument, which certainly claim the thoughtful consideration of all interested in the great lyric problem for our country. Its great length forbids our copying entire, but we commence making extracts of the more important parts. And we are moved to this the more, that we copied not long since an article from the Courier and Enquirer from the opposite point of view from the present writer, who advocates the democratic system of low prices, in opera as in all things.

The following is matter of history and is interesting and instructive enough to stand on record in a Journal of Music.

The attempts to establish an Italian Opera as one of the public amusements in New-York have been numerous, from the first one in the year 1825 to the present time. In that year and the one following, the company of Garcia, of which his daughter, the Malibran, was prima donna, gave 79 representations twice and thrice a week at the Park and Bowery Theatres at the following prices of admission: Boxes, $2; pit, $1; Gallery, 25 cents. The total receipts were $56,685. The largest nightly receipt was 1,962; the smallest $250; the average, $717. In those days the public had the good taste not to require a new opera every three nights; for during that season Il Barbiere was performed twenty-three times; Tancred, fourteen; Otello, nine; Don Giovanni, ten, and other operas four or five times each. The next attempt, we believe, was that made in 1832 by Montessor's Company at the Richmond Hill Theatre. In that season of 35 nights the receipts were $25,603; an average of $731 a-night. Next the Italian Opera House at Church and Leonard streets was built, and during its first season of six months in 1833-'34 under Rivafinoli's management the receipts averaged $750 a-night. During its second season of five months, in 1834-'35 under Porto and Sacchi's management, the receipts averaged $450 a-night. The project of maintaining this as an Italian Opera House was then abandoned; it was rented for theatrical purposes, and in 1841 was destroyed by fire.

Signor Palmò next erected an Italian Opera-House in Chambers street, which opened in 1843-'4, with a season of twenty-seven nights, the gross receipts of which were $13,525—an average of $501 a night. During the first twelve nights of the next season at the same house the receipts averaged $432, and during the season of 1845-'6 about $500. Palmò's Opera-House being voted too small and too far down town for the fashionables, was then abandoned, and became some years later what it now is—Burton's Theatre. A hundred and fifty gentlemen next subscribed to support the Italian Opera for seventy-five nights a year during five years. Upon the strength of this subscription Messrs. Foster, Morgan and Colles built a very elegant Opera-House in Astor place, near Broadway. This house had accommodations for nearly 1,500 persons seated, viz: in the parquet 308, in two stage-boxes 28, in the first-tier balcony and boxes 277, in the second-tier private and open boxes 246, and in the third tier or amphitheatre 600. The five seasons, commencing with the Winter 1847-'8 and ending with the Winter 1851-'52, were given, and the receipts on the average were about $850 a night.

These were all for what may be termed the legitimate attempts to establish Italian Opera as one of the institutions of New-York from 1825 to 1854; beside these there were several chance seasons by Alboni, Sontag, and the Havana Company and others, who had no interest in establishing the Opera in New-York, but calculated on making a large sum in a short time and carrying it out of the country to be spent. The prices of the above regular or legitimate seasons were various, ranging from $2 to $1, the last sum being the lowest ever charged to the best places. Most of these seasons ended disastrously the expenses exceeding the receipts. When the five years' subscription for the support of the Astor-place Opera House expired that building was converted to its present use—a library. It was then proposed to build an opera-house capable of accommodating three times as numerous an audience, in order to make the experiment of a cheap Opera. In favor of building such an opera-house many arguments were presented, the chief of which was that if the Opera could at all be established here as a permanent institution it must be democratic, that is drawing its support from many people, and not from a limited number of private-box holders; accordingly a house of great size was required by which numbers could be accommodated at prices of admission within the means of all. Some years before application had been made to the Legislature for an act of incorporation for this object which had been refused: it was now renewed and obtained.

The stockholders, too, supposed the Academy of Music was to be a democratic theatre, "to seat comfortably from four to five thousand persons," as appears from their articles of association.

So far for the present. We shall continue these extracts next week.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JAN. 12, 1856.

Truth before Effect, or "Lind versus Italy."

We published a short time ago a private letter of MME. JENNY LIND GOLDSCHMIDT, containing some very admirable advice to a young American lady going abroad to learn to sing; and exhorting her, among other things, to learn music, as well as singing, to become familiar with great music of great authors (that is the amount of it, not as she expressed it), and closing with these words:

What I therefore wish most earnestly to impress upon Miss —'s mind is, that she should try to combine Italian song and German music, the one being as necessary as the other; that she should try to avoid false pathos, as the same law exists, to its fullest extent, in Art as in life; that she be true to herself, try to find out the beauty of truth, as well in the simplest song as in the most difficult aria; and the great secret will be hers—the most powerful protector against envy and malice will be on her side."

One would think there could be no mistaking the pure and simple purport of these words, and no gainsaying their great truth and wisdom. Yet the London Musical World, in copying the letter from our columns, fancying it necessary to find deep and hidden allusions in the most plain and direct speech, appends the following exquisite stupidity—if it be not malignity:

Without pretending to know what the accomplished artist intends to convey by "the most powerful protector against envy and malice," (which fairly eludes our closest investigation) we must own that we agree with much that she advances. True, a stanch admirer of Sig. Verdi might point to the quasi failure of Sig. Verdi's opera I Masnadieri (The Freebooters), at Her Majesty's Theatre, in 1847, in which Mlle. Jenny Lind played the principal character; but that would be rather wicked than logical, and savor not a little of the "envy and malice" against which the renowned cantatrice so mysteriously inveighs in her letter to the young lady.

Whereat some good soul of a subscriber, in the next number of the World, replies from a simple common-sense point of view, and with fatherly patience enlightens the editorial darkness. There is something so genuine in the feeling of this reply, that we think it worth preserving:

SIR,—The perusal of the artistic and truthful letter of the renowned soprano, which appears in your current number, has afforded me so much gratification, that I trust you will pardon my anxiety to rush in at the end as interpreter of her concluding phrase "which" (says your Journal) "fairly eludes our closest investigation."

The remark of the writer is that the most powerful protector against envy and malice will be on the side of the young lady on whose behalf she is advising, if he pursues a given course, the essence of which is to find out the beauty of truth." Now this remark strikes me as being in itself so beautifully just and true, that I would fain see its illustrious originator honored by a Professorship at Oxford or Cambridge, either in music, morals, or philosophy, or all three. If the sweet song-bird needs no such elevating process—statuary gods and goddesses must be placed on plinths reared by men of earth; but gifts created in heaven can soar aloft on ether's wing, and only return to earth at intervals to bless it with dreams of the spirit-land.

Just however, come to a matter-of-fact statement why appreciate the remark; and it is this. If a heavy-born gift be possessed (say, by the lady advised) and the possessor be true to herself, avoiding the exaggerated style against which her kind friend so wisely counsels her, seeking (to re-quote the words) to find out the beauty of truth, as well in the simplest song, as in the most difficult aria." she will assuredly fill all hearts, worthy to be called human, with so much of loving admiration, as to leave no place for the rank roots of envy. Can we deem it possible that the all-beneficent Creator hath so fashioned even the least of His gifts, that it could excite so foul a passion? Much less, then, can we suppose such a thing of the angelic gift of song! I, for one, feel assured that if an artist is not more loved than envied, he or she has something yet to learn, or else much to unlearn.

It is this view of the case which so greatly charms me, and makes the entire letter such an enjoyable one as to render me anxious that none of its beauties should be lost upon either the sex addressed, or the sex that must ever rejoice to admit its inferiority, even with the pen, when a really gifted woman employs it as the winged messenger of her soul's pure thoughts,

Though in haste, believe me to remain, dear sir,
yours very faithfully,
4th Dec., 1855.

CHORALE.

CONCERTS.

FOURTH ORCHESTRAL CONCERT.—A barometrical sign has become almost as much a matter of course at the head of a concert notice, as the metronome mark at the beginning of a piece of music. Saturday night was the snow-storm of a score or two of years; yet near a thousand people braved its fury and forgot it in the Music Hall. The concert appeared to give pretty general pleasure, although the programme was decidedly inferior to either of the preceding, and below the standard of this class of concerts for years past. The Symphony in F, by GOUVY, we liked so much, that we could like to hear it again; but not in the place of the great Symphony which one always expects to form the pièce de resistance in such a series as this; not at the expense of one sixth of our whole year's symphony supplies. It is a light, euphonious, pleasing composition; shows a decided talent for instrumentation, using all the modern resources of the orchestra, and using them (the brass especially) so that they enrich without offending. It shows also close familiarity—close, not intimate—familiarity with form, method, structure, and not with the spirit—with the great masters of the Symphony. Here you have preparations like Beethoven, but no Beethoven result, no considerable result at all follows. Thus in the Scherzo, the most striking of the movements, really clever in its first part, the sinking upon a mysterious prolonged monotone would fain raise expectation like the Leonora overture, but the episode (Trio) that ensues is a sentimental, sweetish sort of melody (duet of horns), which would not seem much out of place in some Anna Bolena or Lucia scena. Here again, in the Larghetto, he floats, like so many young composers, in something like a Mendelssohnian atmosphere; but the resemblance is superficial; yet there is sweetness, tenderness and grace in it. German in his studies, M. Gouvy seems entirely French in character, in spirit. Many times, in the first movement especially, you may fancy you are listening to an overture of Auber or of Adam. Familiar as he is with classic form, he does not appear master of it; there is not real logical development of musical thought; things do not follow as by innate necessity from germs of thought once started; growth, proportion, climax, (by which every work of a great creative mind impresses and commands you, whether you understand it quite or not, as surely as a great personal presence)—these are not. And this simply from the lack of genius, from the poverty of pregnant ideas, musical ideas. Instead of this you have a striving after ideas; how remarkable this in the very first theme of the Allegro; the would-be melody lifts and lifts itself a little, and each time falls back, like the first efforts of a half-fledged bird to fly; it seems to promise well; seems as if out of this yearning would be born something memorable; as if invention were indeed about to soar; but it does not; you lose all interest in the theme started, think little of it in what follows, and please yourself as you can while he goes on "making music."

This is no criticism ex cathedra; we would not presume so far as that; but such were the impressions which we could not help bringing away from this new Symphony, heard after those masterworks of genius with which, thanks to our orchestras for years past, we have been made familiar. The audience, too, made spontaneously the same comparison, for nothing all that evening was devoured with such an appetite and so spontaneously applauded as the next orchestral piece, the charming and poetically light Allegro from the eighth Symphony of BEETHOVEN.—Both pieces were in the main finely played. Between them was the famous Aria from GLUCK's "Orpheus": Che farò senza Euridice, sung by Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS. Her rich tones and artistic style could not but give pleasure in such noble melody; yet we regretted that she still, as on a former occasion, marred the pure perfection of the song by ornaments after the modern Italian fashion, not profiting by the instructions of Gluck himself with reference to this very piece, which were cited in this Journal some weeks since. We do not, however, blame the singer. We can suppose she only knows the song as written out for her and taught her by her Italian teacher (Garcia?) abroad. We blame the modern school, which teaches each young singer to consult effect more than the truth of Art. As Gluck wrote it, there is not the slightest ornament or cadenza either in recitative or air. Moreover the time was taken somewhat too slow in general, and with arbitrary variations, rather than those indicated by the composer. It is a pleasing and a striking fact with regard to Miss PHILLIPPS, that in precisely the music, which has not been taught to her, in the songs of the "Messiah" (which oratorio, we are told, she never in her life had heard), music which she sings directly from the notes, simply, as it is written, she has sung the best. Here she respected the composer, respected the truth of Art, and did not make the music a mere vehicle of the modern singer's little outfit of effects. We hope Miss Phillipps will study and produce more songs of this kind, and produce them simply, loyally, as she has done the songs of Handel.

Part Second opened with the overture to Semiramide, one of ROSSINI's best, and always popular; partly on account of the beautiful horn quartet, which was finely played, except perhaps a little too staccato; and partly for its fascinating little melody, its voluptuous coloring and the Rossini characteristics generally. It was very effectively and nicely played, (except a slip in one very simple horn passage,) and barely escaped an encore.—The remainder was rather of the nature of ordinary miscellaneous "star" concerts.—There was an unfortunate sweetish sameness, and hence a tediousness in the three last pieces. Between the somewhat hacknied O mio Fernando of DONIZETTI, (which Miss Phillipps sang admirably in the slow movement, executing well also, if not in her best style, the brilliant finale added to it, it is said, by BOTTESSINI,—though a more soprano pitch would seem essential to the brightness of such a piece of vocal fireworks)—and the orchestrally arranged DONIZETTI finale to Lucia, came a Violin Concerto by SPOHR, also in modo di scena cantante, that is to say, more in the singing operatic than the instrumental spirit, monotonous with "linked sweetness long drawn out," like most we ever heard of Spohr. Yet an excellent composition in its way, could it have come in stronger contrast with things before and after. It is indeed full of melody. Mr. CARL GARTNER played it smoothly and expressively, showing a great mastery of the fine points of execution.

OTTO DRESEL'S FIRST SOIREE.—The third season (we had none last winter) of these exquisitely choice entertainments was opened on Wednesday evening,—an unfortunate time for not a few of the subscribers, whom previous engagements kept away. Yet there was a fine audience, and a more delighted one seldom sat together through so much. The programme was long, but no one felt its length; there was so much piquant individuality and novelty (to most of us) in the selections, so much variety as well as solid wealth, that new refreshment still anticipated fatigue. Such a programme may be preserved as a model in its way:

- PART I.
1. First Movement from the Concerto for two Pianos, in C, with Quartet Accompaniment,..... J. S. Bach.
 2. Aria, with Violoncello,..... J. S. Bach.
 3. Piano Solos: a. Rondo, op. 18,..... Chopin.
b. Fughetta,..... R. Schumann.
c. Gigue,..... Mozart.
 4. Second Sonata for Piano and Violoncello,..... Mendelssohn.
Allegro molto animato—Allegretto—Adagio—Finale.
- PART II.
5. Sonata for Piano: "Les Adieux, l'Absence, et le Retour,"..... Beethoven.
Adagio—Allegro—Andante—Allegro vivace.
 6. Aria: "Dove sono," from Le Nozze de Figaro,..... Mozart.
And "Slumber Song," (Words by Tennyson.)
 7. Romance for Piano, with Quintet Accompaniment, from the first Concerto by..... Chopin.
 8. Quintet for Piano, violins, viola, and violoncello,..... R. Schumann.
Allegro brillante—Tempo di Marcia funebre—Molto animato—Finale.

For unavoidable reasons the Sonata by MENDELSSOHN was played first; a singularly beautiful composition, full of verve and impetus, pervaded by a delicate and subtle fire from beginning to end, and very difficult. It was admirably played by Messrs. DRESEL and WULF FRIES. The movement from the concerto by BACH, for two pianos, had all the cheerful, wholesome life and strength and sunshine of the profound, yet ever childlike master;—buoyant, sparkling with a myriad happy wavelets in incessant motion, never resting, never troubled, like the sunny bosom of the broad sea. Such a piece of music you do not remember consecutively, but as a continuous happy state, a present in which past and future are absorbed. It was played with consummate neatness and truth of accent by both artists (Messrs. DRESEL and TRENKLE.)

The three little piano solos, played to perfection by Mr. Dresel, were finely contrasted, and each original and charming in its way. The Rondo of CHOPIN, however, is not a little piece, but a long and difficult bravura handling of an arch and piquant little theme, without the inconsequence or emptiness of most bravura pieces. The Fughetta by SCHUMANN, one of his early little inspirations, has a short march-like rhythm, subdued and mysterious in its tone, very clear and taking in its form. The Gigue by MOZART is a fascinating, merry thing, much in the manner of old Bach's happy humors.

Mr. Dresel deserves thanks if only for introducing to his audience another Sonata of BEETHO-VEN. The titles of the movements: "Parting, Absence and Return," indicate its sentiment. But there is no common-place and feeble pathos about it. It is the deep, poetic, delicate passion of a Beethoven that inspires its sadness and its uncontrollable ecstasy. It is a perfect love poem from beginning to end, admitting of no break between the parts, music in which you forget the player (if he plays it truly, as Mr. Dresel did,) and are transported by the exquisitely imaginative dream of passion. It has not the breadth and grandeur of many of Beethoven's works, but reveals no less a genuine side of him, and to those who know it well has always been one of the most interesting, though perhaps not one of the most readily appreciated by listeners for the first time. It is extremely difficult, played so very fast as it must be in the Allegro and Finale; for Beethoven wrote musical ideas, and not piano passages.

The Romance by CHOPIN was heavenly; the melody, of his most subtle, delicate, and dreamy, floated on the air so purely, and stole so sweetly on the listening soul, that one scarce thought of the cunning, sympathetic fingers that discoursed it; and against that soft, misty background of the quartet of muted strings, the effect was perfect. Mr. Dresel is one of the few and therefore best pianists, who makes you hear the music, not himself. In this piece, as well as the Bach Concerto, he was finely accompanied by the MENDELSSOHN QUINTET CLUB; also in the closing piece, that grand and overwhelming Quintet by Schumann, which produced so great an impression when played two or three times here a few years since, and a much deeper now. Whatever may be thought of Schumann's later works, there is no questioning the originality, the imaginative power and beauty, of this work. The marcia funebre is profoundly touching.

The vocal selections, sweetly sung by Mrs. WENTWORTH, who did not seem, however, in her best voice, were very choice. That gleesomely pious aria by Bach, to words (in the German) as quaint as some of the old Methodist hymns, the burden being, "My Jesus is here"! sounds as fresh and new as any melody we know. The air from Figaro was perhaps better sung, bating the long recitative, in which the singer seemed not quite to trust herself; and the (anonymous) lullaby to TENNYSON's words: "Soft and Low, Wind of the Western Sea," was found to be a little gem in its way, words, melody, and accompaniment being most aptly wedded.

APOLOGY.—Owing to a multitude of accidents, failure of gas, sickness of printer, &c., it has been impossible to get this paper out in season for the usual mails.

Musical Chat-Chat.

The fifth Orchestral Concert, next week, offers a richer programme than the last—indeed a very attractive one. The old C minor Symphony, the first love of Boston, will be hailed with joy by hundreds. The series will close with festival commemorations of great composers, which will pique public interest not a little. We suggested in our last the propriety of making the sixth concert a commemoration of MOZART, the one hundredth anniversary of whose birthday occurs on the 27th inst. But the regular evening of the concert comes on Saturday, February 2d; and February 3d is the anniversary of MENDELSSOHN's birth. The directors therefore have decided to unite the two occasions in one on Saturday, February 2d, and make the concert commemorative of those two great masters, the selections to be taken purely from their works: such as the "Jupiter" symphony, Zauberflöte overture, &c., of the one; the Piano (with orchestra) Capriccio, Overtures, &c., &c., of the other. A seventh extra Concert will be given on the evening of Saturday, March 2d, which will be a grand BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL, for the inauguration of the Statue in the Music Hall, when the "Choral Symphony," the Choral Fantasia (for piano, to be played by the donor of the statue), will be given with grand orchestra, a select chorus, and distinguished vocal aid, besides other instrumental and vocal masterpieces of the great man. A poetic prologue, too, has been prepared by one who is both artist and poet, and will be recited on the inspiring occasion.

The announcement of nine nights of ITALIAN OPERA at the Boston Theatre, commencing on the 21st, is at length formally before us. The prospectus is a tempting one; the singers the same of whom we have heard so much at the Academy in New York, a brilliant galaxy of names, headed by the incomparable LAGRANGE, and including our own ELISE HENSLEY, who comes to us in opera for the first time, three good contraltos, of whom NANTIER-DIDIE is new to us and famous; two principal tenors, BRIGNOLI and SALVIANI—the latter new to us, and one of the old Rossini school of tenors—besides several secondary tenors; and such well known and esteemed baritones and basses as MORELLI, AMODIO, ROVERE (the comic), and GASPARONI. Our handsome "Don Quixote of the Opera" comes as Conductor again. The list of the pieces to be produced, though to the cultivated music-lover it offers very little novelty, is yet one to prove very popular, and includes three well-known operas of Bellini, two of Donizetti, the Trovatore of Verdi, the Semiramide of Rossini, the Don Juan of Mozart, and for one grand novelty the Prophète of Meyerbeer. Why not give us also, with such means, the ever-fascinating, the immortal "Barber?" There are to be Saturday afternoon performances; is not the mere tradition of that GRISI and MARIO afternoon in Il Barbiere enough to create a demand for it? The prices, though not down to the popular standard, are yet more reasonable than they have usually been, considering how costly and how strong the troupe.

The next conductor of the London Philharmonic Concerts, it is said, will be Mr. WILLIAM STERNDALE BENNETT, the composer of the Naiades overture and many classical works in quite a Mendelssohnian vein.... JULIEN is still giving in London his "Mozart nights" and his "Beethoven" and "Mendelssohn" nights, each night winding up with his stupendous Sebastopol quadrille. Mme. GASSIE is his singer.... MERCADANTE, the veteran composer, has entered into a contract with the Impresario of the San Carlo, at Naples, to write a new opera for the Carnival season of 1856-7.

The Opera season at the Academy wound up last week with Don Giovanni. Mme. LAGRANGE as Donna Anna, Mlle. NANTIER-DIDIE as Zerlina, Lise HENSLEY as Donna Elvira, MORELLI, the Jon, ROVERE, Leporello, SALVIANI, Ottavio. We shall soon have it here.

Mr. MORGAN, the distinguished organist, is been giving in New York an evening of "Piano-Forte Recitals," as he calls it, in which he played Stanzas of Beethoven, preludes and fugues of Bach and Handel and Mendelssohn, pieces by Chopin, &c. We hear nothing more of those Organ Soirées with he proposed giving in Boston.... Mr. GUST SATTER, the pianist, assisted by Mr. and Mrs. LEACH, vocalists, gave the first of a series of Chamber concerts at the Norfolk House in Roxbury, on Wednesday night. The entertainment, we may presume, was mainly classical, but one of the reports speaks in most glowing terms of the prodigious energy with which the young virtuoso reproduced the Trovatore anvils on his grand piano.... In Salem concerts of sacred music are announced by two societies: the Choral Society will repeat Mozart's 12th Mass; the Academy of Music sing to-morrow evening choruses from the "Messiah," "Creation," "Mount of Olives," &c.

The interest of "The Messiah," though it has been given five times within the month past, is not yet exhausted. There seems still an eagerness to sing it and to hear it, and many will hail with pleasure the sudden announcement of still a sixth performance in the Music Hall, to-morrow night, in the shape of a "Grand Union Concert." The three societies have taken their turns separately; and now two of them, the MUSICAL EDUCATION and the HANDEL AND HAYDN societies, (the latter volunteering individual aid), will no doubt make a splendid chorus, and with such solo aid as they announce, with Mr. ZERRAHN conducting, a good orchestra, and Mr. MUELLER at the organ, produce it very satisfactorily. The Education Society are entitled to a good night, considering the storm of Christmas. This society inaugurated their new hall (in Mercantile Library Building) last Monday evening, with appropriate music, speeches and other pleasant socialities.... The second Concert of the GERMAN TRIO took place at Chickering's last evening; the classical pieces were Beethoven's "Kreutzer Sonata" (violin and piano), and Trio in C minor, Op. 1. Mrs. J. H. LONG sang, and there were solo fantasias and so forth as before.... The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB announce some very favorite masterpieces for the next Chamber concert, such as the "Kreutzer Sonata", the E flat Trio of Mozart, &c., &c.

The second Philharmonic Concert in New York takes place this evening. A symphony by GADE will be the main feature; BADIALI (not gone back to Europe after all!) will sing, and ARTOMAS, the harpist, and SCHMITZ, the hornist, perform solos... They seem to be having a rich opera season in New Orleans. The Huguenots, Halévy's Reine de Chypre, Verdi's Jerusalem; Lucia, Norma, Le Domino Noir, &c., have been represented by the excellent French Company there. In the same city M. COLLIGNON, pianist, one of the classical pupils of the French Conservatoire, is giving Chamber Concerts, including Hummel's Septet, quartets of Beethoven, Mozart, &c. Everywhere in the cities of our broad land this kind of music seems to be gathering its circles of admirers.

Musical Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, JAN. 8.—I write more to beg pardon for my long silence than to give you any news in regard to musical matters here. For nearly four weeks I have been invalided, and not only unable to attend any of the concerts that have been given, but even too ill to account for the cessation of my correspondence. However, I am at length able to brave the night air, and shall then resume my series of letters.

I have been to but two concerts since I last wrote you, and they were given so soon after my last letter, that they date too far back to demand a lengthened notice now. One was given by the MUSICAL UNION at the Musical Fund Hall, the other was that at which BADIALI appeared at Concert Hall. The feature of the first was the Stabat Mater of ROSSINI, with full orchestra. The staging being too small to accommodate both chorus and instrumental performers, the latter were placed upon the floor of the room, in front of the voices; I leave you to imagine the result; the accompaniments were heard to unusual advantage, the voices completely overpowered by the din.

BADIALI's concert, or more properly Mr. BLACK's second concert, was a very interesting entertainment, owing to the re-appearance of the favorite baritone after a lengthy absence from Philadelphia. He sang with all his ordinary taste, and to my ears his voice sounded as fresh and fine as in the old SONTAG opera times.

To night the Musical Union gives a grand Operatic Concert to inaugurate the new Hall in Market street; a very large room, I hear, seventy feet by one hundred and eighty in length. I have not seen the interior. From the street its appearance is by no means imposing, as it is built of common red brick, and is over a flour-dealer's depot,—not an eligible position for a music-room. Its situation in Market street will prevent it from becoming a fashionable resort, as the "upper ten" could not bring their carriages to the curbs where vegetables and butchers' carts properly belong.

By the newspapers, I see Professor CROUCH has connected himself with Sanford's American Opera House, — a sort of Buckley's Serenaders, — and has written for it a burlesque upon Norma, which, it is advertised, he will conduct in person.

The ORATORIO AND MADRIGAL SOCIETY, of which Mr. CROUCH is the musical director, is to organize to-morrow evening.

The HANDEL AND HAYDN Society is in active rehearsal, I am told, under the baton of LEOPOLD MEIGNEN. I do not think the directors have announced a concert yet.

As to the HARMONIA, I have not heard its name breathed since the critics exhausted themselves on Mr. DARLEY's Oratorio. The society is probably resting on its laurels.

A friend tells me that Mr. MEIGNEN has completed an Oratorio, called "The Deluge," which is to be brought out at an extra concert of the Musical Union, which, I suppose, is anxious to rival the Harmonia in the fostering of American composition. Such a rivalry is honorable to all concerned.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

CHURCH ORGANS. COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

WM. B. D. SIMMONS, Organ Builder,
(Heretofore doing business in the style of Wm. B. D. SIMMONS & Co.) and

GEORGE FISHER,

Of Cambridge, have this day formed a Copartnership for continuing the manufacture of Church Organs.

We design to keep in our Warerooms New Instruments for sale at prices from $400 to $1,500 each, and are prepared to build by contract at the shortest notice. Organs, worth from $600 to $12,000. And by prompt and faithful execution of orders hope to merit a like encouragement to that heretofore extended to Wm. B. D. SIMMONS, and which has indicated the necessity of this business connection, that his entire attention may be devoted to the more difficult and artistic parts of the business, so that an increase thereof may cause no diminution of the personal attention which is requisite for the maintenance of the CHARACTER of our instruments, upon which we rely for success.

While it will be our aim and ambition to furnish ORGANS OF A PERFECTION OF TONE AND MECHANISM, AND OF AN ELEGANCE OF EXTERIOR UNRIVALLED, we are confident of ability to offer terms MORE FAVORABLE THAN CAN BE OBTAINED ELSEWHERE, for the following reasons: Having ample means, we can purchase in large quantities at first cost, for cash; can always command the most talented assistants, and also do sufficient business to practise division of labor, which, by assigning parts to workmen skilled in their particular branch, necessarily insures better work at less expense. Our Manufactory, by its proximity to Charles river, enables us to receive lumber direct from the vessel at first cost, and having been erected expressly for the business, is in arrangement, size, convenience and its facilities unequalled, being furnished with steam engine, steam-heated drying-house, planing, grooving, matching, moulding, tenoning, boring, and other machines, together with lathes, scroll, circular and other saws, &c., all operated by steam power.

These facilities are such as are possessed by no other manufacturer of Organs in this country, and of themselves would enable us to furnish instruments, with a fair profit, at a price which those of like quality must cost builders who have work done by hand that can be better executed at half the cost by steam machinery.

Second hand Organs at all times for sale.

Orders for tuning church organs promptly attended to, and contracts taken for tuning by the year.

Orders respectfully solicited.

L'ART DU CHANT APPLIQUÉ AU PIANO.

BY S. THALBERG.

As the Piano, properly speaking, cannot render that which is most perfect in the beautiful art of Singing, namely, the faculty of prolonging sounds, we must overcome this imperfection with address and skill, and be able, not only to simulate sustained and prolonged notes, but to swell them also. Emotion renders us ingenious, and the necessity of expressing what we feel creates for us resources which never occur to the mechanical performer.

With this fact in view, the distinguished THALBERG has in this work, in which he applies the art of singing to the Piano Forte, selected transcriptions from those masterpieces of the great composers, both ancient and modern, which are most particularly vocal in their effects, and adopted a simple form as the most appropriate for true transcriptions, in order that they may be within the comprehension and executive ability of young pianists, tolerably advanced. The prominent feature of these transcriptions is the singing part, the melody, to which particular attention is given, holding to that fruitful thought of a great writer, that it is Melody and not Harmony, which lives on triumphantly through the lapse of centuries.

The work is prefaced with a series of general rules in the art of singing well, to which we would direct the special attention of all those who would aspire not only to the name, but the nature of a good performer.

The following is a list of the transcriptions:

1. QUATUOR de l'Opera I Puritani, de BELLINI.
2. TRE GIORNI. Air de PERGOLESI.
3. ADELAIDE, de BEETHOVEN.
4. AIR D'OLIVIER du celebre Chan'teur STRADELLA.
5. L'ACRYMOSA tiré de Requiem de MOZART.
6. DUO de Noces de Figaro, Opera de MOZART.
7. PERCHIE MI GUARDI E PIANGI, Duetto de Zelmira, de ROSSINI.
8. BELLA ADORATA INCOGNITA, Romanza dell' Opera II Giuramento, de MERCAZANTI.
9. NEL SILENZIO FRA L'ORROR, Coro de Congiurati nell' Opera II Crociato, de MEYERBEER.
10. EINSAM BIN ICH NICHT ALLEINE, Ballad tiré WEBER'S Preciosa.
11. LA MEUNIER ET LE TORRENT, tiré des Chansons de la Meuniere de F. SCHUBERT.
12. DUET de Der Freischütz, de WEBER.
13. IL MIO TESORO, Air de Don Giovanni, de MOZART.

FIRST PREMIUM MELODEONS, The Very Best now Manufactured.

J. S. D. & H. W. SMITH respectfully call the attention of the public to their IMPROVED MELODEONS, constantly on exhibition at their Warerooms,

No. 417 Washington Street.

By means of a new method of voicing, known only to themselves, they have succeeded in removing the harsh and buzzing sound which formerly characterized the instrument, rendering the tones full, clear and organ-like. The action is prompt and reliable, enabling the performer to execute the most rapid music without obscuring the tones. The swell is arranged to give great expression.

The manufacturers received the First Premium, over all competitors, at the Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanics Association; also at the Metropolitan Mechanics' Fair, held at Washington, D. C.

For the Parlor, instruments are furnished at prices varying from $45 to $150.

Larger instruments, with two banks of keys, for chapels and small churches, from $150 to $300.

This last instrument, known as the ORGAN HARMONIUM, has been essentially improved by Messrs. Smith, and they have secured a patent therefor.

Persons who wish to hire Melodeons with a view of purchasing at the end of the year, can have the rents credited as part payment of the purchase money.

Signor Masoni.

FROM THE PRIVATE PAPERS OF THE LATE MR. BROWN.

(A FANTASY PIECE.)

[Copyright secured according to law.]

IV.

Two or three weeks after the conversation above sketched, I found Masoni, on returning to my room from "a winter walk at noon" in the Thiergarten, in one of his fierce paroxysms of excitement—face livid, eyes distended and filled with the old expression of half fear, half horror—pacing the floor in restless agitation.

"What is the matter now, Masoni?"

"I have seen them. They are at the Hotel du Nord."

"Seen whom?"

"Old Massa and the young Misses!"

It was a curious fact that he could never break himself of the plantation pronunciation of those words when much excited.

"It may be," returned I, "but you have no reason to be so agitated about it. It is perfectly ridiculous. Be a man. You are as safe from them as the king himself. Have you no idea of the changes wrought in your looks in a dozen years? Besides, here you are in Europe, and I am the only man this side the ocean who has the remotest suspicion that you were ever a slave. Pshaw! you are as safe as I am."

I soon calmed him, and he felt ashamed of the foolish terror he had exhibited. The constitutional weakness which was its cause, was Masoni's misfortune.

I found, upon examining the strangers' list, that he was probably right, in taking the strangers, whom he had seen passing from a carriage into the hotel, for his old master and his daughter;

for I read: "Mason, rentier, aus Washington, und zwei Fräulein Mason."

Subsequent events have recalled forcibly to my memory the extraordinary fascination Bulwer's "Lady of Lyons" had for him. I believe he knew the whole by heart. I have still a copy which he accidentally left one day upon my table; a copy quite worn out by repeated perusals. But not to anticipate. The Masons, as we learned at the Consul's, left Berlin after a few days' visit, for Paris, where they were to remain several months.

Some vague, indefinite thought began to rule Masoni, in consequence of which he renewed his studies and practice with every energy of his soul. He hardly allowed himself time to eat and sleep, and at last gave up his place in Liebig's orchestra, as he said, to save the time of the rehearsals. I doubt if he had any definite plan before him; if he had, he said nothing to me about it. At the end of January, as I find by referring to my daily memoranda of that period, Masoni came up one morning, as he said, to thank me for all my kindness to him and to bid me good bye!

"What! are you going away?"

"Yes, to Paris."

"To Paris?"

"Yes, I am resolved to do something and be a man! I have lost too much time already, and if I succeed, we keep the secret no longer. You will guard it still for a short space?"

"Thank God! Masoni, that you will no longer let your talents rust. I know you will succeed, and oh, how proud I shall be to say, the great violinist, Masoni, is my friend and was once a slave!"

We spent the day together, and he was all I could wish. His arrangements to draw his money from Leipzig, in case of need, were all successfully made, and as he left me in the ten o'clock evening train for Cologne—for I went with him down to the station—he gave me a joyous, parting look, full of confidence and of high spirits, with the closing remark: "You shall hear of me yet!"

And so I did.

From his letters and those of other friends, I learned that Signor Masoni, the elegant and accomplished violinist and man, introduced by most favorable certificates from the best musicians in Leipzig, had had no difficulty in making his way into the salons of the great town of Vanity. I heard of him as the most popular artist in high circles; the petted favorite; the master without whom no private soirée was complete; of the competition among wealthy amateurs to be numbered with his pupils; of his haughty refusals to appear before the common public, but of his willingness to lend his aid to every charity. One had heard of the astonishment he had excited in this salon, another of his great performance at that; and about a month after his departure a friend gave me some notice of his movements and added: "The beautiful Miss Mason is said to be quite in love with the handsome Signor; she is a very fine musician, thanks to an old German, her teacher when she was a girl—and their performance of the violin and piano sonatas of Mozart and Beethoven is said to be superb. They play together almost daily."

Masoni wrote me often and most affectionately, and spoke of his great success in modest but warm language. Here is a passage from a letter, dated April 29th, 1850, a letter to me of special interest, as it was the last I received from him:

"You ask me about my old master's family, and the particulars of my introduction into it. The first question is easily answered; the other I will answer when we meet again. The oldest daughter is married in Virginia; the sons are there also; and the household here consists of Mr. and Mrs. Mason, Miss Sarah, and a much younger daughter, Julia. Old Peter, now with head like the snow, who was, ever since I can remember, Major Domo, is here with them. Of the intellectual capacities of them all you have heard enough. I sometimes smile when I think of the effect a certain piece of information by and by will make upon the weak and proud heads of the family.

"Miss Sarah is a magnificent woman! Beautiful as the day, a beauty to which her pride lends a noble dignity and a fascinating charm. She plays like an angel and surpasses any woman I have ever heard in throwing soul into her performances.

"Oh, what a beautiful thing it is, after all, to be an artist, such, as I may say to a friend like you, I am, or have tried to be,—at all events have the reputation of being,—which certainly will read more modestly. Beautiful, because it opens the door of the most refined, cultivated and intellectual, and brings you into circles, where every word spoken, every idea conveyed purifies and adorns your inner life. Think what a heaven upon earth I am enjoying in the society of the noble, cultivated and beautiful women, whom I daily meet! I, whose companions until I reached manhood were but little better than the beasts that perish, whose female society then for three years consisted almost exclusively of the dear, but antiquated daughters of Mr. Bigelow, and who since leaving America have had no female society, owing to the non-intercourse between the sexes, except in case of special introduction, which is the social law of Germany. And how exquisitely beautiful are the freedom, the mutual regard and hearty politeness, the brother-and-sister-like confidence, which are the characteristics of American society, so far as I can see it here, in the social laws which rule the intercourse of the young men and women. I labor hard, but it is delightful labor. The devil seems to have left me. Have I not reason to be happy?"

My reply to this letter remained unanswered; and as week after week passed away and I heard nothing from Masoni, I became exceedingly anxious concerning him. As Wilkins paid me a parting visit in June, coming to Berlin, on his way to Paris, and thence home, I urged him to seek out Masoni and write me the reason of his incomprehensible silence. Wilkins wrote me June 30th, and from his letter I quote the following:

"As to Masoni, he has disappeared. The Masons have left for Italy, and there is a story afloat among the Americans that Miss Sarah has something to do with his disappearance. They also say, that there was a grand scene at the Masons' hotel, in which Masoni was a principal actor, but no particulars are known. This is every word I can learn about him."

V.

"Herr Brown, der Masoni war hier heut und wünschte Sie sehr zu sprechen. Ach, Herr Je! Er sieht sehr schlecht aus!" (Mr. Brown, Masoni was here to-day and wished greatly to speak with you. Oh, heavens, he looks miserably!) said good Frau Rosenhagen to me about a week after the receipt of Wilkins's letter.

"Where is he to be found?"

"He gave no address, but said he would come again in the morning."

Sure enough, he did look wretchedly as he entered my room in the evening. A more miserable being I have seldom, if ever, seen. Pale, haggard, wild and disordered in his dress—the victim of a mental, perhaps moral, struggle, which had almost killed him.

"What under heaven, Masoni"—I could go no farther.

"Ah, Brown," said he with a ghastly smile, which I sometimes dream of to this day, "I had my revenge! But—it has killed me."

I was too much overcome with his appearance to speak, and after a time he continued: "I am at times fully persuaded that the old plantation superstitions of the devil getting actual possession of a man are not mere imaginations; and that there is a demon of some sort within me, whose object now is attained—my ruin, soul and body."

In this strain he continued for a long time, and I thought best to let him talk himself out, incoherent as was much that he said.

Several days passed before I succeeded in getting a clear conception of what had occurred, the substance of which was this:

The only definite idea he had in his mind when he went to Paris, was to play the part of a great artist, to secure the friendship and respect of his old master and family, to secure by purchase or otherwise, through a third person, the recognition of his freedom, and at length cover them all with confusion by the announcement that the favored and flattered Masoni was none other than the runaway Dick. But a vague and indistinct vision of something beyond—drawn evidently from the "Lady of Lyons"—floated formless, but always there, before his imagination. Fortunately (or the reverse?) for him, American musical students had carried his fame to our countrymen in Paris, and as two or three of these students were still there, old acquaintances of his, he was soon included in all invitations extended to them. But he instinctively felt that to secure the social position among the American residents, for which he was anxious, his admittance into their society must have some other basis, than that of mere virtuosity. The elegant and refined Signor Masoni—he whose fame echoed from the salons of the most exclusive circles of the French capital—for there were in 1850 few traces of Liberté, Egalité et Fraternité left—was too marked an ornament to every social gathering in which he deigned to appear, to be shut out because he made it an indispensable proviso that he should not be called upon to exhibit his powers upon the violin in mixed companies. He was ever ready to perform his share in accompanying any lady who favored her friends with a song—which he did remarkably well—and never refused to take his turn at that instrument when dancing was made the amusement of the evening. On general occasions, when the Masons were not present, and the social circle was small and composed of such persons as would appreciate him, he sent for his Cremona and exhibited his art—the effect of his music being now as joyous as it had formerly been melancholy.

Life of John Sebastian Bach;

WITH A CRITICAL VIEW OF HIS COMPOSITIONS, BY J. N. FORD.

CONCLUSION.

When an artist has produced a great number of works of various kinds, all excellent, all distinguished from the works of all other composers of his own or any other age; and all replete with an originality and spirit, which charms equally the professor and the amateur, there can be little question whether such an artist was a great genius or not. The most fertile fancy, the most exhaustless invention, the most acute and critical judgment, shown by the fittest application to every object of the rich streams issuing from a brilliant imagination; a most refined taste, exhibited in the rejection of every arbitrary and superfluous note; the greatest ingenuity displayed in the discreetest use of the highest and most uncommon resources of the art; and, lastly, that wonderful combination of all these best and rarest faculties of the mind and soul—these are surely clear characteristics of a real genius, if any such exist; and he who cannot find these characteristics in the works of Bach, can be little, or not at all, acquainted with them. And here let it be considered, that the greater and more perfect is a work of Art, the deeper is the penetration, the closer the study required to discover all its latent beauties. With such the roving spirit that flits from flower to flower and settles upon none is unavailing.

Yet, with all the wonderful and admirable gifts he had received from nature, Bach would not have become the accomplished artist that he was, had he not by times avoided those rocks and shoals, on which many a genius, naturally perhaps as great as he, has foundered. I will here make a few remarks on this subject, and then conclude this essay by pointing out to the reader some characteristic features of Bach's genius.

Genius, in its original nature, is nothing more than a decided inclination and taste for an art, which requires the most indefatigable industry to bring it to maturity. Industry not only enables genius to master the mechanical resources of an art, but it gradually develops judgement, and awakens reflection to take a part in the regulation of its too lively proceedings. The ease with which genius becomes master of the merely mechanical part of musical composition; the complacency with which not only the young author, but others also, regard his first essays, which are generally far too early looked upon as successful, frequently induce him to pass over the first principles of the art, and to attack difficulties before he is sufficiently well acquainted with that which is easy—to fly, in short, before his wings are grown. Now if a genius is not restrained at this point, either by good advice and instruction, or by the diligent study of good classical works, in order to remedy this negligence, it will expend its puerile efforts, and never attain to real excellence. For it is certain that no efficient progress can be made, and nothing like perfection be attained, if first principles are slighted or disregarded; and no one can effectually avail himself of his own experience, unless he has previously profited by the knowledge and experience of others. Bach did not run into this error. His great natural genius was attended with a no less uncommon industry, which incessantly prompted him, when he could not advance by his own strength, to avail himself of the aid afforded him by the models existing at that time. This assistance he derived first from Vivaldi's violin concertos, and afterwards from the works of the best writers for the clavichord and organ. Nothing, however, is more capable of exercising the reflective powers of a young composer than counterpoint; and the masters above mentioned, who were at that time distinguished for their fugues, and their knowledge of counterpoint, afforded to Bach in their works ample materials whereon to exercise his understanding, judgment and reflection, so that he learnt to discover his own deficiencies, and the right method of advancing in his art. Public applause is a second rock which has wrecked many a fine but inexperienced genius. Though we would not so entirely undervalue public applause as did the Greek, who said to his pupil, after a successful performance in the theatre, "You played badly: had you played well the public would not have applauded you." Yet it is certain that very many artists are led astray by it, especially if they obtain it too early, that is, before they have acquired judgment and discrimination to know the true value of it. The public is content that everything should be human; but the artist ought to exalt his production into the divine. Therefore genuine excellence and public applause are seldom found compatible. Bach never sought such applause; he thought with Schiller:—

"If by your art you cannot please all, Content the few: to please the multitude is bad."

Like every true genius he labored for himself; he realized his own wishes, satisfied his own taste, chose his subjects according to his own judgment, and derived his chief gratification from his own approbation, which was unfailingly accompanied by that of every real connoisseur. And how could it be otherwise? He who endeavors to frame his work to suit the fancy of some particular class of persons, either has no real genius, or makes a wrong use of it. To cater for the taste of the multitude needs at most some little dexterity in the manner of treating tones. Artists of this description may be compared to the mechanic, who must make his goods in such a manner as that they may be used by his customers. Bach never submitted to be shackled by such conditions. He considered that the artist should form the public taste, not the public form that of the artist. When required, as frequently happened, to write an easy piece for the clavichord, he used to say: "I will see what I can do," and accordingly he chose an easy theme, but in working it up he always found so much to do with it that the piece could not, in the end, be easy. If it was objected that it was too difficult, he used to say, with a smile: "Only practice it well, and you will find it easy enough; you have as many and as good fingers on each hand as I have." This was not from caprice, but from a real love of the art.

It was this spirit that led him, by the great and sublime, to the highest summit of the art. To this spirit in them it may be attributed that the works of Bach not only please and delight, like the merely agreeable in Art, but as it were carry us away with them, not only surprise us on a first hearing, but astonish us more and more the oftener we hear them, and the better we become acquainted with them, by the exhaustless fund of ideas to be found in them, which, when we have admired them a thousand times, still leave us something new at every return. Lastly, even he who knows little more than the alphabet of music can hardly fail to admire them when they are well played to him, and he opens his ears and heart to them without prejudice. Nay more, to this genuine spirit of his art it is owing that Bach, with all that was great and masterly in his style, united the most refined taste, and the greatest precision in the single parts composing the great whole, which are not reckoned so indispensable here as in those works whose main object is the agreeable: that he considered the whole could not be perfect, if anything were wanting to the perfecting of a single part; and that if, notwithstanding the tendency of his genius to the great and sublime, he occasionally composed and performed in a lighter and more cheerful style, still his very lightness and pleasantry were those of a sage. It was only through this union of the greatest genius with the greatest industry that J. S. Bach was enabled so vastly to extend the bounds of his art on every side, that his successors have been unable to maintain this enlarged domain in its fullest extent. This alone empowered him to produce such numerous and finished works, which collectively are, and will ever remain genuine ideals, and imperishable models of Art. And this man, the greatest musical poet, the greatest musical declaimer that ever existed, and probably ever will exist, was a German. Let his country be proud of him; let it be proud, but at the same time worthy of him.

What Chorley says of Jenny Lind.

MME. GOLDSCHMIDT'S CONCERTS.—When some account was offered of the Whitsunside Musical Festival at Düsseldorf, [see Jour. of Music, June, '55.] a remark or two were offered on the peculiar position taken up by Mme. Goldschmidt, in respect to Art, to which it may be as well to refer. That hers is a brilliancy which exhausts, rather than enriches, the domain to which she belongs by profession, is self-evident. It is a repetition of the career of Catalani, with some variations.—The uniform splendor of voice exhibited by Catalani is not possessed by the Swedish Lady,—but then Mme. Goldschmidt is twice the musician that her predecessor was; and her voice has one material for effect, which is unique in our experience among soprano singers,—we mean the superior flexibility, force, and command over verbal articulation in its uppermost register. The two prime donne charmed (and charm) the public by qualities totally apart from natural gifts or musical accomplishments,—by a certain enthusiasm of style, which, let it be spontaneous or let it be studied, is resistless. To neither of the two the conditions of association seemed (or seem) possible. Mme. Catalani was of small use to Opera, because she would be the Opera;—Mme. Goldschmidt appears to avoid all festivals where she cannot be the Festival. There is a good side to such personality, but there is a less good side to it. The public, however, cares little for the nicest adjustment of the balance. Therefore,—though some such notice as the above is an inevitable symphony to any account of Mme. Goldschmidt's concerts offered by those who will not put Art beneath the feet of any artist, whatever be her name, whatever her accomplishments,—it is needless to work out the argument further, or more circumstantially to enumerate facts and details, the bearing and significance of which must, nevertheless, never be lost sight of. The soprano music in "The Creation" is one of Mme. Goldschmidt's parts of predilection; and it is hard to imagine the jubilant portions of the work more magnificently sung than they are by her. Her obvious determination always to do her utmost, and the force which she possesses in the upper octave of her voice, leave certain numbers of "The Creation" without the hope of a better, more earnest, more inspired interpreter than she. Now, too, her voice is at its best, and (as we said in reference to the Düsseldorf Festival) possesses greater lustre and vigor in its upper tones than formerly. In the two descriptive songs—"With verdure clad," and "On mighty pens,"—her volume of tone and strenuousness of manner are in the way of our perfect satisfaction. We remember the more delicate, sweeter, and not less finished delivery of Mme. Stockhausen and Mme. Sontag; and while we recognize the skill and conscience of their successor, we miss something of ease, something of elegance,—we are fatigued rather than enchanted; we are astonished, where a gentler ministration to Beauty would have been more welcome. The soprano part in Handel's "Israel" would suit Mme. Goldschmidt admirably,—since it lies in the best part of her voice. Thanksgiving and triumph seem to be the elements of the Swedish Lady's expressive power;—as a gentle and graceful singer she has been surpassed. Her delivery of the English texts leaves nothing to wish, and everything to be imitated by ninety-nine out of the hundred English singers. Strange, that in dignity and distinctness our countrymen and countrywomen should allow themselves to be thus outstripped by foreigners! Mme. Goldschmidt was cordially welcomed and gladly applauded by a public that filled the Hall. The orchestra and chorus, conducted by Mr. Benedict, were sufficient: the gentlemen engaged to sing the tenor and bass solos seem to feel themselves merely in the accessory position of train-bearers to the Princess of the evening,—and though careful and correct, avoided any attempt at prominence or equal proportion when their duty called them out in concert with the soprano.

Opera in New York.

[FURTHER EXTRACTS FROM MR. FRY.]

We resume, from the article in the Tribune, the history of Italian Operatic enterprises in New York. Our last extracts brought us to the Academy of Music, and a statement of its large and democratic purposes as set forth in the charter.

In the charter no mention is made of representing Italian Opera as a purpose for which the Academy would be rented; but the articles of subscription to the stock above quoted, provided that the lessee should be bound to give Italian Opera and other musical entertainments. The other musical entertainments have thus far been half a dozen concerts. The charter was granted on April 10, 1852; the building was commenced in May, 1853; completed September, 1854, at a cost of $335,000, including payment for the ground, and opened on October 2, of that year. Fifteen months have elapsed since its dedication. During that brief period it has passed through the hands of five different managers, who have conducted three seasons. It opened with the Grisi and Mario troupe, who, between the second October and 30th December, 1854, gave about 40 performances, the first half under the management of Mr. Hackett, and the remainder under that of four wealthy stockholders represented by Mr. Paine. The prices of admission were at first $3 to all parts of the house except the amphitheatre, or fourth tier, intended to accommodate 1600 of "the masses;" and a place so constructed that most of the occupants, should it ever chance to be filled, can have quite as good a view of the performance as could be obtained from Brooklyn Heights or the Fort at the Narrows. The admission to this amphitheatre was fixed at 50 cents. Subsequently during the season the $3 price was reduced to $2.

The second season commenced in February last under the management of Ole Bull & Co., and closed in June under that of another committee of stockholders. During this season of about forty nights the price was $1.50. The third season, the one just concluded by Mr. Paine, commenced on the 1st of October last, with the following scale of prices: "Boxes, parquette, and balcony, $2; second circle, $1; amphitheatre, 50 cents." Subsequently, they were reduced to the following standard, with which the season closed: "Admission, $1; secured seats, 50 cents extra; amphitheatre, 25 cents."

At the commencement of the season now terminated, the announcement of Mr. Paine's augmented prices was favorably received by some of the press, and commended and defended on various grounds, the chief of which was the assumption that the mass of the people have nothing whatever to do with the support of the Italian Opera, and that the experiment of affording it at a cheap rate had been frequently tried, and had always failed. * * * But if rumor is right, notwithstanding Mr. Paine's great liberality and firm hand, the season, like all preceding ones at the same establishment, has failed to remunerate, in a moneyed way, the manager. Italian Opera, therefore, as at present conducted, cannot be called an institution in New York, but its existence is due solely to the pluck and pocket of a manager.

We, however, are not surprised at the disastrous results of the fresh attempt to found the Italian opera in Fourteenth street as a semi-exclusive institution on the London plan of playing three times a week less than half the year, at prices double, treble, quadruple, and even sextuple those of the theatres. A like result has attended nearly every one of the several attempts made in this city during the past thirty years; while during the same period theatrical management has generally been a regular, successful, and profitable business. The main causes of the success of the latter, and failure of the former may be thus stated:

Theatrical managers as a class, in this city, do a steady, safe, and profitable business. They sell amusement for the mass of the people, at old established stands, well situated in great thoroughfares. They charge cheap, fixed prices, within the means of all customers. Their places of business are open six nights a week during nine-tenths of the year. The public, always sure of finding the shop open, the goods displayed, and the prices unaltered, acquire the habit of dropping in to make purchases, and in time each manager receives a good run of custom. Occasionally, in seasons of general depression, theatrical amusement sellers, like other merchants, are overtaken by calamity; but in the long run their profit and loss account shows a balance on the right side of the ledger. Prosperity with them is the rule.

Italian Opera managers, as a class, in this city, do an unsteady, unsafe, unprofitable business. They sell an amusement which the great mass of the people are told they cannot appreciate or will not support. Their shops are away from great thoroughfares, and never become old-established stands, but after successive failures are converted to other uses. They charge high and ever-varying prices, far above the means of many who might be customers. Their doors, instead of being always open, are only so three times a week for a few months, and at no fixed periods. The public have to search first to find the place of business, next to discover if it chance to be open, and thirdly to ascertain the cost of the goods, and calculate whether they can afford to purchase. The public generally does not choose to take so much trouble, and so their custom is bestowed on the theatre and withheld from the opera house.

The success of a place of amusement depends on its location, construction, and management. Location at the busiest point of the greatest thoroughfare of the city is one of the most essential elements of success. Yet we find Church street, Astor place, and Fourteenth street chosen successively as sites for Italian Opera Houses. * *

The next great error was putting the Academy on a lot too small to allow the construction of an auditorium of the half moon shape, and consequently forcing the architect to adopt the nearly old-fashioned horse-shoe form. Owing to this form, instead of completely seating four to five thousand persons, which the stockholders stated would be its capacity, the seats which command a reasonably good view of the stage are about twenty-five hundred. There are, it is true, four thousand seats, so called; but of these, in the fourth tier six to eight hundred command no possible view of a single square foot of the stage, or a performer occupying any position on it. We mention these drawbacks to success at the Academy of Music, which had their origin with the proprietors, and in some degree must ever exist. Let us now inquire what its managers have done to render it popular, to afford opera at moderate rates, and to insure their own success.

We believe there is no fashionable class in this city possessing the ability, or, if possessing it none with the cultivated taste and the disposition to support the Academy as an exclusively Italian Opera House, at prices of admission three to four times greater than those of our theatres. We are not prepared to assert the probability of its being supported as an exclusively Italian Opera House, giving performances only three times a week for a portion of the year, with any scale of prices, high or low. The exorbitant rent of that house, and expenses of performance given only three times a week, probably preclude the attempt to offer them at low prices, as we shall show when examining them in detail. But we are prepared to assert that no trial of the democratic low-priced plan has been made in this city, and especially none such has been made at the Academy, the lowest admission for good secured seats there having been $1 50, and even $3 having been at one time charged. * * *

In London, the plan of giving Italian Opera for a season of five months, twice or thrice a week, at very high rates of admission, was adopted because the nobility and gentry renting all the boxes for the season did not desire to attend oftener, and were willing to pay for their exclusiveness; and did not wish their house, when closed for their Opera performances, to be devoted to other purposes. Consequently, each performance—as a year's rent of about $40,000 and five months' salaries had to be paid out of sixty nights' receipts—cost about twice or thrice as much as if the performers had been engaged like those of other theatres, by the year, to appear every night, and the rent had been paid from the receipts of 313 nights instead of 60. In every attempt to establish the Opera in New York, this London plan has been imitated. But on the contrary the Drama has been rendered popular; admission to theatres, formerly $1, is now 50 cents. The Opera here thirty years ago was $2, and at the commencement of the last season, in the great house built to cheapen and popularize it, it was still $2. What it may be next season, no one knows.

There are now here eight theatres, giving upward of two thousand performances a year. An almost equal number have been in existence, and hardly ever less than half as many have been open, at any period during the past thirty years. In that time there have been given 45,000 performances. In the same time the number of Italian operatic performances has been, as nearly as we can calculate, less than 1,300. In these thirty years there have been 9,360 acting nights; so there has been, on an average, one performance of Italian Opera every seven acting nights, notwithstanding that four Opera-houses have been built—the first of them more than twenty years ago—especially for the performance of Italian Opera. At this rate of progress, the Italian Opera will never become an established popular institution, and the acceleration has been scarcely perceptible in the fifteen months the Academy has been in existence. During these fifteen months, there have been 390 acting nights, or nights exclusively of Sundays. Some of our theatres are open every acting night in the year. Others are closed for one or two months in the summer only. Taking them altogether—including those denominated Museum, Gardens, and what not—they give performances on nine-tenths of the acting nights. If the Academy had been managed like the theatres, the rent up to this time would have been derived from the receipts of 350 performances; that being nine-tenths of the acting nights from the date of its opening. Within that period, however, as we have shown above, there have been only about 120 performances, divided into three seasons, under five sets of managers, with five changes in the scale of prices of admission: all of which proves that there has been no fixed system of management for establishing Italian Operas at the Academy, but a vacillating, experimental course, to determine by a sliding scale what eventually the public could bear.

THE PAINTER AND HIS SITTER.

BY C. P. CRANCH.

At his easel sits the Painter, at his canvas large and white,
And he gazes on the sitter, in the clear, soft studio light,
And with yielding charcoal deftly draws his outline bold and free,
Till the face and form are pencilled, for a cunning hand has he;
Then in graded semicircle spreads his colors and his hues,
Whites and reds and sunny yellows, sober greys and browns, and blues;
And the sitter sees the palette (but is hid the canvas, face),
Sees the primal law and order, every color in its place,
Each proportioned to the other—all seems plain and understood,
And he builds his dream, and trusts the growing picture will be good.
Soon, however, on the palette, while the picture is unseen,
All is mixed in strange confusion, and he says, "What can it mean?"
Can those patches and those scratches ever come to anything?
From such muddy streaks and blotches can a fair creation spring?
For the sitter must not stir to see the work that's going on,
Till the portrait is completed, and the artist's task is done.
Like this puzzled sitter, often sits believing, doubting man,
On the Universe he looks and sees a little of the Artist's plan:
Sees with philosophic eye, the laws that govern and direct,
Traversing the world in order—free of discord and defect,
Each a promise of fulfilment—each a hint for hope and faith,
While the Infinite Creator breathes through all his living breath.
Life is rich—the world is perfect—all is order, joy and peace.
Can this vision of perfection, spanning earth and heaven, cease?
Ah! the days grow dark and darker—and the harmony we seek,
Crossed by bitter winds of discord, turns into a maddened shriek.
Hope is crushed and faith bewildered—all in wild confusion whirled,
And the skeptic laughs—"It is a dauber's palette—this brave world!"
Where are all your primal colors—where your lovely light and shade?
All is chance and contradiction—out of which what can be made?
I see not the Artist's meaning—I see not the end in view,
I must sit and watch his fingers, till his work is carried through."
But the Painter still is working—through these forms of sin and strife,
Out of all this seeming chaos, moulding fairer forms of life,
And one day the patient sitter, from the Artist's point of sight,
Shall behold his form transfigured, glowing in the perfect light.

Music Abroad.

London.

Those who heard JENNY LIND in Boston or New York sing: Hear ye, Israel! will never forget it, and will imagine what it might be to hear her in all the chief soprano solos of Elijah, which formed the second of her series of oratorios in London. The Times says, not without truth, we fancy, that "the music allotted to the soprano in the great work of Mendelssohn is of a far deeper meaning and a far loftier beauty than anything Haydn ever imagined." We copy from its notice a few sentences:

The air, "Hear ye Israel!" with its sequel, "Thus saith the Lord, the Redeemer of Israel,"—perhaps the grandest oratorio song for a soprano voice that has been written—is seldom done justice to by concert vocalists. If a sacred composition may be properly said to be dramatic, this fine inspiration is dramatic in the highest sense of the term; and in the striking contrast between the slow movement and the allegro lies one of its chief difficulties. The lamentation of the angel over Israel's sins and the profoundly touching reproach conveyed by the words, "Oh hadst thou heeded my commandments!" are revealed in music of the tenderest pathos, while the sudden hope and strength awakened by the divine words of promise—"I am He that comforteth—be not afraid"—are set to a strain of emphatic melody that approaches the sublime. The correct execution of this arduous piece depends upon gifts, both physical and mental, of an exceptional order. Some have given the first movement, others the last, with more or less feeling and spirit; but Madame Goldschmidt alone, of all the singers we have heard in Elijah, has been able to accomplish both in a way to leave little or nothing to desire. In this air, as in the opening of the beautiful duet already alluded to (the last part is too tame) she apprehends entirely the poetical conception of the musician, delivers the text (though her English pronunciation is still imperfect) like a thorough mistress of declamation, and sings every phrase—nay, every note, in a manner so finished and satisfactory, and with such a wealth of vocal tone—tone, pure and naturally produced—that the critic has nothing to do but to praise.

The "Holy, holy!"—a composition not to be excelled in simplicity and grandeur—was also encored, and if possible deserved the honor still more than the trio. In the delivery of the slow and measured phrases here intrusted to the principal soprano Madame Goldschmidt has never had a rival. They lie in the best part of her voice, which soars above the orchestra and chorus with unclouded purity and splendor, from the impressive opening to the magnificent climax. Such singing has every claim to be apostrophized as perfect—a great word, but this time by no means ill applied. Whatever concerted music Madame Goldschmidt had to sing (as, for example, the double quartet, "For he shall give his angels charge," and the quartet, "Cast thy burden upon the Lord," in both of which she took the chief part) she sang well—which, from so practised and experienced an artist, was not surprising. We were a little disappointed, nevertheless, with the scene where Elijah sends the youth to the seashore to look out for rain. We expected considerably more from this; and yet, if summoned to state our objections to the quiet and unobtrusive reading of Madame Goldschmidt, we should be at a loss. There were also a few (very few) other points with which we were not wholly satisfied, whether it was with the "tempi," the readings, or what not; but, under the immediate influence of so generally exquisite a performance, we cannot stop to particularize as blemishes what others might possibly refer to a standard of taste. We are persuaded that in very many respects Madame Jenny Goldschmidt never sang with greater power than last night, and are convinced that no other vocalist has hitherto approached her in the soprano music of Mendelssohn's Elijah.

Paris.

A new opera has been produced at the Italiens, entitled Fiorina. It is the work of M. Pedrotti, director of the theatre at Verona, and has been successful. However, the composer has fair right to complain of the manner in which he was treated by the principal artists, who succeeded in making him supremely ridiculous. At every encore, and almost after every round of applause, they rushed for poor M. Pedrotti, and dragged him to the footlights, where he stood bowing his acknowledgements to an audience, many of whom were convulsed with laughter at his frequent apparition. The first two acts are good, the third is an anti-climax, and after the first night the opera was compressed into two. I shall not even attempt a description of the libretto, which is from an Italian pen, and which rivals the greatest masterpieces of stupidity and involvement. It is more incomprehensible than the Zauberflöte, and possesses as little of human interest as that triumph of bathos. But M. Pedrotti is no Mozart, though he has borrowed from him not a little; and, in one particular instance, it might have been supposed that Signor Everardi had mistaken his rôle for that of Don Giovanni, so curiously did his serenade resemble "Deh vieni à la fenestra." Mad. Penco made a pretty little peasant. Her vocalization is brilliant and effective, and her voice is sweet and silvery. Sig. Carrion proved himself once more to be a useful tenor, who never refuses a part, and who sings whatever he undertakes with good taste and artistic feeling. Signors Everardi and Zucchini were efficient in their respective parts. We are promised the Leonora of Mercandante, the Matrimonio Segreto, Don Giovanni, Semiramide, Ernani, and a new opera by Signor Bottesini, of which report speaks highly, entitled L'Asedio di Firenze.

With next week, Mdle. Cruvelli's engagement at the Opera comes to a close. Madame Tedesco has just been engaged by M. Croisier for three years, and will make her appearance in a few days either in the Favorite, or as Fides in the Prophète. Mdle. Donati, said to possess a good soprano voice, has also been engaged.

Alboni has commenced an engagement at the opera in Brussels, where she sang on Monday in the Barbieri. Nothing could exceed the warmth of her reception, and our Flemish friends were unusually enthusiastic. The Brussels opera has been a sad failure this year, for except Caroline Duprez, who sang for a few weeks at the commencement of the season, they have been unable to secure a prima donna of even second-rate abilities—to use an Irishism. Four tenors have made their début, and all failed. Indeed, during the last two years, Paris has appropriated every Belgian artist worth the having, and while Madame Marie Cabel, Madame Lauters, and Monsieur Everard are nightly winning applause at the Opéra-Comique, the Théâtre-Lyrique, and the Opéra-Italien, the "braves Belges" at home must be content with what the Parisian managers choose to leave them.—Corr. London Musical World, Dec. 22.

ST. PETERSBURGH.—The Italian operatic season opened with Sig. Verdi's Macbeth, which was followed at the next representation, by Rigoletto, in which Mme. Bosio made her début. The company includes the following artists: Mesdames Bosio, De Meric-Lablache, Lotti; Signors Lablache, De Bassini, Tagliafico and Tambrlik.

SCHWERIN.—Herr Von Flotow, the composer of Stradella, Martha, Indra, etc., has been appointed Intendant of the Hof-Theatre.

COBURG.—A medal has been struck at Brussels in honor of his Royal Highness the Duke of Saxe-Coburg, in his character as a composer. On one side of the medal is the bust of the duke, with the motto, "Ernest II., duc régnant de Saxe-Coburg." On the other side is the Saxon escutcheon, surrounded by a wreath, composed of lyres and shields. On the latter are the titles of the duke's musical works: Zaire, Toni, Casilda and Sainte-Claire, and the names of the authors of the libretti, Millinet, Elshalz, Birch-Pfeiffer, etc. Underneath the escutcheon is a shield with martial attributes, and the inscription: Eckenförde, 5 April, 1849."

BERLIN.—Last week, the Königlicher Domchor commenced its series of concerts at the Singacademie, in the presence of the King, the Queen, and a most brilliant audience. There was not a single empty place in the room. The first part was composed of Palestrina's 'Kyrie', Vittoria's 'Impropria', Bernabei's 'Agnus Dei', and Caldara's 'Crucifixus'. The second part included Johann Sebastian Bach's Motet, 'Herr, wenn ich Dich nur habe', Mozart's 'Miserere cordias Domini', a prelude and fugue by J. S. Bach, and Beethoven's variations in C minor—the two last pieces being played by Herr von Bülow. On the morning of the 2nd inst., a grand musical demonstration was held, in the Singacademie, by the various musical institutions and soloists of the capital, in honor of Dr. Franz Liszt. Herr Grell made a complimentary speech in the name of the Singacademie. Stern's Gesang-Verein sang a selection from Elijah. Herren Von Bülow and Laub executed a duet by MM. Kullak and Vieuxtemps, and Herr Laub furthermore performed, alone, Bach's fugue in G minor. Herr Theodor Fornes sang one of Dr. Liszt's songs, and Mdle. Meyer, the grand air from Gluck's Orpheus. There is nothing new at the Royal Operahouse.

in most cases in this journal laid more stress upon the programme than upon the performance. We believe it to be of much more importance what music we shall hear, than how we shall hear it given, although, of course, no one can be indifferent to the execution of a piece of music, and the better the work, the better it should be performed. But a good book can benefit us in spite of a bad reader, and the first essential is good music, quite as much as good books. We rejoice, therefore, to see the question of programmes, of fit selections, seriously discussed in public prints, where it is too much the custom that the singer or the player gets all the notice, and the composer none. Let this be our excuse for copying here the whole thus far (whether it will go farther we know not) of a pleasant little controversy which has sprung up in the Transcript since the performance of M. GOUVY's Symphony at one of the six Orchestral Concerts.

[From the Transcript of Jan. 8.]

A WORD ABOUT SYMPHONIES. Mr. Editor: I went to the Music Hall on Saturday evening, with a good degree of curiosity concerning the merits of Gouvy's Symphony No. 2, which was then performed for the first time before a Boston audience. After hearing it through (and the orchestra did it full justice,) I was unable to find in it sufficient merit to warrant its repetition. It has but a meagre supply of melody (chiefly contained in the first and last movements) and no features which indicate, in the composer, a lively fancy or a powerful conception. The audience regarded it with little favor, as was clearly proved by their reservation of hearty applause for the sparkling Allegretto from Beethoven's 8th Symphony.

Now as a Symphony forms a very important part of our concert programmes, why cannot this post of honor be always given to some composer of the rank of Mozart or Haydn? If Gouvy's Symphony was selected for the sake of novelty, the works of the other two composers can abundantly furnish this desideratum. Each of them has a great number of Symphonies, but very few of which (some three or four, possibly,) have been played in Boston within a score of years. There is, indeed, a legend, that a band, existing here some thirty or forty years ago, used to play them; but the present race of concert-goers probably derived little benefit therefrom.

Now, Messieurs Directors, if you will give up the Symphony department of the remaining concerts to Haydn or Mozart, a positive benefit will be conferred on the admirers of true Art. X.

[From the Transcript of Jan. 15.]

MUSICAL MATTERS. Mr. Editor: An article in the Transcript, a few evenings since, in which the writer kindly advises the Directors of the Orchestral Concerts how best to further the cause of music among us, (viz: by only giving the public Symphonies of Beethoven and Mozart, and never hazarding the production of a work of such importance as a Symphony by any modern composer,) certainly calls for some comment.

In the first place, the Directors will doubtless wish to thank Mr. X. for his kindness in calling their attention to the excellence of the works of the great masters, and would then remind him that out of four concerts, two have been devoted, in the Symphony department, to Beethoven's Sixth and Seventh Symphonies, and one to Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony. (Perhaps, however, he may not look upon Mendelssohn as fit to educate the public.) These three programmes look as if those who wrote them were aware of the excellence of Beethoven and his brethren.

In the second place, we would ask X. if he thinks it is much to devote one concert out of six to the production of a very pleasing and well written Symphony, (which, perhaps, he does not quite comprehend, after one hearing,) which was new to an American public; which gave an indication of what a young composer of our own day can do in this department of music; and which had been played with so much satisfaction before the most critical audience in Europe (that of the Leipsic Gewandhaus) that the author returned the next year with a new composition of the same class, which was performed before the same audience with equal gratification.

Are we, because we consider Shakespeare and Milton the greatest of poets, never to read Tennyson and Longfellow, Bryant and Browning? Are we, because we bow before Raphael and Michael Angelo, never to look at Turner and Landseer, Scheffer, and Deramps? The most cultivated audiences are those which best know what is going on in the world around them, as well as what has gone before them. We measure the greatness of the greatest by the relative proportions of the lesser, and we cannot be just in our appreciations of either without a thorough knowledge of the capacities of both. The meanness of mind which only admits of the highest excellence as fit food for its cultivation; which cannot look at the humble field violet because it is not as great and as strong as a forest oak, gives the most deadly blow to all national progress in Art or Science, and only renders men bigots and schismatics. There are greater glories and lesser glories, differing in kind and in brightness. A hill is not unworthy of attention because it is not a mountain, nor a wren because it is less gorgeous than a bird of paradise.

Let us study liberality. Let us, while we give the greatest share of our time to the marvels of Art, allow at least now and then a moment to that which, provided it be good within its limit, will serve to make us enjoy the greatest the more, when we return to them, and enable us, if we have liberal minds, to see that there are many degrees of excellence, and that unless we are predetermined to worship only Raphael, Beethoven, and Shakespeare, we can find much to enjoy, in a lesser way, in what is pleasing and graceful, as well as in that which is sublime and unapproachable. Perhaps the truth is that we American Athenians think we know too much; that we are so conversant with all that is greatest and best, that all else falls upon our pampered palates. We ask pardon of Mr. "X," who is doubtless an American Athenian, deigning only to acknowledge the giants of Art who alone are worthy to interest his mind.

A DIMINISHED SEVENTH.

[From the Transcript of Jan. 16.]

ANOTHER "WORD ABOUT SYMPHONIES."

Mr. Editor: I find that an article of mine in the Transcript of the 8th inst. has elicited a rejoinder in yesterday's paper. I must commence my comments on this response by observing that Mr. "Diminished Seventh" has fallen into a serious mistake, at the outset, in stating my position. I did not counsel the Directors of our Orchestral Concerts to make their symphony selections from the works of Beethoven and Mozart, for good opportunities of knowing Beethoven's symphonies have been given us within the last five years. What I did suggest was, that the symphonies for the remaining concerts should be taken from the works of Mozart or Haydn. My respondent, by falling into this error, has materially weakened his second paragraph. He should have read more carefully the closing part of my communication.

In his third paragraph, Mr. "Diminished Seventh" asks if I think "it is much to devote one concert out of six to the production of a very pleasing and well-written Symphony?" (which gave so much satisfaction to the most critical audience in Europe that the author was induced to furnish another composition of the same class, which was performed before the same audience with equal gratification.) I reply: Under the circumstances, it was "much." And let us consider these circumstances. Our opportunities for hearing Symphonies are few—very few. Boston is not like Leipzig, or several other continental cities, in furnishing abundant opportunities for hearing the performance of every description of instrumental music. Admitting that Gouvy's Symphony was "very pleasing and well-written, yet therefore should its performance have displaced a Symphony which (even on a first hearing) might, in its every movement, have enraptured the audience?"

I think I can mention a Symphony, which on a first hearing, would delight the greenest audience which could be found in New England. I mean Haydn's Symphony in D, which was among those performed here last winter. Now I have sufficient faith in this composer to believe that his works might furnish many other Symphonies equally delicious—and yet (charming trait!) giving no trace of effort on the part of the composer. The play of his fancy is untiring, whether in the frolic of an allegro, or the ineffective sweetness of an adagio; and yet, to not one of our orchestral concerts this winter have his Symphonies, or those of his kindred spirit, Mozart, contributed.

Mr. "Diminished Seventh" asks if, because we consider Shakespeare and Milton the greatest of poets, we are never to read Tennyson and Longfellow, Bryant, and Browning? I should be very sorry to sanction any such narrowness. But now, sir, suppose that the reading public had only been allowed to see Macbeth and Lear, and the first two books of the Paradise Lost; then suppose them to be informed

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JAN. 19, 1856.

About Symphony Programmes.

our running commentary on our Boston concerts, viewing them with reference mainly to their tendency to promote or put back real musical and culture in the community, we have that a whimsical publisher had some forty of Shakespeare's plays, and the remaining books of the poem, locked up in his safe, preferring to issue works of more modern description. Would they then read Tennyson and Longfellow with as much satisfaction as at present? I think not.

Now, by all that I can learn, there are at least forty Symphonies, by Haydn and Mozart, of which Boston audiences are totally ignorant. The people of Leipzig have probably enjoyed abundant opportunities of hearing these Symphonies; and therefore may act wisely in fostering pleasing novelties. As Bostonians are circumstanced, they should, it would seem, first gain some needful knowledge of the greatest orchestral productions of Mozart and Haydn, after which, it will be full time enough to look up the works of Mr. Gouny, and composers of similar calibre. Mr. "Diminished Seventh" remarks that "the most cultivated audiences are those which best know what is going on in the world around them, as well as what has gone before them."

Very true; but, in musical matters, Bostonians have thus far necessarily remained ignorant of the greatest portion of "what has gone before them," and, therefore, even if they were fully apprised of "what is going on in the world around them," they would hardly bear the complimentary designation of "the most cultivated audiences." Let us hope that this misfortune may be remedied.

These remarks appear to us well-meant, and not without much reason, upon both sides. That "Diminished Seventh" misunderstood "X" is quite evident. The latter, if we mistake not, is much more of a Haydn and Mozart man than an enthusiast about Beethoven, whom we doubt not, nevertheless, that he appreciates. But he writes, it seems to us, like an amateur of the old school of symphony music,—one brought up with a profound reverence for Father Haydn, and who looks upon his symphonies as the everlasting models in that kind. His point is, that knowing so much of Beethoven, it is high time we went back and made ourselves familiar with the stepping-stones to him,—with his illustrious predecessors, whose symphonies were the wonder and delight of a music-loving generation or two before us. He writes in good temper, and without the arrogance, that we can see, of which his respondent charges him; and in his general view of the true economy of our great musical opportunities (not over many at the best) he has our sympathy.

Let us rejoice that we have persons of such different preferences who care so seriously about symphonies as to make them matter of such discussion. The three communications are instructive, and suggest the following inferences.

1. It is impossible, in a course of only six symphony concerts, to satisfy either the momentary preferences or lasting partialities of all even of the most truly appreciative of great music. Mozart and Haydn are good; every one feels a portion of his birthright withheld from him, if he may never hear them; some even think them incomparable, and that to leave them out in symphony concerts is to leave out Hamlet in the play. Beethoven, too, is good; in our day he impresses the larger number far more deeply than any master; his music has, perhaps, more of the deeper spirit of this age in it; his symphonies are played more frequently than others, because both musicians and public find in them more meaning, more excitement, more that speaks to their inmost souls than they do in any other. But there are geniuses since Beethoven, who have produced great symphonies; there is that wonderful symphony of Schubert; there are the two of Mendelssohn; many would add Schumann, or Gade, or both, to the list; and where there is really genius, really high Art, is it not always good to hear a Symphony? Haydn wrote many more than anybody, but who will say that they collectively contain as much as the immortal nine of Beethoven? It is good also to know what is going on in the world, what merit or interest there may be in younger efforts in the same great form. But how are we to provide all these good things even in a Leipzig winter? how, especially in a Boston season of six concerts, where but one symphony upon an evening will be tolerated? How contrive to satisfy, in a selection of six pieces, both those who want to renew the glorious impression of the Beethoven symphonies; those who are anxious to have the forty, or more, of Haydn and Mozart taken from the shelf and aired; those who mourn that such splendid things as they have heard once or twice from Schubert, Mendelssohn, &c., cannot be heard every winter; those who are eager to give "young Germany" a chance; those who are curious to hear and recognize clever young efforts from all quarters, foreign and domestic;—in short the thousand-and-one tastes, and whims, and preferences which must exist about all such matters?

2. What then does it all point to? To the most economical use of opportunities so few. It would be very narrow to insist on always having the three or four very greatest, if we had opportunity for these and many more besides. But when our opportunities are only six in a whole winter, can we afford to give up one of them to the trial of a work which may gratify curiosity, but puts forth only the claim of cleverness and not of genius,—a work creditable to a young author, but taking no deep hold on any one? Can we for correctness, elegance, and so forth, dispense with real inspiration? We must conclude that every one of six such precious chances ought to be secured to some great work of a great master.

3. And here we recognize the soundness of "X's" position in his last communication. We are not a musically cultivated people, like the Germans. If we were, our very familiarity with the existing treasures of the Symphonic Art would make us curious to hear new efforts, and at the same time fit to judge of them, and safe from injury to our own taste in the hearing of them. But it is not so with us. Our musical taste, as a community, is yet to be formed; it is all-important that we form it upon contemplation of the best models, that we go to real works of genius, so that we may feel the real worth of music, feel it and receive it deeply, and know the difference between true Art and idle fashion or mechanical, ambitious manufacture. If you look into the further recess of the sculpture gallery in the Athenæum, you may see at one glance what Art is and what it is not, by comparing the "Day and Night" of Michael Angelo, with that monstrous snow-image-like abortion of an American "Backwoodsman," in which marble seems to try to look like plaster. There they are; with both before you, you are safe; the true puts out the false. But suppose our only gallery contained only such "Backwoodsmen," or gentler subjects treated feebly or falsely by mediocre talent, such as always finds its circle of admirers:—what would be the influence upon the public taste? Suppose you had not room for both, should it not be Michel Angelo in preference to the specimen of new or native talent? Suppose the Phidian Jove, the Apollo, the Diana, the Laocöon, the Venus of Milo, &c., were kept out of sight, all but two or three of that great rank, to make room for larger hospitality to interesting first attempts, it may be horrible abortions, on the strength of local or personal considerations, or theoretic encouragement to rising talent and faith in the future—would that be true economy of our small means of such æsthetic culture?

4. "Diminished Seventh" is entirely right in wishing the horizon of our musical experience extended; as also in the idea that we know the great familiar models better, after listening to the best attempts of secondary talent. We all join in lamenting the few chances which young composers have of getting their larger works brought fairly or at all before the public. But the encouragement of young productive talent, important a matter as it is, is not to be confounded with the objects of the one only series of concerts in community, in which that community may learn what of truest, greatest, most immortal has been accomplished in the Art of Music.

CONCERTS.

THE GERMAN TRIO.—The second concert of Messrs. GARTNER, HAUSE and JUNGNIKE, took place at Chickering's on Friday evening last week. The vocalist of the evening was Mrs. J. H. LONG. We were not able to be present, but record the following programme:

- PART I.
1. Grand Sonata in A minor Op. 47, for Piano and Violin.....Beethoven.
PART II.
2. Cavatina, Beitly se cru dele.....Donizetti.
3. Souvenir de Spa Fantaisie, for Violoncello.....F. Servais.
4. Grand Duo (Concertant,) for Piano and Violin.....Wolf and D'Beriot.
5. Two Songs.....C. Gartner.
PART III.
6. Trio C minor, Op. 1. No. 8 for Piano, Violin, and Violoncello.....Beethoven.

GRAND UNION CONCERT.—The performance of HANDEL'S "Messiah," last Saturday evening, by the MUSICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY, swelled by volunteers from the HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY to a chorus of perhaps two hundred and fifty voices, appeared to indicate the fact that six performances (by various bodies) of that oratorio within a month, were at least one too many. With fair weather the Music Hall was far from full. It was too late to borrow any interest from Christmas, while for the many some less familiar work (none could be greater) would have been more inviting. No other oratorio, or musical work whatever has attained to an anniversary place in the great social festival of Christmas; and any work which enjoys that prerogative, that certainty of being never suffered to become forgotten, should not, at all events need not, be brought out very often in the intervals. Yet doubtless a Saturday evening gave many a chance to hear the sublime work, who are debarred from it on Sunday evenings; more than one clergyman we noticed from the neighboring towns, listening with a fresh enthusiasm, which it was pleasant to behold.

The performance was on the whole a very good one. The choruses were generally sung correctly and with spirit. A certain hardness, however, a want of round and mellow ensemble of tone seemed to distinguish their effect from that of the last performances in that hall. Yet the body of soprani was richer, fuller, fresher than in the Handel and Haydn chorus. The "Hallelujah" and the "Wonderful" went finely. The orchestra was select but small. Mr. ARTHURSON appeared to sing with a good deal of effort, in Comfort ye and Every Valley, he succeeded in producing a true and artistic utterance of the music, and in passages some of his best tones. A recitative and air like Thy Rebuke and Behold and see, it is always good to hear from one in whom so much true taste and feeling make up for any deficiencies of voice. The best of voices, in its best estate, without those more interior excellencies, would but affect us painfully in such a song. The singer had to be excused from the stronger effort demanded by the air: Thou shalt dash them. Mr. MOZART sang the bass solos of the first part with a firm and solid voice and accurate reading, but rather mechanically and with a painful setting apart of the notes, staccato-wise, in the roudade passages. Nothing but a certain ease and elasticity, only acquired by thorough vocal culture, can save those old mannerisms of melody from drowsiness. Mr. PRATT, who sang the bass songs of the last part, (Why do the nations rage, and The trumpet shall sound), acquitted himself very creditably, doing all loyally, with conscientious care; yet his tones come out of too uniform a calibre, not modulated and shaded so as to give life and grace to the whole melody.

Mrs. LONG's voice was more beautiful than ever in the annunciation: There were Shepherds; the high tones had a crystal clearness, and this time she failed not once in intonation. In Rejoice greatly, and I know that my Redeemer, she still improves; but there is still too much evident hard work for her in the rapturous roudades of the former, and room for greater depths of spiritual expression in the latter. Who but the most lark-like and the most saint-like of great singers is fully equal to those two songs? Mrs. Long wins more and more respect by her earnest and successful study of such music. Mrs. WENTWORTH sang, Come unto Him, and But thou didst not leave, with her usual purity and carefulness of style; a favorite always. Miss TWITCHELL's deep and full contralto, and simple, reverential manner, told with true effect in He was despised; greater freedom of utterance, greater flexibility, and a less sombre character of tone are needed to make O thou that tellest as declamatory and impressive as it should be.

We presume the performances of the "Messiah" for this winter are over, and we now look forward to the Education Society for "Jephtha," to the Mendelssohn Choral for "St. Paul," and to the Handel and Haydn for the "Creation."

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—We entered Chickering's in the latter part of the fifth Concert, on Tuesday evening, to find the room overflowing into the ante-room. By far the largest Chamber audience of the season, and most eager listeners besides. The programme was a choice one.

PART I.

1. Quartet in E flat, No. 4, Mozart.
Adagio—Andante—Minuetto—Finale, Allegro.
2. Trio in C minor, No. 1, op. 1, Beethoven.
Allegro—Andante—Scherzo—Finale, Allegro.
Messrs. Trenkle, Meisel & W. Fries.
3. Quartet in E flat, No. 3, op. 44, Mendelssohn.
Adagio and Scherzo.
4. Elegie, No. 1, op. 8, for Clarinet, Ryan.
Thomas Ryan.
5. "Kreutzer Sonata" in A, op. 47, for Piano and Violin, Beethoven.
Introduction and Allegro—Andante and Variations—Finale, Presto.
Messrs. Trenkle & Fries.

We were sorry to lose this chance of renewing acquaintance with that model Quartet (of which we have in past years said so much) by MOZART; and also with that early Trio, full of young Herculean strength, of BEETHOVEN. Mr. RYAN's Elegie, of which we heard not the beginning, seemed a composition full of graceful, tender melody, well suited to the clarinet, and delicately set off by a quartet accompaniment of strings which showed not a little refinement of harmony. The only question was whether the piece was not prolonged a little farther than its inspiration warranted;—always the tendency with these free compositions of a sentimental order. It was of course beautifully played.

The old "Kreutzer Sonata" alone was enough to reward one for a long walk to Chickering's. It is some years since it has been played here in public. Its passionate Allegro, leaping with fiery impatience from the brooding, dark soliloquy of the slow violin introduction, and wrestling Prometheus-like with Fate; its solemn, large, profoundly religious Andante, with the admirable variations, each a new inspiration from the theme; and the bright and playful Presto Finale, are each perfect in its way, and exceedingly characteristic of BEETHOVEN. Mr. TRENKLE played the piano-forte part with masterly precision, clearness and effect, and without any virtuoso affectations. The commencement however betrayed a little stiffness of timidity. He is one of our best pianists. Mr. FRIES's violin left little to be desired.

Chit-Chat.

Attractions, which never failed before, will fail to-night, if there be not a large audience at the Fifth ORCHESTRAL CONCERT. Look at the programme on our last page. The old C minor Symphony is a grand conciliator of all opinions; old and young, ultra-classical and ultra-modern, Haydnites and Schumann-ites,—all own the inspiration of Beethoven's Fifth, and to Boston it is dear as the memory of first love. The Septuor, by the same master, the Oberon and "Siege of Corinth" Overtures, the ever-fascinating Nocturno from the "Midsummer Night's Dream," the solo by WULF FRIES, and two choice songs from Mozart and Haydn, sung by Mrs. WENTWORTH, offer an agreeable variety.

On Monday night begins the Opera, and for some weeks LAGRANGE, and DIDIEE, and HENSLEY, BRIGNOLI, SALVIANI, and MORELLI will be the talk, eclipsing oratorio and concert. The auditorium of the Boston Theatre will doubtless present a brilliant array; but we wonder at the policy of not announcing the piece for the opening night in better season. On their return flight from Baltimore and Philadelphia, the troupe favored New York again last evening with Don Juan.

The Annual Meeting of the HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION, (a society composed mainly, but not wholly, of graduates of Harvard, and meriting a fuller notice than we have room for now,) took place at the Revere House on Monday evening. The business was followed by a pleasant supper, of a most aesthetic character, of which not a few distinguished literary and artistic gentlemen partook, and toasts, short speeches, music, vocal and instrumental, stories, &c., prolonged the feast into the short hours. . . . Mlle. DE LAMOTTE, the very successful teacher of the Piano in classes, announces, it will be seen, the commencement of a new class.

Correspondence.

NEW YORK, JAN'y 15.—On Saturday last the second PHILHARMONIC concert took place, attracting, if possible, a still greater crowd than the first. The performance, on the whole, was very satisfactory. GADE's beautiful "Ossianic" Symphony (I can find no better term to characterize it), was well rendered, particularly the last two movements—that loveliest of Adagios and the Finale, with its strange, wierd chief theme. The novelty of the evening was BERLIOZ's overture to Les francs Juges; one of his earlier works. Opinions vary considerably with regard to this composition, hitherto unknown to us, but I cannot agree with those who were highly pleased with it, and thought it the best part of the concert. I did not like it by any means as well as the overture to "King Lear," by the same composer, which we heard some years ago. It did not interest me at all, although there are many fine points in it. The instrumentation is at times very powerful and effective, and one melody is quite pretty and pleasing, but commonplace. I am not enough of a musician to dissect and analyze such a work on a slight acquaintance; suffice it to say that I could not like it, though I tried my best to do so. BADIALLI, the good-natured, the conscientious, the earnest artist, was hailed with tremendous applause. He is very popular with our public, and justly so, indeed. His voice is wonderful, seemingly not in the least impaired by years, (of which he is said to have nearly reached his full measure of three score and ten), and is as powerful, as firm, and as much under his control as ever. His style is so perfect too, that one can almost forget the unsatisfactory music which he only too often sings. He gave us the other night two arias, by MERCADANTE and VERDI, in both of which he was rapturously encored. Mr. SCHMITZ played a Concertino by WEBER on the French horn, which is, itself, a beautiful instrument, reminding one, in its sound, of purple velvet, but which is much better adapted to the slow, massive, long drawn out notes, than to rapid variations and fiourture. The programme said that "in this piece the composer had succeeded in producing the effect of full chords on the instrument;" but I must own that this effect was rather ludicrous than anything else; not at all repaying either performer or listeners for the evident difficulty of producing it. WEBER's gushing, joyous overture to Euryanthe, with its stately fugue, so wondrously wrought up, closed the concert, and was played with a great deal of spirit, but only heard by half of the audience. Shame on the other half!

INAUGURATION OF THE STATUE —OF— BEETHOVEN.

THE Directors of the BOSTON MUSIC HALL with the cooperation of the Committee of the Orchestral Concerts, propose to celebrate the placing of CRAWFORD'S BRONZE STATUE OF BEETHOVEN in the MUSIC HALL, by a GRAND FESTIVAL to take place on SATURDAY, March 2d, 1856.

The Festival will open with a Poetical Prologue, written and recited by WM. W. STOUT, Esq. The Prologue ended, the Programme will be as nearly as possible the following:

Overture to Egmont—Grand Aria from Fidelio—Fantasia for Piano, Chorus and Orchestra—Adelaide song—First movement of Violin Concerto—and the CHORAL SYMPHONY.

As the Festival is consecrated to the memory of the greatest of Composers, and as it is the first time that a Statue of a great artist has been erected in America, the Committee hope there will be shown among the members of the musical profession a desire to assist in the said celebration, and will gratefully receive any proposition from individual artists to that effect. In behalf of the Committee,
CHARLES C. PERKINS, Chairman.

L'ART DU CHANT APPLIQUÉ AU PIANO. BY S. THALBERG.

As the Piano, properly speaking, cannot render that which is most perfect in the beautiful art of Singing, namely, the faculty of prolonging sounds, we must overcome this imperfection with address and skill, and be able, not only to simulate sustained and prolonged notes, but to swell them also.
 Emotion renders us ingenious, and the necessity of expressing what we feel creates for us resources which never occur to the mechanical performer.

With this fact in view, the distinguished THALBERG has in this work, in which he applies the art of singing to the Piano Forte, selected transcriptions from those masterpieces of the great composers, both ancient and modern, which are most particularly valuable in their effects, and adopted a simple form as the most appropriate for true transcriptions, in order that they may be within the comprehension and executive ability of young pianists, tolerably advanced. The prominent feature of these transcriptions is the singing part, the melody, to which particular attention is given, holding to that fruitful thought of a great writer, that it is Melody and not Harmony, which lives on triumphantly through the lapse of centuries.

The work is prefaced with a series of general rules in the art of singing well, to which we would direct the special attention of all those who would aspire not only to the name, but the nature of a good performer.

The following is a list of the transcriptions:

1. QUATUOR de l'Opera I Puritani, de BELLINI.
2. TRE GIORNI, Air de PAROLELLI.
3. ADELAIDE, de BEETHOVEN.
4. AIR D'EGLISE du celebre Chanteur STRADELLA.
5. LACHRYMOSA tiré de Requiem de MOZART.
6. DUO de Noces de Figaro, Opera de MOZART.
7. PERCHE MI GUARDI E PIANGI, Duetto de Zelmira, de ROSSINI.

Giuramento, de MERCADANTE.

Opera II Crociato, de MEYERBER.

NEW COURSE OF HARMONY, BY L. H. SOUTHARD.

The Publishers call the attention of the musical profession to this work, as one eminently calculated to lighten the labors of the teacher, and rapidly advance the pupil. It is emphatically a PRACTICAL work, serving both as a Manual of instruction on the one hand, and a Text-book on the other; and it is believed that the peculiar arrangement of the work, together with the very large number of exercises and examples, presents great advantages, to both scholar and teacher, over any similar work of the kind. Teachers highly commend the work. Mr.
 WILLIAM MASON says it is a work unsurpassed in the language.
 Mr. GEORGE J. WEBB says that it is a work perspicuous in diction, methodical in arrangement, and sufficiently copious to embrace all the essentials of the general doctrine of accord.

Signor Masoni.

FROM THE PRIVATE PAPERS OF THE LATE MR. BROWN.

(A FANTASY PIECE.)

[Copyright secured according to law.]

(Concluded from p. 116)

Within a month after his arrival in Paris he had met his old master and the family several times, and had passed one or two evenings at their hotel. One evening—the date he remembered as being associated with the events of 1848, it was Feb. 28th—he met the Masons at an evening party, to which he had accepted an invitation only upon the usual terms. He had had more conversation than on any former occasion with Miss Sarah, during which something in her manner told him that under all her politeness was still a feeling of superiority to one whose extraction and previous life were so veiled in mystery. While carrying on a lively chat with another young lady, who was evidently proud of her companion, his thoughts were occupied with this, and a feeling of mortification disturbed him.

"I do wish you would ask him to play," said a young lady's voice at a little distance.

"My dear young lady," said the master of the house, "the Signor is invited here as a friend, not as an artist. You know his aversion to playing in mixed companies, and it would be an outrage on delicacy for me to request him to pay for his evening's entertainment, in music! You must indeed excuse me."

"But Bell Hastings has been telling us how splendidly he played at their house, Wednesday evening, and I am dying to hear him," returned the young lady.

"That is a mere American exaggeration," said Mr. B., "for I certainly never saw you look so charmingly. Happy for me that I am a grave and reverend Signior!"

"Oh dear! oh dear!" said the voice; "what a provoking man you are, with your delicacy! I say, Miss Mason, Miss Sarah Mason, I mean," continued the young lady after a moment's pause, "you ask him. I know he can't refuse you, with your great, grand, winning way."

"We will see as to that, thought I," said Masoni, as he described the scene. "I closed the conversation with my chatty neighbor, by some commonplace gallantry, and sauntered away to the piano-forte in the next room, where some of the more musical were collected, and accepted the invitation to play a Polonaise by Chopin. When I closed, Miss Mason was standing near me; oh, how beautiful she looked, with her noble face showing her interest in and appreciation of the music!"

"If Signor Masoni can play the difficult music of Chopin so exquisitely, how superb must be that violin playing which renders his accomplishments upon the piano-forte quite forgotten and unnoticed," said she.

"I bowed my thanks for the compliment."

"Could not the Signor be induced to break through his rule, and gratify his numerous friends who have never heard him, by giving them the means of judging for themselves how much he excels our other famous virtuosos?" continued she.

"May I adopt what I am told is an American habit, though why I do not know, and reply to Miss Mason's question by asking another? I am told that Miss Mason is a remarkable performer upon this instrument. Please cast your eye upon the company in this suite of rooms, and say whether you would like to make an exhibition of your art in this promiscuous assembly?"

"But you are an artist." Instantly sensible that she had made a false step, she added, "you are a man."

"True; and because I am a man, and, I venture to say, an artist from my inmost soul, and because the tones of my violin are the language of that soul, I shrink from holding up any acquirements I may have made, as a mere subject of wonder and astonishment to people who cannot comprehend the language in which I thus speak."

"But I hear of your playing in the large and frivolous assemblies of the head salons."

"True again, I do so. I do it, too, for money. But those are circles in which I neither have, nor wish to have, a social position. I go thither, perform my part in the programme, and seek in other society that intellectual enjoyment which the man and not the virtuoso craves."

"But—"

"Excuse me a moment longer, Miss Mason. I fear you do not view this matter in its true light. I am a devout admirer of the noble literature of your country, and some of its greatest names in science and letters are familiar to me. I find that they, almost without exception, are in the habit of lecturing in seminaries of learning, or in public promiscuous assemblies, for money. But could you, on this account, in such an assembly as this, request Longfellow the Poet, Emerson the Essayist, or Whitney the Geologist, to mount a temporary rostrum, and give us a specimen of their powers?"

"Certainly not." And with a cold, distant, and queen-like bow she left me.

"The next week I received an invitation to a house, whose head was a man of fine musical taste, and which was one of the few where I had consented to break through my rule. My instinct told me that she had had the selection of the company, for there was not an unmusical person in the room, and that it was in fact her party collected at Mr. W.'s house, in order to give her an opportunity to invite me to play, which she could not do at home, without a decided breach of good manners.

"After a delightful hour of general social intercourse in the small and select circle present, Miss Mason came to me as I was conversing with Mr. W., and at the first pause addressed me:

"Signor Masoni, I wish in the presence of our host to ask your pardon for the undervaluation of you as a man, and as an artist, implied in my request the other evening for you to play; I have thought much of what you said, and feel fully how strong in the right you were. You see who the people here this evening are, and I think you cannot refuse to join me, in the endeavor to afford them a pleasure, which I hope they may not soon be able to forget."

"Oh, Brown, with what a smile was that said! I was recognized by her as her equal to the fullest extent."

"Why, Masoni," said I; "Talleyrand or Van Buren could not have shown greater tact!"

"I know nothing as to that, my demeanor towards her was instinctive."

"Indeed, Miss Mason, before a company in which you are willing to exhibit your talents and genius, I certainly can have no scruples."

"The servant was despatched for my instrument, and in the meantime she selected from the heap of music a work which she handed me for my approval.

"It was Beethoven's 'Kreutzer Sonata.'"

"We played it. She did play like an angel. I never played that piece so before."

The long story of Masoni's gradually growing intimacy with the young lady I pass over. It is the old tale. He had never intimately known any young, beautiful and accomplished woman, and he soon began to live only during the hours when he was by her piano-forte. His incognito was perfect. Old Peter, from whom he feared recognition, if from any one, was as humble and obsequious to the great Signor, the violinist who made his pockets richer by many a franc, as to any of the gentlemen who visited at the house. His passion increased almost to delirium. He forgot me, he forgot everything else.

Did she in any degree return his feelings? He felt that he possessed a strong influence over her. She certainly loved the artist,—did she care for the man?

Let it not be supposed that he ever dared to speak, or in any manner hint, to Miss Mason of the fire which was consuming him. There was that in her manner—ever cordial, kind, polite as it was to him, haughty, proud, and even arrogant as he saw her to others, the plantation girl still—which prevented this. He believed himself becoming as necessary to her as she was to him. He fancied he could read all he wished in the expression of her eyes, and in the effect of his playing upon her, and yet there was a certain coldness in the tones of her voice when conversing with him, a certain repelling element strangely infused into her cordiality and politeness, which crushed every hope.

Hope! What did he hope? He could not say. He did not know. He thought only of the present moment. The future was a thick darkness, at which he shuddered, but into which he did not seek to penetrate.

Summer came on apace, and the Masons began to talk of a tour in Scotland. Why, as the time approached for their departure, did such a change take place in Miss Sarah? Whence that increasing air of constraint in her intercourse with Masoni? Whence that occasional uncertainty in her performance? that growing preference for the darker and more sad productions of Beethoven? Whence that half melancholy, dreamy mood in which she would sit listening to Masoni's extemporizations? She conversed with him less and less, but when she did speak, the tones of her voice were tenderer, and the repelling influence grew ever weaker. Still he dared not speak—she gave no hint upon which he might speak.

"Three weeks ago," Masoni went on, "I was preparing to go out in the forenoon as usual, when a carriage stopped before the house. It was the Masons' coach, and a moment after old Peter came stumbling up to my door.

"Massa and Misses' compliments to the Signor, and would be berry happy to know if he has any engagement dis forenoon.

"No, Peter, why?"

"In datcase, here is a note for Massa Signor."

"Here is the note, Brown:

"Miss Mason's compliments to Signor Masoni. The rest of the family have gone out for a few hours' ride, and she would be happy to continue her musical studies with the Signor in the meantime, if it be consistent with his other engagements.

Paris, June 20th."

"There is no occasion for that look, Brown,—there is nothing uncommon in the note—she chose to practise when the house was still, and her parents and sister chose to take their drives without her, so that such notes came every week. I have saved this as a relic, for it was the last.

"Our music would not go. We turned from Mozart to Beethoven—from the sonatas to the romances, in vain. Even of the 'Kreutzer Sonata' we could make nothing. Her fingers at length left the keys—mine did but mechanically rest upon the strings. We sat long without a word. A flood of joy, an ocean of happiness, too great for speech, overwhelmed me. I felt that all I could ask was mine. All thought of, every consideration in regard to the difference in our positions had been for weeks obliterated. It was as if the world contained but two beings, and we made for each other. And now at this moment, when the gate of Paradise was opened, it was the horrible face of my bosom demon that looked upon me. Ho! ho! pretty well for a nigger!

"I seemed actually to hear the old mockery. I started and turned round to see if any one was there who had uttered the words. I was, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, crushed to the earth. Without the warning of this imaginary (real?) voice, I really believe that in the delirium of my joy I should have broken the silence by speaking of the whirlwind of passion which was sweeping me before it—and—that that it would have been well received. But now I saw in all its fearful extent the awful gulf that separated us. Did I read her heart aright, she could never join her fate to mine until the mystery which surrounded me was cleared up,—and what hope had I if that secret was disclosed!

"If I had spoken!

"Yet, I fully believe she awaited and expected it. I could see the effort it cost her, at length, still without turning to me—for she had sat all this time at the piano—to say scarce audibly: 'Play, Signor, I shall not hear you many times more!'

"It was almost impossible, but I obeyed. My feeling soon began to find expression in the tones of my instrument, in all their horror and despair. I never played so before—I never shall again. I did not play—it was the demon, and the drops stood upon my cold forehead as I heard the tones. That proud, strong nature at length gave way entirely, and, bowing her head, she wept like a child. I paused. With an effort that agitated her whole frame, she recovered her dignity and composure, and made some slight remark, which told me in its tones that the crisis was past, and had passed unimproved—that, were I other than I was, the shock to her haughty nature was one not easily to be forgotten. After some minutes again of silence, during which she fully resumed her self-composure, she turned towards me, and said in a calm voice—it is all engraved upon my memory 'as with an iron pen and lead in the rock forever'—'There is something in your music to-day, which I used to hear when I was a girl.'

"I bowed, I could not speak.

"Oh ho!" whispered the demon, 'give her the old plantation music, and see if she will recognize it.'

"Let the psychologist explain why and how that allusion to my boyhood for the moment changed the whole current of my feelings—converted for the instant all my love, my despair, into some demoniac feeling of hatred to the beautiful and injured being before me. I saw in her only the young girl who had crushed me, like a nauseous insect, years before—and I did play the old plantation music. I had played but a few moments with my eyes fixed upon hers—I have no doubt filled with the lurid light of the sea of fire within me—and her eyes fastened to mine as if fascinated by a serpent, when an expression of scorn, mingled with humbled pride, hopeless love, outraged womanhood, each triumphing in turn, shot into every feature of her face, and filled all her figure with an indescribable majesty, as she rose, and, white as the driven snow, trembling in every limb, just gasped out—

"Who are you?"

"Miss Mason, the scars of the brutal flogging once given to the violinist, whom you used to hear when you were a girl, are upon my back, and they smart yet!

"Such a shriek!

"The French servants, who hastened into the room, bore away their senseless mistress, and I went home with the pangs of Erebus in my bosom, but my demon in triumph.

"That evening a note informed me that the visits of Signor Masoni could no longer be received at the house of Mr. Mason.

"Of course not, and yet before a week had passed I was ringing at the door. I could not refrain. Peter came. The moment he saw me he assumed all the dignity of an old Roman, and, not waiting for me to speak, said,—'Berry sorry to be so imperlite, but Signor Masoni's visits isn't agreeable to the family.'

"But, Peter, for heaven's sake, how is Miss Sarah?"

"'Berry sorry to be so imperlite, I say, but I must not have no sort of communication with Signor Masoni. Massa's orders is positive.'

"Oh Peter, don't you recognize me? Have you forgotten Dick the plantation fiddler? Do tell me whether Missis is living or dead, and I will never trouble you again. The truth flashed upon Peter's mind, and my Medusa face, as it must have almost been, seemed to turn him into stone. Strange that at that moment I could feel the ridiculous! But the oddity of his bewilderment and the comicality of its external signs, excited a smile—the feeling which caused it merely floating upon the resistless torrent of my woe, like a bubble upon the mighty flood of Niagara. His words, when he did speak, are ringing in my ears yet.

"Young Missis is dying,' and then, after a long look at me, I heard him utter to himself: 'Looks just like his father.'

"My father! my father!—who was he?"

"Old Massa!"

Thus closes the manuscript of my late friend. In looking over the daily records of personal events, however, I have found the following entries in relation to the two principal persons of this history.

June 20th, 1851.—In the Parisian correspondence (June 2) of the New York —, a paper which owes its circulation mainly to the scandalous matter with which it fills its columns, I find to-day the following execrable paragraph:—"Among the Americans here are Mr. M—— and family, on their way home from Italy. The proud and beautiful daughter, who created such a sensation here last winter, is but the wreck of what she was. There is a story hinted about of some strange affair with one of her father's niggers."

By heavens! If Masoni sees that, I would not give a dime for the lives of either that rascally correspondent, or the scoundrelly editor.

Aug. 6th, 1852.—Oh, why am I chained here to this bed of sickness! For among my letters to-day is one from Wilkins, now in New York, in which this passage occurs:

"Think of it; Masoni has turned up in this city! But he has sunk down, down, down, until he is just keeping soul and body together playing the violin, and drowning memory with liquors in the lowest dance houses! Poor fellow!"

Poor fellow! Poor fellow!

XII.

After dinner, I generally smoked a cigar with ROSSINI. For some little time, he has cultivated the noble art of smoking, having been compelled, on account of his health, to give up taking snuff, a practice of which he was most passionately fond. As he one evening offered me a regalia, with a magnanimity repeated every day, he observed:

"These cigars were first made for FERDINAND VII., after whom they are named."

"The King was a man of delicate taste," I replied, luxuriously drawing from the cigar a thick cloud of smoke.

"He used to smoke all day long," said Rossini. "On the occasion of my making a short trip to Madrid with Aguado, I had the honor of being presented to him. He was smoking, when he received me, in the presence of the Queen. His exterior was not extraordinarily attractive, or even clean. After the interchange of a few phrases, he offered me, in a most friendly manner, a cigar already smoked away, but I declined with a bow, and did not accept it. 'You are wrong to refuse,' said Maria Christina, in a low voice, and good Neapolitan; 'It is a mark of favor that does not fall to every body's lot.' 'Your majesty,' I replied, in the same manner, (I had known her formerly in Naples) 'in the first place, I do not smoke, and in the second, I would not, under the circumstances, answer for the result.' The Queen laughed, and my audacity was attended with no evil consequences."

"It was, at any rate, a mark of favor that had its drawbacks," I observed.

"The freer from any drawback was the condescension evinced towards me by Don FRANCISCO, the king's brother," continued Rossini. "Maria Christina had already given me to understand that I should find in him an ardent admirer, and recommended me to go to him, immediately after my audience with the king. I find him playing, and with only his wife; I believe that one of my operas was lying open on the table. After a short conversation, Don Francisco turned towards me, in the most friendly manner, and said he had to beg a particular favor of me. 'Allow me,' he said, 'to sing the air of Assur to you, only dramatically.' Rather astonished, I sat down to accompany him on the piano, and was not quite sure what he meant, when he proceeded to the other end of the room, struck a theatrical attitude, and then to the great amusement of his wife, began to sing the air, with all kinds of movements and gestures. I must confess I never witnessed anything like it."

"How you are to be envied, maestro!" I exclaimed. "Not only did you have Pasta and Malibran, but even a descendant of Henry IV. to interpret your works. But this excursion of yours to Madrid was the cause of your composing your Stabat Mater, was it not?"

"I composed it for an ecclesiastic, a friend of Aguado's," replied Rossini. "I did so merely from a wish to oblige, and should never have thought of making it public. Strictly speaking, it is even treated only mezzo serio, and, in the first instance, I got Tadolini to compose three pieces, as I was ill, and should not have been ready in time. The great celebrity of the Stabat Mater by Pergolese would have been alone sufficient to prevent my setting the same text to music for public performance."

"Do you think so highly of Pergolese's Stabat Mater, then?" I inquired. "It is true that I never heard it performed, but on looking through it, I found I was more pleased with certain details than with the work as a whole."

"I once had it performed in Naples, and it produced an admirable impression," said Rossini. "But there must be two good voices; they must sing it well, and even elevate, by nobleness of expression, certain antiquated passages. The original simple instrumentation must be retained too. Lately, it was given by large choruses, and with modern instrumentation, somewhere or other, but where I do not know—that is a very great mistake."

"It always appeared to me," said I, "that Pergolese enjoyed a celebrity which was rather exaggerated. He died young, it is true. There are plenty of persons, too, who confound him with Palestrina, and who know as little of the one as of the other. Is there anything in the Serva Padrone, so often mentioned?"

"O, yes," replied Rossini, singing me a number of motives out of that old opera, without entering into any further explanations.

"There is a certain amount of sensitiveness in Pergolese's compositions, I must allow," I resumed; "and I must say that, the more I advance in years, the more I incline to what is simple and expressive. This is a remarkable fact!"

"Not at all remarkable," replied the maestro; "the feeling will grow on you more and more."

"Youth should properly be the season for sensations of this description," I replied.

"In youth," said Rossini, "we like and do a great deal, because it appears new and unusual. But the heart is developed in domestic life, and in love of children, in more mature years—you will find I am right."

"I am quite willing to believe it, my dear maestro!" said I. "The great influence that our mode of life, and those by whom we are surrounded, exerts upon us, even as artists, will be denied by no one."

"I, at least," said Rossini, "was always dependent, in the highest degree, upon external influences. The different cities in which I wrote, excited me in different ways; I adapted myself, also, to the peculiar tastes which predominated among the audiences of this or that place. For instance, in Venice they could never have enough of my crescendo, and I, therefore, scattered it about, although I myself was tired of it. In Naples, I was able to lay it one side; the people there did not even like it."

"Have you been present, as a calm spectator, ta many representations of your works?" I inquired of the maestro.

"Behind the scenes, I have been so often enough, but never in the front of the house," replied Rossini.

"Never!" I exclaimed.

"I had a lesson in this particular, which spoilt my taste for it," answered Rossini. "One evening, I was invited, in Milan, to go to a friend's house, to a 'Risotto.' It was rather too early, and, as we passed the Scala, where my Pietra di Paragone was being performed, my host dragged me, almost in spite of myself, into the pit. A trio—one of the best pieces of the opera—was just being sung; but my neighbors, far from being edified by it, amused themselves by abusing me and my music in the most atrocious manner, not giving me credit for a single redeeming point. I did not feel any inclination to receive any further lessons of this description, for, in such cases, you may take the part of any one, yourself excepted."

"This Pietra di Paragone has played rather an important part in your life, then, for, if I am not mistaken, you are indebted to it for your exemption from the conscription," said I.

"Certainly, I was singled out to be a soldier, and there was no possibility of getting off, as I was the proprietor of a house. But what a proprietor! My castle brought me in forty lire annually. But the success of the opera rendered the general, commanding in Milan, favorably inclined towards me—he applied in my behalf to King Eugene, who was absent at the time, and I was left to a more peaceable occupation."

"But one which is, perhaps, not less wearing," said I.

"A fiasco is not a cannon ball," replied the maestro, "and there are plenty of people who grow old at the business."

Opera in New York.

[CONCLUDING EXTRACTS FROM MR. FRY.]

Having shown the value of the efforts of the stockholders of the Academy of Music in the cause of Art, as exhibited in the erection of that building, let us inquire how they have fostered it since, and in what degree they aid the manager. An Academy of Music, a great national school of lyrical Art, such as that purports to be, should be furnished or equipped with a stock of scenery, a wardrobe and a musical library sufficient for the performance of all standard works, without taxing the manager's pocket for their procurement. From $50,000 to $100,000 ought properly to have been invested in this manner, and the manager only required to pay interest and wear and tear. But the Academy opened with a stock of twelve scenes, sufficient only for the performance of two or three operas; this we believe has been the sum total of the contributions of the proprietors toward supplying its scenic and academic needs. A rent of $24,000 per annum is the modest sum asked from a manager who is expected to give performances on about one night in three or four, taking the year through, and beside, the stockholders claim admission free to 200 of the best seats at every performance. Last year the performances amounted to about 100 at an average of $1 50 admission, making the additional rent $30,000, or the total at least $54,000 a year, for a building which cost $335,000. We should imagine that getting 16 to 17 per cent for their money is not supporting the Opera at any great damage to the stockholders' pockets.

At the commencement of the last season there appeared in a journal which devotes much attention to musical affairs, The Courier and Enquirer, an article upon Mr. Paine's plan of management and prospects, containing a statement of the names and qualifications of his artists, their salaries, a list of all other weekly and monthly expenses, &c. The object of the article was to make it appear that the Italian Opera was not, never had been, and never would be supported by the people; that whenever offered at cheap prices, it had failed; that Mr. Paine's expenses would be $21,330 a month, exclusive of rent, interest and insurance; and that his determination to advance the price of admission to $2 was not only justified, but laudable. We find, nevertheless, that before the season was over, Mr. Paine deemed it necessary to reduce the prices one-fourth and one-half, thereby acknowledging that the people had something to do with it, and seeking at the eleventh hour to enlist their sympathies.

According to these statistical details of The Courier and Enquirer, the monthly expenses of the Opera at the Academy have been $21,330, exclusive of rent. There have been three performances a week, or thirteen a month. This gives a nightly expense of $1,641, beside rent. As we have before shown, there were about 100 performances last year, and the rent was $54,000, or an average of $540 a night; which, added to the $1,641, gives the expense of Mr. Paine's season as $2,181 a night.

Having now shown what Italian Opera costs as performed upon one third of the acting nights of the year, in a house devoted exclusively to it, by a company engaged by the week or month for short seasons, let us examine what it would cost given in conjunction with English Opera or other not more expensive entertainments, such as ballet and Ravel-like pantomime, in the same house, open, theatre fashion, every acting night; and if we show that 313 performances could thus in a year be afforded, including 150 of Italian Opera, in a style equal to that in which it is now presented—the whole 313 performances costing little more than the 100 are now said to cost—ask why Italian Opera may not in that manner be really established and find its support from the much-abused "mass of the people," by offering it to them at prices of admission within their means.

How this might be accomplished we will attempt to show. We are not sure that any Italian Opera manager has taken up the business here as a merchant enters upon one of equal magnitude, investing a sufficiently large capital, laying out plans for business years ahead, and making provision for possible losses as well as probable profits. On the contrary the Opera has been expected to pay its way month by month, or explode periodically. A manager to form a company perfectly should pass a year in Europe, travelling about to hear artists on the stage, and to make engagements, commencing when existing contracts should expire. This is the way in which good artists might be sought out, and if engaged for a long term, say one, two or three years, secured at salaries a half or third of those now usually paid. The American manager, on the contrary, generally goes or sends his agent to Europe a few months only before the commencement of his brief season. He must make his selection from the artists at the moment unemployed, whose qualifications he must decide upon from hearing them sing with the accompaniment of a piano; because others whom he hears upon the stage in character are under engagement at the time. A theatrical manager could hardly make a good selection of a company from hearing them read seated at a table, and an opera manager cannot very well decide upon a prima donna's ability to act Norma from seeing her seated at a piano in a parlor singing Casta Diva. Yet such is the manner in which contracts are made. We are speaking now of what generally happens; of course there are exceptional cases, and American managers and their agents have frequently secured artists of rare powers at very moderate salaries.

We will suppose a manager at this moment forming a company to perform Italian and English Opera on alternate nights, at the Academy of Music, upon every acting night of the years 1857 and 1858, and with adequate capital securing the services of artists for the whole term. We believe, with good judgement, an Italian company of principal singers in every respect equal to that now engaged in Fourteenth street, and an English company equal to any that has appeared in New-York, could for that period be secured, and all other salaries and expenses, even including the $54,000 a year rent, be paid and the nightly expenses not exceed $975. For it must be remembered that, with the exception of the double set of principal singers, hardly any more people need be employed or higher salaries need be paid for six performances a week than for three. The additional expenses being only doorkeepers, ushers, policemen, supernumeraries, carpenters, gas, fuel, bill-printing, and a few insignificant items. The monthly expenses may be estimated thus:

ITALIAN COMPANY.		ENGLISH COMPANY.
One Prima Donna.....	$1,000	One Prima Donna.....	$1,000

One Comprimaria.....	300	One Second Donna.....	100

By the above estimate, based in regard to salaries of principal singers upon those which were actually paid to such artists as Bosio, Tedesco, Steffanoni, Laborde, Salvi, Benedetti, Badiali, Susini and others of equal grade, rather than the probably much reduced ones at which artists of equal ability could be secured by good management, and taking time by the forelock in the manner we have indicated, and calculated with regard to all other salaries and expenses on the most liberal scale, the monthly expenses add up $25,248, or $971 a night, 26 acting nights to the month. In the above estimate a rent is calculated at the enormous sum of $54,000 a year. But if the stockholders would be satisfied with ten per cent a year for their investment and take $33,000 rent and supply the house with $50,000 of scenery, wardrobe and music, charging 20 per cent rent for that additional, the item of $2,000 a month at the close of the above estimate would be reduced nearly one half and the nightly expenses would not exceed $870.

The receipts of the New-York theatres now amount to over $2,000 a night, six nights a week, exclusive of any receipts of opera houses or concerts. The Italian Opera expenses alone were said to be, according to the statement we have given from a cotemporary, at the rate of $25,000, about the same amount as, according to our calculation, two companies, the foreign Italian and the popular English, could be supported. The reader may judge from this of Italian Operatic chances of success, based on the continuance of the present system with high prices, in comparison with that we have indicated or attempted at very moderate ones.—Tribune, Jan. 5.

A NEW MUSICAL WONDER. The Italian journals have frequently described in terms of enthusiasm the performances of a blind Sardinian shepherd named Pico, on an instrument they call the Tibia Pastoral—to wit, a half-penny whistle of the rudest and most primitive construction, with only three holes, and its length not exceeding that of a finger; yet upon this barbarous instrument he has performed at the San Carlos and La Scala, and the Neapolitan and other papers affirm that the blind musician draws sounds as dulcet as those of the sweetest flute, and that his execution upon it is still more marvellous. The poor Italian minstrel has arrived in Paris to perform at the Italian Opera.

Diary Abroad.—No. 31.

BERLIN, DEC. 26.—Reading Chorley's "Music in Germany" with a great deal of pleasure. Here are two or three notes which occurred during its perusal.

Page 180. Frederick II. "Had an unadorned tomb in the Garrison church at Potsdam, whence Napoleon carried off his sword."

Two or three times when I have gone out to Potsdam, with parties of Americans, I have gone to the old sexton, a tall, slender man, with venerable white locks, after the key. He gives the following reasons for thinking the story of Napoleon's theft, (recorded in Murray's Handbook for Travellers) is a mistake. 1st. He opened the tomb for Napoleon, went in with him, and heard him say: "If you were living now, I should not be here," but did not see him carry off the sword;—and 2nd, no sword had lain there! Rather conclusive that!

Page 184. "Schickaneder, the Vienna buffoon manager, for whom the Zauberflöte was composed, and who wrote the incomprehensible libretto."

In an old volume of the London Musical World (or was it the Harmonicon?) I recollect reading the death of a German teacher in the University of Dublin, Ireland, who claimed to be the author of that libretto, though Schickaneder altered it to suit him. It was impressed upon my mind by the recollection that Da Ponte, of Don Juan memory, died as an Italian teacher, in New York. Nissen and the authorities all give Schickaneder as the author.

P. 188. Hoffmann's "Undine" is spoken of. The score is now in the Royal Library at Berlin, and a copyist is at work upon the overture, which the Americans in the city will present to Liebig as a New Year's gift.

P. 301. Speaking of Weber's "Euryanthe." "It is difficult to understand what freak of prudery drove the German adapters of the exquisite 'Cymbeline' of Shakspeare so utterly to transform and distort and weaken its incidents." Mr. Chorley is under the general misapprehension in this. The story of "Euryanthe" is not taken from "Cymbeline" at all, but from a manuscript in the Library at Paris, entitled "Histoire de Gerard de Nevers et de la belle et vertueuse Euryant de Savoie sa niece," of which I possess a translation, made by Frau von Chezy, and printed at Berlin in 1823. She says in her preface that this Histoire is the original of one of Boccaccio's tales, and of the "Cymbeline" of Shakspeare.

P. 302. Speaking of Helmine von Chezy: "She has been described to me as that most doleful of all things, an untidy, unhappy, unsuccessful woman of letters—a slatternly Sappho, from whom all men shrink—eager, old, warm-hearted, and (if I mistake not) fat." He gives also an anecdote of "the battered old authoress" stumbling over the benches at Vienna to see the first performance of her opera.

How much of the above description may be true, I do not know; but as she is still living in Switzerland, and is now about seventy years of age, the epithets given could hardly all have applied to her thirty-three years ago. As she was living at Dresden at the time "Euryanthe" was given in Vienna, when we consider the difficulties of travelling in 1823, we can hardly believe that she went on to that city and waited there weeks just to see a work, which she knew, if successful, Kapellmeister Weber would immediately after give in his own theatre in Dresden. The story is absurd. I have material enough to make many a page about the history of "Euryanthe."

Vol. II. Chap. 14. A long criticism upon Mozart. The whole may be comprehended in these few words: Mozart was the greatest musician that ever lived; but Bach, Handel, Gluck, and Beethoven were all greater men, and had greater ideas to express, each in his own way.

The chapter upon Beethoven, in Vol. II., I consider founded upon misapprehension, and an ignorance of his real history. Nobody can know Beethoven from the English work which bears Moscheles' name upon its title-page.

DEC. 30. Liebig gave us Haydn's "Farewell Symphony" today, and this reminds me to do what I have long intended—that is, to translate the following passage from Griesinger's "Historical Notices of Joseph Haydn:"

"In the orchestra of Prince Esterhazy were several young married men, who, in summer, when the Prince visited his castle Esterhazy, were forced to leave their wives at Eisenstadt. Contrary to his usual custom, the Prince determined one summer to remain several weeks longer at the castle. The tender husbands, exceedingly disconcerted by this, turned to Haydn and besought him to aid them in their extremity.

"The idea occurred to Haydn of writing a symphony (that known as the "Farewell Symphony") in which one instrument after the other becomes silent. This work was performed at the first opportunity in presence of the Prince, and each musician was directed to put out his light as soon as he had finished his part, to collect his music, and with his instrument under his arm, to go away. The prince and all present understood the meaning of this pantomime at once, and the next day the order followed to break up and leave Esterhazy.

"So Haydn related to me the occasion of the Farewell Symphony. The variation that Haydn had by this work moved his prince from the determination to dismiss his orchestra, and thus had again secured bread to so many men, is indeed finer, practically considered, but not historically correct."

Thus Griesinger, an old acquaintance of Haydn, drives a nail through that false coin.

DEC. 27.—I came across an interesting book today, at an Antiquarian Bookstore, and have another copy of the first edition in view. The title of this is :

Angsburg.
Gedruckt bey Johann Jacob Lotter, 1769.

It is a beautifully printed, clean copy, on good paper; and I have bought it in hopes some Library at home will want it and its mate—when I get it. It is in 4to. 268 pages, and is the father of all good works on the subject. He excuses himself for having so long delayed a second edition of a work which "already three years before was almost entirely sold," and "had become very rare," thus: "I was, namely since 1762, very little at home. The extraordinary talents with which a good God had in full measure blessed my two children, was the occasion of my journey through a great part of Germany, and of my very long residence in France, Holland, England, &c.

"I might here take opportunity to entertain the public with a history, which perhaps comes but once in a century, and which in the realm of music in such a degree of the wonderful perhaps never was for once known; I might describe particularly the wonderful genius of my son; might relate his incomprehensible swift progress in the entire round of musical science from the fifth to the thirteenth year of his age; and I could, in a matter so difficult to believe, rest upon the unanswerable witness of many of the highest European courts, of the greatest masters of music, yes, indeed upon the very testimony of envy itself," &c.

Is not that pleasant?

Speaking of Mozart (father) reminds me of a book lent me by an Antiquarian here. It is Marpur's "Critische Beyträge," a sort of musical periodical, which appeared between 1750 and 1760, and which is very highly prized by the learned musicians of Germany. It is the only copy I have found for sale in a year and a half, save a copy, in a complete collection of Marpur's works, which is now in New York. The work is in five pocket volumes, and the price is $4 (our money.) In the third volume I find this account of Leopold Mozart, an account more complete of his works than any one I know in English. This was printed in 1757, the next year after the great Mozart's birth, and brings down the father's history to the period in which it became intimately connected with that of his son. I quote from an article giving a complete list of all the court musicians and singers at that time in Salzburg—an article which would have thrown much light upon the condition of Mozart during his years in the service of the Archbishop, had his biographers had it. It appears that in 1757, Leopold Mozart was not yet raised to the rank of vice Kapellmeister, for his name in this catalogue occurs under the heading of "Court Composers." But to my translation:—

"Herr Leopold Mozart, from the Imperial city of Augsburg, is violinist and leader of the Orchestra. He composes for the church and the chamber. He was born on the 14th of the Winter-month (December), 1719, and soon after finishing his studies in 'World-wisdom' (Philosophy) and Jurisprudence, in the year 1743 entered into the service of the prince. He has made himself known in all styles of composition, though he has sent nothing to press, except six sonatas, & 8, engraved by himself, principally, however, for the sake of practising engraving. In the Hay-month (July), 1766, he published his Violin School.

"Of the compositions of Herr Mozart, which have become known in manuscript, the most noteworthy are many contrapuntal and church pieces; farther a large number of Symphonies, partly only 4, and partly for all the usual instruments; also 30 grand Serenatas, in which solos for various instruments are introduced. Besides many Concertos, especially for Flauto traverso, Oboe, Bassoon, Horn, Trumpet, &c., innumerable trios and divertimenti for different instruments, he has composed also twelve oratorios, a mass of theatrical pieces, and even pantomimes, and especially music for particular occasions, such as a military piece with trumpets, drums, kettle do., and fifes, in addition to the usual instruments; a piece of Turkish music; a piece for a steel spring-keyed instrument; and finally a sleigh-ride piece with five strings of sleigh-bells; not to speak of marches, nicht pieces, so called, and many hundred minuets, opera dances, and such small pieces."

Leopold Mozart was most decidedly an industrious man!

The other two Court composers are Herr Caspar Cristelli, a violoncellist from Vienna, and Herr Ferdinand Seidl, of Falkenberg, in Silesia, violinist.

"The three Court composers," adds the writer, "play both in the Church and Chamber upon their instruments, and, in turn with the Kapellmeister (Eberlin) have the direction of the Court music, each his week, during which all the music is under the charge of him who officiates, and he can produce as he pleases his own music, or that of others."

Other notices in these volumes show that, had not Leopold Mozart had such a son, his own name would have held an important place in the musical history of the last century.

[I have been after the older copy of the "Violin School"—but came too late.]

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JAN. 26, 1856.

Fifth Orchestral Concert.

The Music Hall last Saturday evening was much fuller than it has been at any concert of this kind before, this winter, and yet the programme was almost entirely "classical." The extension of the orchestra platform some eight or ten feet forward into the room (in anticipation of the erection of the BEETHOVEN statue), while it sacrifices about a hundred seats, really improves the sound of the orchestra, by bringing the instruments more upon a level. The old C minor symphony of Beethoven, the first love of Bostonians, and which in the last twenty years has probably been played here four times where any other symphony has once, seemed to have lost nothing of its charm. It was listened to with most devout and rapt attention; it had the soul's homage of every hearer; all felt the power, the magnetism of genius, and were lifted up to breathe the atmosphere of great thoughts. We shall not anew attempt description of a work grown so familiar. Of the performance we may say it was in the main one of the most effective that we can remember, yet not free from imperfections. In the very rapid tempo, in which the first movement and the Scherzo are always taken,—and indeed there seems to be no such thing as resisting the fiery impetus residing in the very spirit of the music,—the ear demands a greater mass of strings to make every phrase appreciable. We have never yet heard all the unaccented notes in those nervous violin figures of the Allegro, from whatsoever orchestra. Would greater distinctness be too dearly purchased by a somewhat slower tempo? We suppose every musician would say yes. But this time the Allegro was occasionally obscured somewhat by lack of perfect unanimity and precision of all the instruments; even the opening three notes ("Fate knocking at the door") were not distinctly three; and here and there a wind instrument came in not vitally prompt. Yet as a whole the thing made its mark. The Andante was as beautiful as ever, and vigorously applauded; the piu moto, however, in the latter part, was not sufficiently observed, and just there certain appoggiature for the oboe were rather too sleepily taken. The Scherzo only suffered, as it always does, from the indistinct rumble of that scrambling passage of the double basses; it would seem to require a dozen BOTTESINIS to bring out the composer's thought there satisfactorily. The glorious march of the finale was rendered with great spirit, and never have we seen a whole audience held in more breathless wonder by the surprises of the operatic stage than they were by that marvellous return of the quick three-four beat in the midst of the square and stately movement of the march.

No. 2. A piece of MOZART's tender, noble, truthful melody, the air: Dove sono, from the "Marriage of Figaro," was sung by Mrs. WENTWORTH, whose voice lacks warmth and largeness for Mozart, and whose rendering, while clear, and chaste, and conscientious, seemed uninspired; yet her tones were pure and penetrating, the performance had a certain simple beauty characteristic of all her singing, and it was a pleasure to hear such music, so correctly sung, even if it requires the LINDS to do it perfect justice.

No. 3. The exquisite romantic overture to Oberon, in which WEBER is as happily and almost as powerfully himself as in the Freyshütz, a work, too, which has its individual fairy charm distinct from that. It was the best played piece of the evening, and gave entire satisfaction.—The horn passage came out with delicious purity.

No. 4. Andante and Variations, and Finale, from BEETHOVEN's Septet, op. 20, played by the original instruments (Messrs. SCHULTZE, violin, ZOEHLER, viola, WULF FRIES, cello, STEIN, contrabasso, SCHULZ, clarinet, HAMANN, horn, and HUNSTOCK, bassoon.) We have never found this Septet a peculiarly interesting or Beethovenish composition—considered as a work by Beethoven. It is a little more commonplace in idea than most of his works; you outgrow it more easily; but of course it is masterly in treatment, and the peculiar combination of instruments is interesting in itself. The Andante and variations is the portion most frequently performed, though the first part of the Septet is more striking. It was neatly and artistically played, but the ensemble seemed dwarfed in so large a hall. Had it been practicable, the Parisian plan of doubling or trebling each of the string-instruments would have made the whole more balanced and effective. The three wind-instruments were beautifully played, as also the violoncello—these we mention as being the more prominent members of the seven.

5. WULF FRIES called down thunders of applause by his very skilful playing of a violoncello solo: Souvenirs de Spa, by SERVAIS. Of the piece itself we cannot say much, since it says too much for itself, being inordinately long, and merely a show piece.

6. HAYDN's naïve, graceful, pretty canzonet: "My mother bids me bind my hair," (one of the twelve he wrote in England.) This was admirably suited to the voice and manner of Mrs. WENTWORTH, and was most sweetly sung by her, and gracefully accompanied by Mr. TREMKLE. Long and loud were the efforts to procure a repetition.

7. The dreamy, pensive Notturmo from MENDELSSOHN's "Midsummer Night's Dream,"—always a favorite in the "Germania" concerts—did not flow quite as smoothly as in those times; it needed more rehearsal, more toning down of the strong colors; yet it was greatly relished.

8. For a finale, or "beginning of the end," during which restless people will keep going out, the overture to the "Siege of Corinth" was sufficiently noisy and Sebastopol-like. We cannot think it one of ROSSINI's best; the thoughts are common-place (excepting the airy little Allegro theme, which comes in finally,) even to reminding one in passages of old-fashioned patriotic glees of Yankeeedom; it is a thing for JULIEN.

The Italian Opera.

When this syren makes us her annual visit, we know just about what songs she will sing. They are mainly those that have turned the heads of young people year after year; the Normas, the Borgias, the Favoritas, &c. &c., still constitute the chief part of the repertoire. Yet such return too brings one or two novelties. This time the enchantment opened with the new yield of the last season—a rather hard and acrid fruit to some of us—called the Trovatore; yet many plucked and ate thereof more eagerly than of the other juicier, sweeter, and more wholesome fruit, the last and best yield of Rossini's genius, "William Tell." The passion for VERDI and the Trovatore especially, often strikes us like the boy's fondness for green apples; and the tree that bears them has become so used to ministering to the abnormal appetite, that one doubts whether its apples ever would ripen, even if left alone, whether it ever can produce anything sweet, and sound, and wholesome.

But de gustibus is a maxim to which we defer this time, rather than enter into a long argument. Suffice it to say, however, that there is very little point in the common newspaper remark that Il Trovatore is popular, in spite of "classical" objections. It is not at all a question of classical or un-classical. It matters very little whether an opera be "classical," provided it be good; provided it have beauty, genial inspiration, feeling, truth. The ground of disappointment in Il Trovatore was nothing traditional or technical; but simply this: that we do not find it natural and true; its fierce assaults upon our nerves are anything but pathos; it surprises (i. e. as long as its methods are new) but speaks not to our feelings; it sacrifices truth continually to effect. It goes out of the way for startling, harrowing subjects, not trusting itself to find interesting music in the heart that throbs under more near and common situations. Verdi loves to deal in a lurid furnace atmosphere, in which his characters move like salamanders; they are hot, but not warm from within; the fire that animates their song and action is of the same kind with the fire that encompasses them. Azucena, the gypsy, is the central figure in the Trovatore; her brain whirls with the constant whirling image of the flame which burned her mother at the stake. Her first song, which becomes the musical motive and pivot of the piece, Stride la vampa, is whirling flame translated into music; it whirls again and again in the orchestra, when she is not singing. That terror absorbs all the other feeling which there might be in the play; what impression do the love strains of Leonora and Manrico leave comparatively? We have called Verdi's melodies steel-clad; they come upon you like knights in grey steel armor, visors down; there is some charm of mystery, but you would rather see their human faces, which you never do, until you doubt but that they are ghost knights, and you hate the very fascination of the dream.

But we forget; the Trovatore is popular; that justifies, necessitates the frequent presentation; that (with the names of LAGRANGE and DIDIEE) almost filled the Boston Theatre with a brilliant audience on Monday night, and we must speak of the performance. In many points it was excellent, far superior to that of last year; yet wanting much, they say, who judged from the Parisian standard. We had not the original Verdi instrumentation, for which of course allowance must be made in favor of Sig. Verdi. Parts were hurried, as that tenor solo from the tower, in which, too, the thrumming guitar accompaniment (did Verdi mean it so?) was trivial. But the ensembles were generally good, and it was well put upon the stage,—at least for this latitude. Mme. LAGRANGE sang the music of Leonora admirably, and moved upon the stage with most lady-like and artistic grace, one of the very best of lyric actresses. The great compass of her voice, her remarkable control of the highest notes, and her consummate mastery of vocal instrumentation, combined with uniformly good taste, go far to supply the want of warmth and richness in her voice; and as for feeling, she gave at least all that resides in the music. In the midst of the wearisome false pathos of the last act, it was really a relief to us, when she indulged a little in her own speciality, in pure bird-like vocalization, where we could enjoy her liquid high notes, trills, and floriture, as a fresh fact independent of the tragedy.

Mlle. NANTIER DIDIEE, the new contralto, or rather perhaps mezzo-soprano, made a capital Azucena; she looked the gypsy truly, and both as an actress and a singer was at once acknowledged as a very superior artist. Her voice, especially in the middle parts, is one of the most rich and beautiful that we have ever heard.

Signer BRIGNOLI again takes the part of Manrico, the troubador. He sings very sweetly, with a tenor of considerable power and warmth; yet hardly of the manly quality, as his art is not much above sentimental prettiness. AMODIO, whose energetic efforts are in contrast with his heavy mould, possesses a remarkably rich and strong baritone, which he uses sometimes with good effect; but more frequently it uses him, and tempts him into overdoing; the strong creature is not quite subdued to the harmonious limitations of Art.

On Wednesday evening a large audience were disappointed by the sudden substitution of Norma for Lucrezia Borgia, the music of the latter having failed to arrive. But those who staid were not unrewarded. We had not believed it possible for us to find such pleasure in Norma. But after the Trovatore there was warmth and music in it. Then the performance, for the two acts which we heard, was about the best that we have heard.—Mme. LAGRANGE sings Norma better than any one before her, and is only second to GRISI in the acting. Miss ELISE HENSLER, forced thus suddenly into a debut in a secondary part, made the best Adalgisa we have ever witnessed. In her motions somewhat constrained and timid, she was yet true to the character; a maidenly simplicity and refinement characterized her appearance; her voice is singularly sweet and pure and finely cultivated, only affected with a little too much of the tremolo, which we find also in Lagrange; and she sang the music admirably, especially in the duet with Norma, in which some striking variations were introduced. Never have we heard the Trio as a whole made so effective; and here Sig. SALVIANI, a tenor new to us, comes in for a large share of credit. For the first time was the stupid part of Pollione made at all interesting to us. He is awkward and grotesque in gesture, but sings finely, with a good, rich, robust voice, and seems a singer of a sound, pre-Verdiite school. Sig. GASPARI also made a good Oroveso, and the chorus were well sung.

Last night was to be Miss HENSLER's proper debut in Linda. This afternoon Trovatore again. For next week, the programme (while we write) is not announced, but rumor speaks of I Puritani, Don Giovanni, and Semiramide. That would be a rich week.

Musical Chat-Chat.

The hundredth anniversary of MOZART's birthday (Jan. 27) will be musically celebrated in various parts of Germany. In Brunswick, his first great opera, Idomeneo, is to be performed. The Sing Academie, in the same city have given an admirable performance of MENDELSSOHN's Paulus. . . . SHAKESPEARE's "Tempest," compressed into three acts by Herr DINGELSTEDT, and with new music by TAUBERT, was produced in splendid style at Munich, on the anniversary of the King's birth-day. . . . WAGNER's Lohengrin has been successfully produced at Hanover; and, indeed, throughout Germany that opera and the Tannhäuser still have their run. An overture of Wagner's, called Faust, written it is said in Paris in 1840, and since revised, was produced for the first time in Germany, at a Leipzig charity concert in November last. Some admired, and some shook their heads and called it "strange" or "bad," or (strangest thing of all to say) "an imitation of SCHUMANN." The same concert contained BEETHOVEN's Egmont music, and other fine things. In Berlin, "the Romanticists," as the LISZT and WAGNER party are called, have started Symphony Concerts of their own, of which a correspondent of the Philadelphia Bulletin writes as follows: "The 'Symphony Soirées,' which have for many years been played in the royal chapel, consisted almost exclusively of the works of classic composers. In opposition to these, the 'Orchestral Union,' founded by the romantic school, has started a series of Symphony Soirées of their own, in which the compositions not only of the old classic, but also of the modern school are to be played. In fact, in these concerts Beethoven occupied quite as much space as Schubert and Niels-Gade, and in fact it is to the classical school, or to their execution of its pieces, that the 'Romanticists' owe the full houses which they have had. But we shall ere long see the Romantic reserve corps coming out in all their strength, when those papers which are in the Romantic interest will begin to blow their trumpets in full chorus. The war will be carried on bravely; it will abound in incident, and the musical reviews in the papers will abound in Romantic expressions of force which will remind one of the 'Storm and pressure Period' in our literature. But there can be little doubt as to the opinion which the educated musical pupils of Berlin will pronounce."....At one of the last of the Berlin Sinfonie Soirées, the programme included two Symphonies: Haydn's in D, and Beethoven's Pastorale; and two overtures: Spohr's Faust and Mendelssohn's to Athalie.... We don't know how much truth there may be in the following story:

A HEROIC MUSICIAN.—Among the wounded at the storming of Sebastopol, was a musician, who received a shot in the knee, and was under the necessity of having his leg amputated in consequence. As usual, preparations were made for binding him down, in order that he might not be able to move.

"What are you doing, doctor?" inquired the wounded man.

"I must take off your leg, and it is, therefore, necessary that you should be bound down," replied the doctor.

"I will never consent to such a proceeding," exclaimed the musician. "You may tear my heart from out my breast, but I will never consent to be bound down. If you have a violin, bring it me."

A violin was brought. After tuning it, the wounded man said:

"Now, doctor, you may begin."

The operation, which lasted about thirty minutes, now commenced, and the patient played his violin the whole time, without a single false note, or the slightest change in his features! (?)—Neue Berliner Music Zeitung.

One of the London papers, the Morning Advertiser, "flourishes like a green bay tree" in the matter of musical criticism. Noticing Mme. GOLDSCHMIDT's performance of the "Messiah," it describes Handel's innocent and simple little "Pastoral Symphony," as if it had set the writer dreaming of Beethoven's, to-wit:

"The Pastoral Symphony—that wondrous combination of sounds, which tells us, even were we ignorant of its intent, and of the sublime and simple genius of its author, of the pattering of the summer shower and the rattle of the storm, while the rapt auditor is placed by the fairy chords amidst flowery meads and the trill of birds—was listened to with an earnest impatience, as forming the prelude to Madame Goldschmidt's first vocalization."

Of that fourth oratorio performance at Exeter Hall (the "Creation" was repeated for the third) the Times says: "On the whole, the soprano music in the "Messiah" was never before sung with such impressive earnestness and general excellence as by Mme. Goldschmidt." Divina, it says, is the fittest epithet to apply to her singing of There were Shepherds and He shall feed his flock.

The London Musical World is a funny paper, good-natured and jolly in spite of its sins. It quotes something from a recent number of our Journal, as from "our excellent transatlantic contemporary, whom we love in spite of his abuse of us."—(Was it abuse to tell how much you loved us, how eagerly you appropriated the good things in our columns. We thank our respected friend and lover also, for the following answer to an "INQUIRER"—Dwight's Boston Journal of Music is by many degrees the best and the most impartial;) and for the compliment to our own town: "We are glad, by the way, to observe that the amateurs and critics of Boston are not quite so mad in their appreciations of music as some of their brethren in the 'Empire City.'" We assure our friend, however, (why not as well confess it?) that Il Trovatore is quite popular here, and so is the Tannhäuser overture.

We regret to learn that Miss ADELAIDE HORNSTOCK died of consumption, a few days since, after a long illness, in Philadelphia, where she has resided for some years with her brother KARL, the violinist, and was greatly esteemed as a pianist and teacher, as well as for her frank and generous character, and her real passion for her Art. Many of our readers remember the talented, enthusiastic girl, as she gave concerts here in Boston, with her brother, some years since, playing so finely the sonatas of Beethoven, particularly the "Kreutzer," and singing Wenn die Schwalben heimwärts ziehn, and how touching was her frail appearance, as if the musical passion were consuming her bloom of youth. She was a native of Brunswick, Germany. Her patience during her long, distressing illness had enlisted the sympathies of many warm friends.

ROBERT SCHUMANN's malady has lately become much worse (so says the correspondent of the London Musical World), and he employs his time in drawing maps.... Dr. CARL LOEWE has produced a new oratorio called Job, which "A. W. T.," in the Mus. Review, says contains some things pretty and some things hard and dry. We have happened to be familiar with two earlier oratorios by Loewe, of a light and pleasing character, and quite dramatic, viz: "John Huss" and "Seven Sleepers." Besides these, he has written "The Apostles at Philippi," Die Festlieben Zeiter, "Guttenberg," "The Brazen Serpent," and "The Destruction of Jerusalem;" also at least two operas, and a vast deal of music in many forms. But his great talent has lain in the composition of German ballads, of a wild, romantic character, in which some of his descriptive accompaniments are wonderfully effective. His music to the old Scotch ballad: Edward, why draps thy sword w' bluid? is really terrible.

In Philadelphia, a grand centennial celebration of the birth of MOZART is to take place next Monday evening, under the auspices of the "Musical Union," in which various musical societies will take part, such as the "Concordia," "Mozart," "St. Cecilia," "Liedertafel," "Männerchor," "Thalia," "Sängerbund," &c., together with a powerful orchestra, and other amateur and professional talent, L. MEIGEN being conductor. The musical selections will include the 12th Mass, Symphony, choruses, operatic finales, songs, duets, piano-forte sonatas, &c., all by the great master; and during the evening an oration on the "Life and genius of Mozart" will be delivered by THOMAS FITZGERALD, Esq.... New Orleans papers are full of PARODI and the STRAKOSCHES, who are giving there essentially the same programmes which they gave here a couple of months since.... TEDESCO succeeds the late Mlle. CRUVELLI at the opera in Paris, soon to be followed by Mme. BONGHI MAMO, at 8,000 francs per month.

FOREIGN.

PARIS.—An opera-bouffon, in two acts, the libretto by M. Henry Trianon, and the music by M. Théodore Labarre, (the harpist) entitled Pantagruel, was produced at the Grand-Opéra, on Monday week. The characters were distributed among MM. Obin, Bonlo, Belval, Marié, Koenig, Sabin, Pissarello, Mesdames Poinot and Laborde. The opera was well put on the stage. The Emperor and Empress were present. Owing, however, to the opinion of subscribers that the Grand-Opéra was not a fitting arena for opera-bouffon, Pantagruel was withdrawn, although it had been announced for repetition on the following evening. At the Opéra-Comique Les Suédois, an opera in three acts, libretto by MM. Michel Carré and Jules Barbieri, music by M. Victor Massé, has been produced with success. MM. Battaille, Delaunay-Riquier, Couderc, Sainte-Foy, Lejeune, Mlle. Caroline Duprez, Lemerrier, Lagier, and Lesserre are the executants. The Emperor and Empress were present at the first representation. At the Théâtre-Italien, Mlle. Virginie Bocabadati has made her début with tolerable success in La Sonnambula. Mlle. Pozzi played Lisa, M. Mongini Elvino, and M. Angelini Rodolphe. The ball, given at the Opéra for the benefit of the poor of the eighth arrondissement, was brilliantly attended and produced 50,000 francs.

L'ART DU CHANT APPLIQUÉ AU
PIANO.

BY S. THALBERG.

As the Piano, properly speaking, cannot render that which is most perfect in the beautiful art of Singing, namely, the faculty of prolonging sounds, we must overcome this imperfection with address and skill, and be able, not only to simulate sustained and prolonged notes, but to swell them also.
Emotion renders us ingenious, and the necessity of expressing what we feel creates for us resources which never occur to the mechanical performer.

With this fact in view, the distinguished THALBERG has in this work, in which he applies the art of singing to the Piano Forte, selected transcriptions from those masterpieces of the great composers, both ancient and modern, which are most particularly vocal in their effects, and adopted a simple form as the most appropriate for true transcriptions, in order that they may be within the comprehension and executive ability of young pianists, tolerably advanced. The prominent feature of these transcriptions is the singing part, the melody, to which particular attention is given, holding to that fruitful thought of a great writer, that it is Melody and not Harmony, which lives on triumphantly through the lapse of centuries.

The work is prefaced with a series of general rules in the art of singing well, to which we would direct the special attention of all those who would aspire not only to the name, but the nature of a good performer.

The following is a list of the transcriptions:

1. QUATUOR de l'Opera I Puritani, de BELLINI.
2. TRE GIORNI, Air de PAROLELLA.
3. ADELAIDE, de BETHOVEN.
4. AIR D'ÉGLISE du célèbre Chanteur STRADELLA.
5. LACRYMOSA tiré de Requiem de MOZART.
6. DUO de Noces de Figaro, Opera de MOZART.
7. PERCHE MI GUARDI E PIANGI, Duetto de Zelmira, de ROSSINI.
8. BELLA ADORATA INCOGNITA, Romanza dell' Opera II
Gloriamiento, de MERODANTE.
9. NEL SILENZIO FRA L'ORROR, Coro de Congiurati nell
Opera II Crociato, de MEYERBER.
10. EINSAM BIN ICH NICHT ALLEINE, Ballad tiré WEBER's Preciosa.
11. LA MEUNIERE ET LE TORRENT, tiré des Chansons de la Meunier de F. SCHUBERT.
12. Duet de Der Freischütz, de WEBER.
13. EL-MO TESORO, Air de Don Giovanni, de MOZART.

The Publishers call the attention of the musical profession to this work, as one eminently calculated to lighten the labors of the teacher, and rapidly advance the pupil. It is emphatically a PRACTICAL work, serving both as a Manual of instruction on the one hand, and a Text-book on the other; and it is believed that the peculiar arrangement of the work, together with the very large number of exercises and examples, presents great advantages, to both scholar and teacher, over any similar work of the kind. Teachers highly commend the work. Mr.
WILLIAM MASON says it is a work unsurpassed in the language.
Mr. GEORGE J. WESS says that it is a work perspicuous in fiction, methodical in arrangement, and sufficiently copious to embrace all the essentials of the general doctrine of accord.

The Mission of Mozart.

LEADING CHARACTERISTICS OF HIS GENIUS AND HIS WORKS.

BY A. OULIBICHEFF.

A scarcely noticeable brooklet at its origin, and grown since to a river, at the point where we left it,* Music saw its elements divide into several arms, which flowed away like separate streams, increased by the tribute of the ages, without yet enabling one to say, whether they were all streaming towards some unknown Ocean of Harmony, or about to waste themselves in the sandy epochs of partial decay, as was already the case with Church music. Already each department singly had almost or quite reached the goal of its development. The Choral song since PALESTRINA had become settled in its majestic simplicity and its thoroughly churchlike expression; the regular Fugue had reached its goal in BACH; the chief forms of dramatic song had become established in the tragic and the buffo Opera; the Contrapuntal and the Melodic style had yielded the quintessence of what they could yield singly, and the art of composition seemed, with BACH and HANDEL, with GLUCK and PICCINI, inclined to come to a pause, as the art of singing did perhaps already stand still with FARINELLI, CAFARELLI, PACCHIAROTTI and MARZUOLI. Finally HAYDN and BOCCHERINI had brought instrumental music upon the only good path, upon which progress was still possible. All branches of Music had borne their fruits; each of its partial tendencies had ripened about the year 1780. And now appeared MOZART, asserting his claims, in which his earthly mission justified him.

What step had Music still to take? I will begin my answer by another question. Whence comes it, that no one of the musicians discussed in our Introduction, Haydn himself included (of course we mean the Haydn before Mozart), is any longer quite or always able to satisfy the music-lovers of our time, unless some curiosity of amateurship or some historical interest comes in play in the reading or hearing of their works? And yet Bach, Handel and Gluck were composers who in their way have never been surpassed. PICCINI and SACCHINI, too, both have their merits. Our admiration of their genius remains undiminished, and yet we cannot hear them two or three hours in succession, without silently confessing, that we feel fatigued. The reason lies in the fact, that the superiority of these men has but one side, or at least but one principal side. To be obliged to listen to three hours of declamation and of tragic ariettas, or three hours of sweetish, liquid melody, or three hours of vocal fugues, or harmonic and contrapuntal learning at the piano, exceeds our capacity of enjoyment; that is no way to make out an evening. We can now apprehend MOZART's mission.

His calling was: to reconcile the conflicting schools, collecting all their colors and devices under one banner; to lay the foundation of the future of music by the union of its past and present; to enlarge the power and compass of this art, through the symmetrical and nicely calculated coöperation of all its elements, the simultaneous development of all its auxiliaries and the well-considered combination of all its forces, to the production of new effects; to eliminate as much as possible from musical productions all mere local and temporary influences, all forms merely conventional or belonging to particular schools, and put in their place the pure analogies of feelings and of thoughts, determinate and indeterminate, to which music ought to correspond. It was his problem, to make music as unitary and as universal, as the law of the harmonic Tri-chord, out of which it sprang, and as the poetry of the soul, whose most confidential and complete interpreter it is; in short, to write works, which came as near perfection as it is possible for mortal man to come,—models for every style, every department, every use, public or private, religious or profane, to which music can be specially applied; works which contain a complete body of examples, such as the art of composition needs, both in a technical and an æsthetic point of view, and such as the aforesaid kinds, styles and applications especially demand. * * * *

In what epoch had the musician to be borne, who was to give to music a definitive constitution? In the epoch when the elements of this art, following their diverging lines of progress, had become sufficiently prepared and ripened to pass from the state of isolation into that of union. In what place had he to be borne? The choice of place was limited to Italy or Germany. Everywhere else Mozart's vocation would have failed. Even in Italy it would have done so, and for the very simple reason, that the Italians could make nothing out of foreign music, and that their prejudice on this point was equal to their ignorance. Germany, on the contrary, despised nothing, because it knew all, then as now. Mozart, therefore, was a German, near the end of the eighteenth century. His cradle stood in a Catholic country, between the borders of Italy and of Bohemia, between Munich and Vienna, in a Residenz, in which music was a necessary splendor to the court of a prince-bishop. The place could not have been better chosen! It formed just the centre of the most musical regions of the world, all of which adhered to Catholicism.

But to whose hands were such great hopes entrusted? Who should bring the boon thus confided to its fruit-bearing period? Take every thing that can secure success for the future, choose a teacher, such as the pedagogic art could only think of in its finest dreams; let this Mentor be a master in music, a man of cultivated mind, of the strictest morality, combined with rare shrewdness and rare prudence, who thoroughly understands the theory, the practice, the method of teaching and the literature of his Art; who cherishes no prejudice of any sort or school, nor any individual or patriotic prejudice; who knows how to prize the old and the new, the Italian and the German music at their true worth. If such a Mentor could be easily found to-day, even with the lantern of Diogenes, I am yet to be informed; but such a man, trait for trait, was Mozart's master; and that master was his father, the most intelligent and of necessity also the most zealous of all masters. If LEOPOLD MOZART does not seem to have been expressly called to conduct the education of his son, then we must cease to believe in final causes.

As soon as the child has put his finger on the keyboard, the father as a Christian and a musician recognizes the wonder; he sees what method is to be pursued with such a scholar; he lets playing and composing go on step by step together; the scholar plays and studies all composers indiscriminately, as they fall into his hands. Why make any selection, why guide this double study farther onward by slow steps? Whatever the child sees, he also plays; whatever you would explain to him, he knows already. At the age of twelve years MOZART knows BACH and HANDEL, HASSE and GRAUN, as also the old and new Italian composers by heart. "There is no master, however little known," he tells us, "whom I had not studied once or several times in my life." Travels were to complete what this universal education had begun. For twenty years we see Mozart almost incessantly wandering about, visiting the countries in which there was anything which he could make his own. In this way he became by practice intimately acquainted with the musical genius of nations, distinct in taste or systems from each other; he tried his hand in every style, worked his way by practice into all forms and departments. An Italian in Milan, a Frenchman in Paris, a German in Salzburg, an Englishman in London, a melodist for the public, a fuguist before the tribunal of padre MARTINI, everywhere a virtuoso and composer in the fashion, and the next moment trampling the fashion under his feet, he broke forever with fortune, to obey the call of destiny, which had decreed that he should live unknown and die young.

Chat with Rossini.

BY FERDINAND HILLER.

[Concluded.]

XIII.

One day, as I was playing something to Rossini, he begged me, as usual, to play one or two of Bach's fugues.

"These accursed fugues!" he subsequently exclaimed, in a comically-angry manner. "When I was at the Liceo, in Bologna, I became acquainted with the overture to the Zauberflöte. My head became so full of it, that I determined on attempting a similar opus. I set to work, wrote a fugued overture, and had it copied out and played. But, when I heard it, I was so furious at the effect of my patchwork that I tore up the score and parts into a thousand pieces, in presence of my school-fellows and audience."

"That was a most hasty step, maestro," said I. "The work would have afterwards been a great source of amusement to you."

"A man has always something better to do than to busy himself with past follies," answered Rossini.

"Talking of these fugues," I observed, "reminds me of your Raimondi, lately deceased. He must have been a perfect wizard. To write two oratorios, which could be performed after each other, and next to each other, and simultaneously, was of itself wonderful, supposing there was not even any confusion."

"He was really very skilful in such artifices," said Rossini, "and tried his hand at the most adventurous combinations. On the other side, his theatrical music was bad and wearisome, and it was only with his last work, Ventaglio, that he was at all successful. While I was in Naples, I procured for him an appointment in the theatre, in order to give him an opportunity of earning something—he had to superintend and arrange the ballet music—a melancholy occupation for a real musician. He subsequently obtained an honorable post in the Liceo at Palermo, but did not go on well too long anywhere."

"A passionate lover of music, in Cologne," said I, "applied to Raimondi, after the performance of his oratorio in Rome, and inquired whether it were possible to obtain a copy. Raimondi demanded the bagatelle of 60,000 francs. Its success must have turned his brain."

"I should not be surprised if it had," said Rossini; "he had never possessed two piasters at one and the same time, and never obtained such a triumph before."

We were interrupted by a most graceful French lady, who was introduced to the maestro, and, in the course of conversation, thanked him enthusiastically for all the hours of enjoyment his music had already procured her. It is true that such scenes occurred every day, but the warmth with which a great many persons gave utterance to their feelings, was, at times, something really touching.

"In spite of your being used to this sort of thing, maestro," said I, "the manner in which people meet you here must be highly agreeable to you."

"Marks of attention which come from the heart have certainly something satisfactory about them," said Rossini.

"It must be confessed," observed I, "that the French possess, in the highest degree, the gift of manifesting their respect for celebrated men in the most amiable manner."

"Certainly," replied the maestro, "if they would but make one a few less compliments, and speak to a man less about his own works. But this is a thing they cannot give up, from persons of the highest rank down to the concièrge. I think I never met a Frenchman who did not ask me which of my operas I liked best. You can imagine how little I am the man to enter upon a discussion of this kind. The French are friendly and appreciating, but, at times, somewhat too kind."

"Do you prefer the Italian fashion?" I inquired.

"In Italy, the people are distinguished by a noble indifference," answered Rossini; "but, on this side, also, you may be too kind."

"You certainly have no cause for complaint either on this side of the Alps, or on the other, maestro," said I laughing; "and yonder comes also a proud son of Albion, who adores you—he was telling me yesterday about the evening he first heard your music, and saw you, and the tears stood in his eyes the while."

"I have experienced from Englishmen," said Rossini, "marks of attention which are not to be met with every day. For instance, I shall never forget the behavior of the Duke of Devonshire towards me."

"What did he say, maestro?" I inquired.

"On my way to London, I was stopping for a day in Milan," said Rossini. "The Duke of Devonshire happened to be there, also; and an acquaintance of mine, who was about going to see the Duke, would not be contented until I accompanied him, although my travelling costume was not adapted for figuring in the drawing-room of an English nobleman. The Duke, a great lover of music, overwhelmed me with politeness; we dined together, and, after dinner, I sang him two or three songs."

"That was a bad time for doing so," said I.

"According to what singers say," replied the maestro, "it was, but I must confess I have never sung more willingly and better than after a good dinner. But to return to the Duke—I must add that he gave me the most powerful letters of recommendation, which were highly serviceable to me in London. He, himself, was not in England during my stay there."

"All you have hitherto related is but very natural, my dear maestro," said I.

"A little patience, mio caro," continued Rossini. "Twenty years had elapsed since the period in question, without my having again met the Duke. One morning, very early, I go to the market at Bologna. You must know that there is nothing like the market at Bologna. It is impossible to form any conception of the various productions garnered up there, and one of my favorite occupations was to lounge about the place. To my great astonishment, I perceive, stuck in the middle of the square, a gentleman, very comfortably smoking his cigar. I approach, and, directly he perceives me, he stretches out his hand, in quiet friendly manner, to shake hands with me. It was the Duke of Devonshire. 'I am very glad that I have seen you here; I intended calling on you in an hour or two,' said he, 'I know your residence and your habits.' We chatted good-humoredly together for some time. I accompanied him to his hotel, and he subsequently paid me the visit he had announced. 'I am still greatly in your debt,' said he, on taking leave, 'and up to the present time have found no opportunity of taking my revenge.' With these words, he handed me an extremely valuable snuff box. It was most assuredly far less the costliness of the present, than the uncommon attention on the part of the donor, which afforded me great pleasure. To pay a supposed debt, and in such a way, after the lapse of twenty years! and it was not he who was under an obligation to me, but I to him."

"That depends upon how you look upon the matter," said I.

"At any rate, the behavior of the Duke was that of a nobleman, in the best acceptance of the word. But it is fated that we shall not chat uninterrupted to-day; yonder comes an elegant pianiste-compositeur, who has certainly got his eye upon you."

"I only trust that he does not wish to play me a fantasia on motives from my own operas," said Rossini, "for nothing in the world wearies me so much as jingling of this description; added to which, you are expected to express your thanks, at the conclusion, for the honor done you."

The storm that threatened the maestro passed quietly by. It was, however, the last evening he spent at Trouville. On the following morning he left the place. I accompanied him to his carriage, and although I was to see him again in a few days in Paris, my heart felt moved, as he drove off.

"I expect you on Friday to dinner, caro Ferdinando," he called out to me.

"Friday and every other day," exclaimed Madame Rossini.

I returned home, with half-melancholy, half-agreeable feelings of having spent one or two weeks that for me were memorable ones. May the reader of these pages of reminiscences—far too fragmentary, as I now perceive at their conclusion—obtain from them some slight notion of one of the most genial and amiable men of the present century, one who, besides all his other preëminent qualities, possesses the highly laudable virtue of being extremely well-disposed towards the author of these pages.

Beethoven and Goethe.

LEWES, the musical "Vivian" of the London Leader, in his admirable "Life of Goethe," recently published by Messrs. Ticknor & Fields of this city, makes the following sensible comments on a couple of oft-quoted passages from the life of the composer. Speaking of Goethe's friendships, he says:

I may mention, however, his acquaintance with Beethoven, on account of the undying interest attached to the two names. They were together for a few days at Töplitz, with the most profound admiration for each other's genius. The biographer of Beethoven adds: "But though Beethoven has praised Goethe's patience with him (on account of his deafness), still it is a fact that the great poet and minister too soon forgot the great composer; and when, in 1823, he had it in his power to render him an essential service with little trouble to himself, he did not even deign to reply to a very humble epistle from our great master." This is the way accusations are made; this is the kind of evidence on which they are believed. The only facts here established are, that Beethoven wrote to Goethe, and that Goethe did not reply. Beethoven's letter requested Goethe to recommend the Grand Duke to subscribe to his Mass. It was doubtless very mortifying not to receive a reply; such things always are mortifying, and offended self-love is apt to suggest bad motives for the offence. But a bystander, knowing how many motives may actuate the conduct, and unwilling to suppose a bad motive for which there is no evidence, will at once see that the inferences of Goethe's "not deigning to reply," and of having forgotten the great composer," are by no means warranted by the facts. We know that Goethe was naturally of an active benevolence; we know that he was constantly recommending to the Grand Duke some object of charitable assistance; we know that he profoundly admired Beethoven, and had no cause to be offended with him; and, knowing this, we must accept any interpretation of the fact of silence in preference to that which the angry Beethoven, and his biographer, have inferred.

The following is introduced apropos of Goethe's interview with Napoleon:

That he was extremely flattered by the attentions of NAPOLEON has been the occasion of a loud outcry from those who, having never been subjected to any flattery of this nature, find it very contemptible. But the attentions of a Napoleon were enough to soften in their flattery even the sternness of a republican; and GOETHE, no republican, was all his life very susceptible to the gratification which a Frankfurt citizen must feel in receiving the attention of crowned heads. There is infinite insincerity uttered on this subject; and generally the outcry is loudest from men who would themselves be most dazzled by court favor of any kind. To hear them talk of Goethe's "servility" and worship of rank, one might fancy that they stood on a moral elevation, looking down on him with a superior pity which in some sort compensated their inferiority of intellect. There is one anecdote which they are very fond of quoting, and which I will therefore give, that we may calmly consider what is its real significance. BEETHOVEN, writing to Bettina in 1812, when he made Goethe's acquaintance in Töplitz, says: "Kings and princes can, to be sure, make professors, privy councillors, &c., and confer titles and orders, but they cannot make great men—minds which rise above the common herd—these they must not pretend to make, and therefore must these be held in honor. When two men, such as Goethe and I, come together, even the high and mighty perceive what is to be considered great in men like us. Yesterday, on our way home, we met the whole Imperial Family. We saw them coming from a distance, and Goethe separated from me to stand aside: say what I would, I could not make him advance another step. I pressed my hat down upon my head, buttoned up my greatcoat, and walked with folded arms through the thickest of the throng. Princes and pages formed a line, the Archduke Rudolph took off his hat, and the Empress made the first salutation. Those gentry know me. I saw to my real amusement the procession file past Goethe. He stood aside with his hat off, bending lowly. I rallied him smartly for it; I gave him no quarter."

This anecdote is usually quoted as evidence of Beethoven's independence and Goethe's servility. A very little consideration will make us aware that Beethoven was ostentatiously rude in the assertion of his independence, and that Goethe was simply acting on the dictates of common courtesy, in standing aside and taking off his hat, as all Germans do when royalty passes them. It is as much a matter of courtesy to stand still, and take off the hat, when a Royal personage passes in carriage or on foot, as it is to take off the hat when an acquaintance passes. Beethoven might choose to ignore all such courtesies; indeed his somewhat eccentric nature would not move in conventional orbits; and his disregard of such conventional courtesies might be pardoned as the caprices of an eccentric nature; but Goethe was a man of the world, a man of courtesies and a minister; to have folded his arms, and pressed down his hat upon his head, would have been a rudeness at variance with his nature, his education, his position, and his sense of propriety.

It is possible, nay probable, that the very education Goethe had received may have given to his salutation a more elaborate air than was noticeable in bystanders. In bowing, he may have bowed very low, with a certain formality of respect; for I have no wish to deny that he did lay stress on conventional distinctions. Not only was he far from republican sternness, but he placed more value on his star and title of Excellency, than his thorough-going partisans are willing to admit. If that be a weakness, let him be credited with it; but if he were as vain of such puerilities as an English Duke is of the Garter, I do not see any cause for serious reproach in it. So few poets have been Excellencies, so few have worn stars on their breasts, that we have no means of judging whether Goethe's vanity was greater or less than we have a right to expect. Meanwhile it does seem to me that sneers at his title, and epigrams on his star, come with a very bad grace from a nation which is laughed at for nothing more frequently than for its inordinate love of titles. Nor are Englishmen so remarkable for their indifference to rank, and entire freedom from "snobbishness" as to make them the fittest censors of this weakness in a Goethe.

Letters from a Country Singing Teacher.

No. VI.

M——, JAN., 1856.

JOHN S. DWIGHT, ESQ.,

Dear Sir,—Our pastor has favored us with a sermon, a portion of which was devoted to the subject of music in the church, and the duties of the members of his society in relation to that matter. As he has treated the subject in quite another manner than is usual among our clergymen, few of whom know more about the whole question than is found in the Old Testament, I venture to send you an abstract of his discourse, for a good portion of which I am indebted to his kindness in sending me his notes.

The whole discourse occupied both sermons of the day, the part relating to music coming toward the close in the afternoon, and taking every one completely by surprise.

As I wrote you in my last, there has been a great revival of religion in the Society, and the sermons were delivered in relation to the state of religious feeling among us. The text was from Leviticus xxii. chap. 20th verse: "Whatsoever hath a blemish, that shall ye not offer."

The subject of the discourse was the duty of all who devote themselves to a Christian life and the service of their Creator, to bring all their offerings, as in old times among the Jews, without spot or blemish—to keep nothing back, but to consider themselves but as the stewards of a heavenly master. Beginning with some remarks upon the Jewish laws of Sacrifice, he passed to a consideration of the analogies existing between a Jew under the old covenant, with all his sacrifices of burnt, and sin, and peace, and heave-offerings, and the like, and a Christian whose offerings are rather of his time, talents, influence, and of his means, in works of charity, in aiding the various societies for the spread of the gospel at home and abroad, and in good works in general. Coming more particularly to the state of religious feeling among his hearers, he spoke of the deep joy he had in seeing so many of all classes and conditions, old and young, inquiring their duty, and professing their deep anxiety to learn and perform it. Dividing his hearers into various classes, he filled his forenoon discourse with remarks upon the duties of several of these classes, talking most plainly, and telling many home truths, especially to some of our rich and influential men. The notice that he should continue the subject in the afternoon, not only brought all the members of the Society usually present, but quite a number from other congregations.

The afternoon's discourse was more particularly directed to the younger people of the parish. He had already spoken, as it seemed to me, and indeed to others, of the duties of all classes of his hearers, and a general feeling of curiosity was visible, when he added: "There is another class, to whom I have never directly and pointedly spoken; a class, however, whose duty, often left utterly without performance, I consider one of the highest importance to the well-being of a religious society; a class who can do much to strengthen and hold up my hands, at least, as the hands of Moses were supported when praying for the success of his people; a class often forgetful of the talent entrusted to them, notwithstanding its cultivation and exercise is one of the purest and most refining pleasures given us by the Creator, in his wisdom, as a beautifier of our lives in this world; and who can say that it will not also be the same in the new heavens and the new earth to come? I refer to such as are gifted with the power of song!"

It is not often that I have noticed that indescribable something, which announces the eagerness of an audience to know what is coming, more perceptibly displayed than during the momentary pause which the speaker made after this announcement. I involuntarily cast my eyes in a certain direction, and saw to my joy that expectation sat as strongly upon certain faces in that quarter as upon those sitting by me in the seats. I will now transcribe from the speaker's notes, leaving you to use as much as you see fit:

"I suppose the introduction of this topic at this time may occasion some surprise. Indeed," added he, glancing round, "I perceive this is the case; but if any one should feel that it is a somewhat singular subject to introduce in a time of such deep religious feeling, let him consider my bringing it forward now but as a stronger proof of the deep importance I attach to it. There has never been a period in my ministry, when I felt that what may be said upon the subject of sacred music and our duties in relation to it would meet with such a reception as I could wish. But now, when so many hearts are softened; when so many are anxiously inquiring 'What shall we do?' when so many are professing their willingness, nay, their eagerness to take up any cross, or perform any duty which may be shown to be such, I confidently come before you and speak plainly and distinctly what I feel to be your obligations in the premises. I shall appeal to your own understandings, to your own sense of right. I shall put the subject in the light in which I view it, and shall but ask your prayerful consideration of what I say.

"Half a century since, when singing-schools in the country were events of more importance than they are now considered, discourses in the pulpit upon sacred music were not uncommon. I shall not delay, to go over the old ground, and speak of the great part which music was made to perform in the service of the sanctuary by David, and Solomon, and Josiah, and Ezra, and Nehemiah. Yet this, I hope, is familiar to every hearer. I cannot find in the support given to the music of the Temple an argument to be offered to you, though this has often been done. If we take the Old Testament history as our guide in this respect, we may go farther and demand the building of some great central place of worship, the setting aside of some chosen race for the priesthood, and the formation of a body of singers as numerous as those mentioned by Nehemiah, who 'had builded them villages round about Jerusalem.' I will not even refer to the many passages in both Scriptures which speak of prayer and praise, of the singing of psalms and hymns, of the utterance, in short, of religious feeling in song. All this is familiar to you, is familiar to all who read the Bible, and yet, in this respect, how generally, through all the length and breadth of our land, is the word of God of no effect! Allow me the attempt to place the subject in another light, and present it to you in a different point of view.

"Firstly, from the mud and the deposits of ages in the bed of the Tiber at Rome, was dug not many years since a bronze statue. It was a work of Roman art, at the time when her temples were the temples of idols, when beasts were still sacrificed to the deities of her mythology, and the will of her gods was still sought in the smoking or quivering entrails of her victims. No inscription tells the name of the artist, no legend cast or engraved upon it tells the subject. Yet no one of the thousands who every year pass through the noble European gallery, where it stands with its hands stretched out, its face turned upward, but recognizes it instantly as a boy at prayer. Why is this? Because prayer is universal, and the language of its expression in the features of the face, in the play of the muscles, in the stretching out of the hands, in the attitude of the body, is a language known and recognized of all men. We argue in favor of religion from the universality of prayer. I am not aware that a nation has been discovered where prayer in some form, to some real or supposed being, is not found. Just so universal is praise expressed in the most exquisite strains of the greatest composers in one land, in the rudest contrivances for sound in others. No nation is so rude that it has not some music. With the spread of the refining influences of intellectual culture, the forms both of prayer and praise are improved. They go together, they must be united; for the spirit within us which asks blessings in prayer, utters its thanks for blessings received in praise.

"Secondly. Hence it follows that as prayer is an essential part of the public services of the House of God, equally so is music, if we would make those services in all respects the interpreters of our religious feelings and affections. And this leads me to a few words upon what the music of the congregational church should be. The most simple answer is, the very best possible. There are those who answer, the very simplest possible, so that every one who feels a religious emotion, to which he would give vent in song, may not be deterred by scientific and artistic difficulties. But this idea of confining the music of the Church to what is called congregational singing, is based, I think, upon a too narrow and one-sided view. So soon as it is admitted that music shall take part in our services, it must follow that it shall work out all its legitimate effects upon our hearts. Now to do this, it must have a two-fold use. It must be employed to awaken, excite, strengthen the religious emotions; it must likewise become the language in which this emotion finds utterance. The Catholics understand this; and when the multitude filling some vast cathedral is trembling with the excitement caused by the pomp and splendor of the ritual, and by the strains of music the most touching ever written by man, the stifling emotion finds vent in the long-drawn Amen, intoned and supported by the vast organ, or in some one of the exquisite chorals or melodies of the church. Every church is bound by all the considerations which lead it to build the Lord an honorable and a pleasant house, to see that his praises are sung in it to the best music possible. Might I be allowed, I could tell of the influence of a well-sung psalm upon my own mind, and upon my power of entering fully into the spirit of my Sabbath duties, and of the discouraging effect of a hymn sung in such a manner as to outrage all my musical tastes and feelings. I forbear. In a large society with a numerous congregation, I would have as large a choir as possible, well trained to their duties, to whom should be confided the task of bringing the sweet influences of music to bear upon our cold hearts, and of leading in the simple favorite melody or solemn choral at such times as the preacher felt that the people were with him in their feelings, and filled with the spirit of praise.

Thirdly. It follows that one of the sacrifices, one of the offerings to which we are called, is that of providing the necessary means to support this branch of divine worship. In this I have never found my beloved people deficient. Our fine organ, the schools supported from year to year, show how deeply the duty is felt, how cheerfully it is complied with. Why then are the results so—I am sorry to say it—so unsatisfactory?

"Fourthly. With the spread of knowledge, the cultivation of taste, and the development of the general mind, the services in the pulpit are felt to require the high education, theological science, and learning of men set apart and educated to the ministry. The rude, untutored man, however fervent and filled with the spirit of holiness, is no longer felt to be a suitable person to lead the devout of a worshipping assembly. I can see no reason why in the musical exercises of our services, some preparation of the kind should not be required. God has given us minds with numerous and varied powers. Every power, every talent, every affection has been given us to act its part in making us better, and bringing us nearer perfection. Virtues may become vices. Tastes and talents may become but the servants of sin. But it does not follow from this, that any of them should remain undeveloped. He to whom God has given a taste and talent for music, is bound to cultivate them, because God has given them. And when cultivated and developed, duty comes in and demands their exercise in the worship of Him. Were this duty duly felt and acted up to, there are few places of worship in which God's praises might not be worthily heard. As it is, how often, alas! do I shudder to hear the psalms and hymns in our various churches sung in such a manner as would not be tolerated in the cheapest concert; as though He who gave the power of music was less worthy of its best efforts, than we who pay a few cents to hear it!

"Fifthly. Is it objected that the cultivation of what are usually called accomplishments, skill in drawing, in music, and the like, will take too much time, and that hours so employed might be better spent? I have just said that because God has given the talent and taste we are bound to find time to cultivate them. But the objection falls to the ground when we think how many hours wasted might be thus profitably spent. Though I do not advise any but such as have a decided and uncommon talent for music to devote themselves to it, I know of no employment for leisure hours more refining and purifying in its influences. Nor, if we were all under the influence of true religious principle, would our devotion to music become a temptation. There is a time for the cultivation of all our powers and tastes. I went through the new woollen factory the other day, and noted how every apartment from basement to roof was filled with machinery, most complicated, and yet running ever with the most perfect regularity. All that man's power of contrivance can do was done to perfect every the most minute part of each machine. All tended to the great object of the perfection of the fabric. Finally, I went to the great wheel which put all in motion, and there was a small, modest regulator, hidden away from the general view, which ruled and governed all, and through whose influence every wheel, band, and spindle in the edifice wrought steadily and adequately to the general good. My hearers, there is not a power, or taste, or talent within you which you need fear to bring to its highest perfection, so long as the regulator, religion, holds its due sway.

"Sixthly. If we are thus bound to cultivate the power of song, which God may have implanted within us, that we may worthily sing his praise—that we may bring an offering without spot or blemish—what excuse can they give for neglecting this duty, whom he has placed in such circumstances of life, as to enable them to devote time and means for the development of their musical powers even up to the standard of high Art? I appeal to those before me, who have had every advantage of the best teachers, of opportunities of hearing the best music, who have voices and a natural taste for the art, worthy of the high culture bestowed upon them, how can they answer the question at the last great day, 'What have ye done with the talent confided to you?' The very exercise of these powers in the sanctuary, it would seem to me, must carry with it its own exceeding great reward. 'For it is good to sing praises unto our God; for it is pleasant.' And again the Psalmist says, 'While I live will I praise the Lord; I will sing praises unto my God while I have my being.' How can any one, who has the power, refrain from joining in the exercise! But, my hearers, ye who can sing the praises of the Most High in his tabernacle, if it be a cross to take up—though how this can be I can hardly conceive—will you not glory in that cross? Have you a right to ask yourselves any other question than 'What is my duty?'

"Oh that I could impress upon you the joy and delight which would fill your pastor's breast, could he be cheered and encouraged in his labors, as you can cheer and encourage him; could he hear the sweet voice of praise fill this house, as the glory of the Lord filled all the house after the prayer of Solomon! There are times when a pastor's heart is weighed down with anxiety and sorrow; when the overtasked brain or the excited nerves render him almost unfit for the performance of his duties; when he seems to sink like David in the deep mire, where there is no standing, and comes into the deep waters where the floods overflow him. At such times, music—the sacred, solemn music fit for God's house—exerts a tenfold power upon him. It melts and subdues his stubborn will; it soothes and calms his troubled mind; it exalts and strengthens his hope and religious confidence; it draws him from the horrible pit and miry clay, and sets his feet again upon the rock; it rouses him from his despondency, and sheds the oil of gladness into his soul. He feels, as perhaps no other feels, how good a thing it is 'to give thanks unto the Lord, and to sing praises unto Thy name, O most High! to show forth thy loving kindness in the morning, and thy faithfulness every night.'

"But, finally, those whose advantages have been beyond the ordinary standard, should feel it their duty to impart by precept, or at least by example, to their less-favored fellow beings. Who can tell the inestimable advantage in refining, elevating, and purifying the humble soul, whose daily toil forbids any high cultivation of its powers of song, could it at the social singing meeting, or in the sanctuary, habitually hear the praises of its maker in music worthy the exalted theme!

"Men, brethren, and sisters, think of these things. Judge for yourselves. Examine the subject prayerfully, and seek only for the path of duty. To me it seems so plain that the wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein. But my views may strike you as novel, or at all events I may have put the subject in a light in which you have not thought of it. If you find I am right, oh, at this season of deep religious feeling and concern, do not let any feelings of the earth, earthy, hinder you from doing your duty; if it be a cross, oh, take it up joyfully, and bear it manfully. Sustain your pastor's hands. Soften the hard clay of worldly minds by sacred song, that he, with God's blessing, may mould it into new vessels of honor to our God.

"Praise the Lord! Sing unto the Lord a new song, and his praise in the congregation of saints. Let Israel rejoice in Him that made him; let the children of Zion be joyful in their king."

Respectfully yours,

P. E. G.

Le Nozze di Figaro.

MY DEAR DWIGHT—

Having just arisen from the perusal of that fascinating Biography, HOLMES'S "Life of MOZART," I cannot resist the impulse to plead through your columns with the managers of the excellent Opera Company now in Boston, for the production of the Nozze di Figaro. This glorious opera, which has disputed the palm with Don Giovanni, and which I have heard performed to crowded and delighted houses, over and over again, at the old "Feydeau" and the "Odeon" in 1829, 1840, and 1844, would undoubtedly fill the seats at our fine Theatre as only Don Giovanni beside would do.

It might interest some of your readers to peruse one or two extracts, on the subject of this opera, from Holmes:

The all-engrossing subject of Mozart's thoughts during the spring of the year was "Le Nozze di Figaro," an opera likewise undertaken at the suggestion of the Emperor Joseph. This work, which has maintained its place on the stage and in the drawing-room for nearly sixty years in continuation, is justly considered, for its extraordinary wealth of melody, the variety of its style, and the perfection of its concerted music, as one of the most wonderful trophies of human skill.

The libretto, adapted by Da Ponte from the well-known comedy of Beaumarchais, seems to have satisfied Mozart, and the subject to have possessed unusual charms for him, if we may judge by the rate at which he worked. The whole opera was written in the course of April. The marvellous finale of the second act, consisting of six grand pieces, occupied him for two nights and a day, during which he wrote without intermission. In the course of the second night he was seized with an illness which compelled him to stop; but there remained a few pages only of the last piece to instrument.

Salieri and Righini being at this time ready with operas, were both competitors with Mozart for preference; and the contest between the composers was so warm that the emperor was obliged to interpose and he decided for "Figaro." Some eagerness of rivalry seems to have been pardonable on an occasion which is rendered memorable by the unequalled talent of the singers, and the extraordinary congress of composers assembled at Vienna. Rarely, if ever, has it happened to a musician to submit his composition to such an ordeal as Mozart did "Figaro;" and few have been the instances in dramatic annals in which men of such renown as Haydn, Mozart, Gluck, Paesello, Storace, Salieri, Righini, Anfossi, &c., have been collected under one roof to witness the first performance of an opera, as it is no improbable surmise that they were on this occasion.

What the lyric drama gained by this opera in elegance of melody, in models of love songs, in rich concerted music, and varied finales, is the question at present, and that we are well able to determine. While all the popular melodies of the comic operas coeval with "Figaro" (tunes which were regularly transferred from the theatre to the street musicians) are lost, not a note of that composition has faded; and when reproduced, it still finds as many enthusiastic admirers as a comedy of Shakespeare. The combination of playfulness and grace which predominates in it imparts to "Figaro," according to some critics, a more decided Mozartean character than any other of his works. Every one may certainly find in it something to please. The musician, for instance, listens with delight to the bass of the first duet, or to the admirable instrumentation of the song in which the page is trying on the cap. What wealth of beauty in places comparatively unnoticed! Those who like to combine delightful music with a laugh may find both in the duet in which Susanna describes the behaviour of the count when her bridegroom is gone on his travels. The deprecatory interjections of poor Figaro, "Susanna, pian, pian!" call up the most pleasant recollections. It were endless to pursue this opera through all its materials for pleasure.

The favorite piece of the composer was the sestet: Riconosci in questo amplesso.

Kelly, who claims to have sung "Crudel perché" with the composer, just as it had fallen fresh from the pen, gives a lively account of the first rehearsal. Alluding to this occasion, he observes: "I remember Mozart was on the stage with his crimson pelisse and gold-laced cocked hat, giving the time of the music to the orchestra. Figaro's song, 'Non più andrai, farfallone amoroso,' Benucci gave with the greatest animation and power of voice. I was standing close to Mozart, who, sotto voce, was repeating 'Bravo! bravo! Benucci;' and when Benucci came to the fine passage, 'Cherubino, alla vittoria, alla gloria militar,' which he gave out with stentorian lungs, the effect was electricity itself, for the whole of the performers on the stage, and those in the orchestra, as if actuated by one feeling of delight, vociferated, 'Bravo! bravo! maestro; viva! grande Mozart!' Those in the orchestra, I thought, would never have ceased applauding, by beating the bows of the violins against the music desks. The little man acknowledged, by repeated obeisances, his thanks for the distinguished mark of enthusiastic applause bestowed upon him." What a transition this, from the midnight solitudes in which, animated by a great idea, he could not rest till he had delivered himself of it! Had it been the acclamation of a crowded house at a performance, instead of a spirited scene at a rehearsal, it might have been better; still, it was the voice of truth, which he seldom heard save in his own music.

Yours, ever,

R.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, Jan. 28.—For a wonder, Mr. EISEL had a fine evening for his Soirée on Saturday, and there was a good audience assembled. The programme promised us a Quartet of Haydn, one of Beethoven, Mendelssohn's D minor Trio, and a couple of Quartets for male voices, by Mr. Eisfeld. The instrumental Quartets were admirably played, and brought the pleasant conviction that the improvement in the first violin, which I had noticed at the last concert, was not merely a temporary one. Haydn's composition, (No. 57.) is one which we have heard several times before on similar occasions, but are always glad to hear again. It is indescribably merry and rollicking, but with such an undercurrent of seriousness emanating from the beautiful Adagio religioso, as to preserve it from even the slightest shade of triviality. The Quartet of Beethoven (No. 10) was one of those which it is almost impossible to understand or judge of at a first hearing. It is overwhelming and bewildering in its grandeur; but even through those passages which remain slightly veiled at first, there shines a beauty that sinks deep into the heart.—Mendelssohn's Trio, as a composition, needs no comment, for it is probably sufficiently familiar to most of your readers. When Madame WALLACE played it at the morning rehearsal, I was inclined to think her the best lady-pianist I had ever heard. In the evening, she was evidently nervous and fluttered, which can be accounted for by the fact of this being her first re-appearance after a pause of two years. The Finale, however, was well rendered, very well, and with a fire and vigor which one does not always find even in a man. Of the compositions of Mr. Eisfeld, the first, "An die Entfernte," was rather too elaborate and intricate to please at a first hearing, though it seemed to me to have much merit. The second, "Lebewohl," was much more what the Germans call "grateful," and might, I should think, easily become popular. Both were well sung, only it is a pity that BOETLER, the tenor, forces his voice so as to rob it of all delicacy of tone.

JANUARY 29. I am very happy to be able to give a much more satisfactory account of MASON and BERGMANN'S third matinée, which took place today, than of the first two. The Quartet players have improved very much in their ensemble, and some of them in their individual playing. A Quartet by Mozart opened the concert. It was the one in E flat, No. 4, which we know well here in New York, as you Bostonians probably do too. I know no better way to characterize it than by the expression of a friend: "It is like a clear blue eye, so open, honest, and untroubled." The good sense and taste which the performers had shown in selecting a composition which was within scope of their powers, was amply rewarded by their success in rendering it. The cheval de bataille of the entertainment was Trio No. 2, by Rubinstein, with which I was highly pleased. There is a freshness, a vigor in the works of this young composer, that speak of a healthy heart and mind, and a delicious originality of effect, without any apparent searching for it. I liked best the first part and the Scherzo, while the Adagio was the least interesting. This piece was very well played. Mr. Mason played two solos: Liszt's Rhapsodie on Hungarian airs, and a Valse de Bravoure of his own, both of which we have all heard before. Miss BRAINERD sang a Grand Aria from the Freischütz, Cherubini's Ave Maria, and, in answer to an encore, a merry Sleighing Song. The first was admirably rendered, and showed to best advantage her full, rich, true voice. The effect was spoiled in a measure, however, by the English words, and the impression weakened by her giving the rather trivial Sleighing Song immediately after. The Ave Maria would have been very satisfactory, had Miss Brainerd omitted the trills. They were very indifferently executed, and were a blemish on the whole. Mr. BEAMES' accompaniments were, to say the least, very indifferent. I wonder how Miss Brainerd could sing as well as she did to them.

BOSTON, FEB. 2, 1856.

A DOUBLE COMMEMORATION.—Sunday, six days past, was a great anniversary in the Musical Calendar: no less than the Centennial Anniversary of the birth of WOLFGANG AMADEUS MOZART, who was born on the 27th of January, 1756, and died Dec. 5, 1791, having in the brief space of scarcely thirty-six years become the great musician of his age,—as some think, the musician of all times before and since his own day,—at all events the artist who summed up in himself all that already had been achieved in music in all its forms, sacred, dramatic, instrumental,—a great original creator in them all,—a man who made music as spontaneously as others breathe or walk, whose exquisite or grand creations came to him at one inspiration, whole and perfect. That short life gave the world for an immortal heritage the Don Giovanni, Figaro, Idomeneo, Zauberflöte, and so many other glorious operas; the Requiem and twenty other Masses, with all the smaller forms of music for the church; the great orchestral Symphonies in C (to be played to-night), in G minor, in E flat, such favorites in the concert room, with nearly twenty more less generally known; those models of perfect beauty in the shape of string Quartets, Quintets, and all forms of Chamber Music, Sonatas for the piano, songs, Concertos, pieces for all combinations of instruments, too numerous to mention. If he was greatest in Opera, he was great in all these, and well may his Russian biographer (though almost a fanatical worshipper of his hero), call him "the universal musician."

Our columns for four years have contained so much in appreciation of the works of Mozart, that we need not here enlarge upon the debt the world of music owes to him. Yet we celebrate the event by commencing on our first page to-day a translation of M. OULIBICHEFF's statement of his mission on this earth, having heretofore prepared the way by a translation of the same writer's "Review of Music before Mozart," by which we are enabled to station him and see him in his true place in the progress of our Art.

At such a season it is well to refresh our memories with the living word, to listen to some of the great composer's noblest harmonies; and such an opportunity is properly afforded us by the sixth and last of our Orchestral Concerts to-night, which, occurring between the birthday of MOZART and that of MENDELSSOHN (to-morrow, Feb. 3d,) is properly devoted to the performance of compositions by these two great masters.

Of FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY, too, there is no need that we should now discourse. We have published his biography in full, with numerous critical estimates of his individuality and of many of his works. That he possessed creative genius, in the strictest, fullest sense, like Mozart, is not universally acknowledged among musicians; but that he had the artistic temperament in the most rare degree; that his whole life was the type of the true musical Artist and Poet in these days since BEETHOVEN; at all events that he was a model of pure and complete artistic culture; and that his exquisite creations will long charm and refine the world, there can be no denying. He too had done all his great work at an age when many gifted or aspiring natures have scarcely got ready to begin, in a short life of not thirty-eight years. He was born Feb. 3, 1809, and died Nov. 6, 1847.

We trust the syren of Italian opera has not such an unrelaxing spell over the brains and senses of our music-lovers, that they can omit to spend an evening with MOZART and MENDELSSOHN in the Music Hall tonight.

Italian Opera.

The account for the week past contains nothing that was new as respects the music, much that was interesting as respects the singers. Linda di Chamounix, that pretty and picturesque little opera of Donizetti's, interesting less by its music, than by its Swiss, domestic subject, and the pleasant contrast of its numerous principal characters, including the naive pathetic, the romantic and the comic, owed its main interest to the debut of our own ELISE HENSLE, in the chief rôle. Much as our expectations had been raised by her answer to the sudden call upon her for an Adalgisa, they were more than fulfilled this time. Timid and constrained at first appearance, and somewhat lifeless and heavy in her movements on the stage, she yet charmed by the simple, modest beauty which became the part of the young peasant girl, as well as by the sweetness and purity of her somewhat slender tone, and the refined truthfulness of each little phrase, whether of recitative or song. She soon grew mistress of herself, her fine eyes lighted up, gesture and movement became more free, the voice firmer, and to the end she sang all admirably, while her action fell little below the mark required, if it had not all the élan, the abandon of experienced prima donnas. Abandon, indeed, is a redundant characteristic of Italian singers; most of them, male singers especially, run it into the ground, following, like hounds or race-horses, the ab extra spur and stebo of the clacque rather than the instinct of fitness. Of the two, we must prefer under-acting to over-acting, provided truth of sentiment and good taste pervade it, as they did Miss Hensler's Linda. In her second act, and in the crazy scene and restoration, she made some quite impressive points. In the fine dress of the scene in Paris, her whole appearance was lovely. Her singing only wants more strength. A voice more pure and musical, more sympathetic, more evenly developed, an intonation more uniformly true, an execution more neatly finished and expressive we have seldom listened to. We have much to hope from her.

A charming part, indeed, was NANTIER-DIDIER's Pierotto, the Savoyard boy. It was the ideal of the character, open-hearted, tenderly devoted, picturesque. Her marvellous contralto, which we have no hesitation in placing next to ALBONI's, is as rich, and round, and solid in its every tone, as it is large in compass; the lowest tones are firm and musical, without any of that mannish exaggeration which was wont to delight the groundlings. Her execution is simply and uniformly artistic. There is character in all she does. MORELLI sang and impersonated the old father wonderfully well, though we cannot but think he overdid the energy of the scene in which he cursed his daughter. BRIGNOLI sang very sweetly,—a little stiff in action, listless when not singing, and not losing himself enough in his part. The beauty of his voice grows upon us, and indeed shone out finely the next night in the Sonnambula. GASPARI's rich bass told well in the priest, and ROVERE, as the Marquis, (a part written for him, we are told), was in his best buffo vein. A scene or two, which we have not heard before, seemed to have been introduced in his favor. The finale of Act I., and the unaccompanied prayer (quintet with chorus) in the last act, the only noteworthy concerted pieces of the opera, were finely rendered.

On Saturday afternoon, Il Trovatore was repeated.—We have heard better performances, as a whole, than that of the Sonnambula on Monday, but never so perfect an Amina as that of Mme. LAGRANGE. In the singing it even surpassed SONTAG's, while in action it was almost as fine. With true French tact, Mme. Lagrange united lady-like dignity and ease with the naïve simplicity and freshness of the pure-souled peasant girl. Such wonders of vocalization, such bird-like ecstasy of trills, floriture, liquid sustained notes, and so forth, in the very highest register, we have never more than once or twice heard equalled. And there was truth and delicacy of expression throughout. BRIGNOLI, as we have said, sang finely, and some of the choruses were uncommonly well done. The Sonnambula will charm by the freshness and geniality of its melodies, real musical inventions, when Norma is forgotten. How superior the music—to take an opera of its own class—to Linda!

The great night of the season so far was that of Semiramide, Wednesday. This is truly a grand opera. The senses and imagination are appealed to by a great wealth of melody, instrumental coloring and gorgeous spectacle. We have had it only twice before, in the GRISI and MARIO times. But this performance as a whole surpassed those. It was amazing what a new charm was given to the whole piece by a good Arsace in the shape of Mlle. NANTIER-DIDIER, who fully shared the triumphs of LAGRANGE. It was an admirable impersonation; she looked and acted the modest, noble youthful hero charmingly. In the proud encounter with the overbearing Assur, in the reverent listenings to the high priest and participations in the solemn rites, in the fine filial tenderness toward the guilty Semiramide, it was all that could be desired; and her warm, round, rich contralto voice glided through the florid melody with surpassing beauty and distinctness. She has one of the most intelligent, expressive faces for the stage that we have ever seen, a good figure, easy carriage, a plenty of abandon without any meretricious excess, and impresses one as a thoroughly genial lyric artist. We know not who, in the same line of parts, to-day is destined to a higher name. The duet between her and Lagrange in the last act was the most perfect piece of florid vocalization, as well as expressive cantabile à deux, that we ever heard, and was most rapturously encored. LAGRANGE, although she looked not the oriental queenlike GRISI, and did not seem at first to have her full strength and health, yet looked and walked and sang and acted quite superbly. In the impassioned scene with Assur she rose to a dramatic height, and she sang all the wonderfully florid music so that it seemed the easiest melody, as if we all were of the East and to the luxurious manner born. And what sumptuous, voluptuous music it is! what an abounding wealth of melodic invention, at the same time that every character sings in the same strain, as if true to the gorgeous, purple and gold monotony of Eastern life!

We have not room to tell how well the parts of Assur and the priest Oroë were sustained by MORELLI (the best baritone after BADIALI) and GASPARI. The overture, bating some slight discord of the horns at first, was finely played, as were the rich and brilliant accompaniments generally, under MARETZKE's efficient baton. The opening vocal quartet: Di tanti Regi, went rather lamely, partly from the want of a more efficient tenor (ARNOLDI) for Idreno (a part which was curtailed even to a smaller share than MARIO took); but after that it was all smooth, all va superbo!

The great event of next week—whether first or last we know not—will be MEYERBEER's Prophète. We do not hear yet when we are to have Don Giovanni, promised in the schedule, or whether we are to have at all "The Barber," or the "William Tell," both in the repertoire of this excellent troupe. We would most heartily second our correspondent's call for the Nozze di Figaro, if we knew of any ray of hope that we might get it. But was it not a capital oversight in this troupe, with so strong a caste for Don Giovanni, and so fresh from the performance of it in New York, not to have given it last Monday night, when there was a reason for it, such as occurs once only in a hundred years! Probably there was not a theatre in Germany that night, or the night before, in which some opera of MOZART was not brought out with enthusiastic preparation.

CONCERTS.

GERMAN TRIO.—The third of the series of six concerts took place at Chickering's rooms last Saturday evening, before quite a large audience, in which we noticed a considerable proportion of Germans, and with the following programme:

- PART I.
1. Quartet. Antoine Rubinstein.
Allegro, and Scherzo. Allegro assai, molto
Lento, Allegro con fuoco.
Carl Gartner, W. Schultze, O. Eichler, and H. Jungnickel.
 2. Rondo brillant, for Piano. Hummel.
 3. Romanza. Mercadante.
La Prece dell'Orfano.
 4. Souvenir de Spa. F. Servais.
(by request) Fantasia for Violoncello.
 5. Song, "The Maid of Ganges". Mendelssohn.
 6. Fantaisie, Brillante, for Violin. A. Moesser.
- PART II.
7. Quartet, in G, minor. Mozart.
Allegro, Andante, and Rondo.
Carl Haue, Gartner, Eichler, and Jungnickel.

The stringed Quartet by RUBINSTEIN, the young pianist and composer of whom we have several times spoken as attracting much attention during the past year in Germany, was the novelty and chief attraction of the evening, at least to the many professors and cognoscenti who were present. So far as we could understand the work at first hearing, we were very favorably impressed by it. It has vigor, grace, and clearness; it is not at all outré in its character, or aiming at what is called "music of the Future;" not very strikingly original in its ideas or treatment, yet having good ideas, honestly developed, and sometimes with great beauty and subtlety of modulation. The first movement opens with a short fugue, with a marked subject, which yields well as it is pursued.

The Scherzo (of which we found it hard at first to catch the accent) is unique and interesting. The molto lento movement, with muted strings, is a piece of fine, mystical harmony, which every one appeared to enjoy. The finale did not speak so clearly to us as the other movements; it seemed long and indefinite. The Quartet was played well in parts, but suffered rather rough treatment in others. We shall be glad of another opportunity to hear it and become better acquainted with it. So, we doubt not, will all who were then present.

The miscellany of the second part exhibited the solo-playing skill of Messrs. HAUE, JUNG-NICKEL, and GAERTNER to good advantage. The violoncello solo (though we cannot get much interested in such show pieces) was executed in a very perfect style. The songs, Italian and German (the latter being that exquisite one of MENDELSSOHN'S: Auf Flügeln des Gesanges, sung in English) were given in good voice and style by Mrs. J. H. LONG.—MOZART'S beautiful Quartet for piano and strings, was played effectively by CARL HAUE and his companions.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—To our own great regret, if not that of our readers, we are unable to record anything of the sixth concert on Tuesday evening, except the programme; and we regret it the more because of one thing new to us, by a composer who, in spite of strong dislike by many, has never failed to interest us: we mean the Quartet by SCHUMANN, which we are told gave great pleasure, and which we trust will be repeated. Otherwise, too, the programme was one of interest, to-wit:

- PART I.
1. Quartet in D, No. 62. Haydn.
Allegro Moderato, Adagio cantabile, Minuetto, Finale, Allegro vivace.
 2. Ave Maria. Robert Franz.
Mrs. Wentworth.
 3. Quartet in F, No. 2, op. 41. R. Schumann.
Allegro vivace, Andante quasi variazioni, Scherzo Presto, Finale, Allegro molto vivace, (first time.)

PART II.

4. Two Canzonets:
 - a. "My mother bids me bind my hair," Haydn.
 - b. "My wife's a winsome wee thing," Beethoven.
 Mrs. Wentworth.
5. First Quintet in A, op. 18. Mendelssohn.
Allegro con moto, Andante, Scherzo, Finale, Allegro vivace.

MME. GOLDSCHMIDT'S LETTER, which we published some six months since, seems to have been little noticed by the press in this country (is it because the sympathies are so Italian?) but the English papers have had much to say about it. Among others, the Spectator, which would not be sceptical as to its authenticity, if it had copied it first from our columns, and read our introductory explanation, has the following:

LIND ON SINGING.—If the letter of Jenny Lind, published in an American paper called Dwight's Journal of Music, is not of the genuine Swedish growth, but a manufacture of the United States, the imitation is at least well conceived. We have just exactly such a criticism of the present Italian style of singing as might have been expected from an artist who is as clear, temperate, and, if we may say so, Teutonically moral in her heart, as she is popular. She is replying to some one who has asked advice for a "Miss M——," a student in singing; and Jenny Lind advises the young lady not to seek instruction in Italy, but in Paris and London.—There she will find masters who understand the beauty of real Italian singing better than vocalists who at present do the journeyman's work for Verdi; and then, the student should go to Germany to learn music. The reason for not seeking Italy is, that "only a few singers of our day can preserve their voice under the habit of forcing more sound out of their lungs than Nature intended they should."—a necessity pressed upon them by the performance of Verdi's operas. "Verdi's music," says Jenny Lind, "is most dangerous for all singing artists, and will continue to be so until the artists themselves shall better understand their own interests." And will continue to be so, we should say, until some composer shall arise who can beat Verdi on that stage where the Italian musician must always take his great trial, the dramatic stage.

It is true that Verdi is a bad artist, because he sacrifices the whole to the part, and has no respect for his workmen or his material. He resembles one of the school of painters who, having a knack at a handling of chrome yellow or some other coarse pigment, can never produce a design that is not furious with chrome yellow. It is of no use to decry him and to say that he is no artist; which is false. He has one power superior to all young composers of the day—a capacity of elocution. There is no composer who can set forth a speech with more breadth and emphasis: but he can do little else. He is the O'Connell of Parnassus, who can only employ the voice in monster speeches to mass meetings; and his vocalists must have lungs according.

Jenny Lind's advice to Miss M—— is, that she should combine Italian song and German music, "try to avoid false pathos," and try to find out "the beauty of truth." But "what is truth?" as Bacon says after "jesting Pilate." If Miss M—— could find it out, she would test pathos as well as everything else. Truth is fact, in art as well as in real life. The dramatist proposes to himself to represent the passions common to mankind, under circumstances that present them with the greatest vividness, and in the persons of those who have the least of what the painter calls "accident" to derogate from the simple and intelligible character of the common type. It is because they were so truthful, that is, so matter-of-fact, that Italian vocal artists have usually taken the first rank. They presented the commonest passions—grief, joy, anger, love—in the simplest form, coupled with a music which is peculiarly allied to the natural intonation even of spoken passion in their native land. They have been risking their lead by sacrificing many truths to one, and that nothing deeper than the truth of rhetoric. But, as Alfieri would say, the artist in Italy is not only trained, he grows. The school reproduces itself. It is interesting to see the fair Swede giving a new instance of the truth, admirably stated by Pasta in her letters to Parodi—that even the passing artist, who leaves no tangible works behind, has a permanent influence on the progress of his art.

Mr. GARRETT'S Third Concert at South Boston, is postponed till further notice, on account of domestic affliction.

INAUGURATION OF THE STATUE

THE Directors of the BOSTON MUSIC HALL with the cooperation of the Committee of the Orchestral Concerts, propose to celebrate the placing of CRAWFORD'S BRONZE STATUE OF BEETHOVEN in the MUSIC HALL, by a GRAND FESTIVAL to take place on SATURDAY, March 1st, 1856.

L'ART DU CHANT APPLIQUÉ AU PIANO. BY S. THALBERG.

As the Piano, properly speaking, cannot render that which is most perfect in the beautiful art of Singing, namely, the faculty of prolonging sounds, we must overcome this imperfection with address and skill, and be able, not only to simulate sustained and prolonged notes, but to swell them also. Emotion renders us ingenious, and the necessity of expressing what we feel creates for us resources which never occur to the mechanical performer.

With this fact in view, the distinguished THALBERG has in this work, in which he applies the art of singing to the Piano Forte, selected transcriptions from those masterpieces of the great composers, both ancient and modern, which are most particularly vocal in their effects, and adopted a simple form as the most appropriate for true transcriptions, in order that they may be within the comprehension and executive ability of young pianists, tolerably advanced. The prominent feature of these transcriptions is the singing part, the melody, to which particular attention is given, holding to that fruitful thought of a great writer, that it is Melody and not Harmony, which lives on triumphantly through the lapse of centuries.

The work is prefaced with a series of general rules in the art of singing well, to which we would direct the special attention of all those who would aspire not only to the name, but the nature of a good performer.

The following is a list of the transcriptions:

1. QUATUOR de l'Opera I Puritani, de BELINI.
2. TRE GIORNI, Air de PERGOLESE.
3. ADELAIDE, de BERTHOUD.
4. AIR D'EGLISE du celebre Chan'teur STRADELLA.
5. LACRYMOSA tiré de Requiem de MOZART.
6. DUO de Noces de Figaro, Opera de MOZART.

The Publishers call the attention of the musical profession to this work, as one eminently calculated to lighten the labors of the teacher, and rapidly advance the pupil. It is emphatically a PRACTICAL work, serving both as a Manual of instruction on the one hand, and a Text-book on the other; and it is believed that the peculiar arrangement of the work, together with the very large number of exercises and examples, presents great advantages, to both scholar and teacher, over any similar work of the kind. Teachers highly commend the work. Mr. WILLIAM MASON says it is a work unsurpassed in the language. Mr. GEORGE J. WEAVER says that it is a work perspicuous in diction, methodical in arrangement, and sufficiently copious to embrace all the essentials of the general doctrine of accord. It can be ordered through any respectable Music-seller, and will be sent through the mail on the receipt of the price, ($1.75), postage prepaid.

The Mission of Mozart.

LEADING CHARACTERISTICS OF HIS GENIUS AND HIS WORKS.

BY A. OULIBICHEFF.

No one doubts that works of genius, truly original works, reflect the image of their authors. In the main features of a prominent artist's manner, you recognize the peculiarities of his soul, the sort of impressions to which he principally yields himself, and frequently even traces of his external fortune. The greater the influence commonly, which an artist has exercised upon the taste of his age and upon the general direction of Art, the more is this individual impression visible in himself. We need no other proof of it, than that depicted with astonishing fidelity in the works of the two men, who mark, each in his way, the present musical epoch: BEETHOVEN and ROSSINI—what extremes, in good as well as bad, express themselves in these two names! Rossini, the spoiled child of his century, exuberant with health and strength, a fine-looking man, if we may trust the portraits which exist of him, upon whom fortune smiled on all sides, as his biographers assure us, lively and sparkling and volatile as champagne, fond of journeys, upon which he reaped golden laurels, that grew up under his melodious footsteps; an artist, who knew no other gods, besides success, enjoyment and money. Turn now and look upon the other musician, who remains his life long confined to one spot, where he seems to have taken root and sadly vegetated, like a sick plant; without family and almost without home environment; excluded from the world by an infirmity, which, like no other, stands in the way of sociality, to-wit total deafness; a youth, who had never had a love affair; a hypochondriac, whose soul, more like a prisoner than a dweller in a body weighed to earth by sufferings, penetrated, by the might of an exalted genius, into the mysteries of future existence, which were revealed to him in music; the most melancholy of men, who under an icy rind concealed the warmest heart and noblest qualities; a stoic upon system and a morose philanthropist upon principle.* The personalities of Beethoven and Rossini are most purely mirrored in their works. You see them, you know them, you are their most intimate and confidential companion on their life journey, while you hear them.

We comprehend these two men and musicians, who on both sides were so completely harmonious with themselves. But what do we find, if we study MOZART's character from facts and traditions? We find such a character as would seem to have proceeded from a series of psychological deductions drawn from the fabulous works of the musician; an individuality quite as fabulous; the gift of a rich fantasy, which stood ever ready at his bidding, by means of which he was enabled to give the key to a riddle, which otherwise had had none. Easily excitable senses and a philosophic mind; a heart overflowing with tenderness and a head wonderfully well organized for calculation; on the one side a propensity to pleasurable indulgence, a multitude of various fondnesses and inclinations, which characterize a sanguine temperament; on the other side that obstinate persistency in labor, that tyranny of one exclusive passion, that life-consuming excess of intellectual toil, which are the attributes of melancholy temperaments; all day long whirled away in the vortex in which he lived, and spending the night over his lamp, which the demon of inspiration held lit till the purple break of dawn; by turns overstrained and passive, hypochondriacal and droll, a devout Catholic and a merry boon companion—such essentially was Mozart, the inexplicable man, because he was the universal musician, who applied himself to his art with an energy of will amounting to self-sacrifice, while in all else he showed himself a living contradiction, weakness personified. What shall we make of such a character, and how reduce it to a unity? Where shall we discover a predominating trait, when all extremes predominate? Attempt to sketch the outline of the moral individual, with lines which cross each other as if perpendicularly! Yet only with such an extraordinary character was it possible for one man to produce Don Juan and the Requiem. Thus we perceive, that in the history of Mozart all is logical, precisely because all is wonderful.

* So his biographers describe him.

The time, in which our hero came into the world, the place of his birth, the education he received, his father, his travels seem to us in this way above all as shapings of providence, which prepared his mission, determined its nature, and with infallible foresight made its fulfilment sure.

Like the literary renaissance, of which our time was witness, so the musical renaissance made itself complete by a returning to the past. It lay in the spirit of the eighteenth century to despise the Middle Age and its creations, which were generally branded with the epithet Gothic or barbaric. But since Music is some thousand years younger than the other arts, its middle age began with the fifteenth century and ended with the seventeenth. All the celebrities of that age therefore lay forgotten under the dust of libraries, at the time of the appearance of Mozart's first masterwork, Idomeneo. BACH and even HANDEL had become almost Gothic; they were neither known in Italy nor France; in Germany they were almost forgotten, and England only cherished an enthusiasm for Handel, which had become an heir-loom or tradition, and was founded more upon his title as national composer, than upon the merit of his works. Yet, as we have already said, there is no universal scientific, artistic or literary striving, which, unprofitable as it may be for the present, can remain entirely unproductive for the future. PALESTRINA and some of his contemporaries had restored its rights to the Choral song; BACH had justified the Flemish school; the Italian masters of the eighteenth century, and above all GLUCK, had brought MONTEVERDE's speaking music into honor, which was far more tasteless than the old Choral song and Canon. So likewise what surprises us and first of all must occupy us in appreciating the style of Mozart, the great innovator, lies in his partial return to the forms and spirit of the music of the middle age, commenced by JOSQUIN, who represents the earliest effort. Not only does the canonical form re-appear in the chief masterworks of Mozart, and predominate there more or less; but he delights in reproducing the most subtle difficulties of the style, which the composers since Bach had abandoned to the theorists, and which were commonly regarded as mere difficult stupidities. We glance, for example, at that most learned violin quartet of his, which is called "the Fugue", and we remark among other combinations, worthy of a Josquin or a Bach, the subject, which is heard simultaneously, note for note, both in its original form and al riverso, (reversed):

The second musician, who makes an epoch in the annals of the Art, and with whom, according to our view, real music takes its origin, is PALESTRINA, whose Stabat Mater and Improperia he had heard performed in Rome during the Carnival week, and which he doubtless had already studied. Long banished from the secular music and the fugue, Palestrina's modulation still lived on in the Choral; but it had not preserved its old simplicity therein, and Bach, as well as Vogler, an emendator*, in that he undertook to substitute the Greek modes as a basis, sought by artificial harmony, and a choice of chords entirely unknown to Palestrina, to reduce it to the modern keys. But Mozart, who better than any other knew the power and majesty of the progression by trichords, did not hesitate to introduce it in profane music and even in the opera, with the changes necessary to render it less hard and more correct. He approached the harmony of the sixteenth century with far less constraint than Bach and Vogler, and without giving it out for Greek music, he understood how to produce effects from this bold innovation, of which the reader may judge from the sublime and universally known example, which I here place before his eyes:

Here we have a succession of Trichords, without any modal connecting links, extending to the seventh chord: a harmony entirely in the style of Palestrina.

IL TROVATORE.—From the California Pioneer, a magazine in which we almost always find something entertaining, we copy the following amusing description of an operatic performance in the city of Swineville:—

Last night, our citizens were regaled with that

*Vogler presumed to improve Bach's harmony, by making it Grecian.

chef d'œuvre of the lyric drama, "The Burnt Child, or the Harmonious Blacksmith," by Mr. Verdi. The libretto was written by the poet Dante (whose works are now a publishing in this place by subscription), assisted by his two daughters, Ann and Merca Dante. The leading characters are sustained by Mrs. Westvalley, Signor Stromboli, and Signor Badyeller, with others whose names we have not yet learned to pronounce. The orchestra is better than our own band, which consists of seven accordions and a base flute. We had a large and brilliant house, newly shingled for the occasion; and all the accessories were perfect, including the public lorgnette, which was one of Dolland's best night glasses, arranged upon a stand in the middle of the house, so that the audience could look through it in rotation, merely by going up a short ladder. We will give in a few words the outline of the plot:—It seems there had been an old grudge between Mrs. Stromboli and Mrs. Westvalley, about a preserving kettle which the former had borrowed of the latter and returned badly fractured. Mrs. Westvalley being of a hasty, passionate disposition, immediately caught up Mrs. Stromboli's child (as she thought) and threw him into the fire, which, being of large hickory logs, and very hot, consumed him before she had time to reflect. She discovered afterwards that it was her own child she had destroyed, and felt really sorry; so by way of atonement, being really a good-hearted woman, she took another child who happened to be in the house, and brought him up like a good mother, as she was; mended his stockings, sent him to school, and tipped him regularly once a quarter.

All this amiable story was only by way of introduction, and in the first act two bellicose individuals appear, with an extensive plume apiece, and most truculent raiment, each of whom reveals to a large and discriminating audience, in the presence of the other, the secret of his love for the prima donna, a practice which in private life would cause some bitterness of feeling, but which, upon the stage, only tends to additional harmony. It is doubtful for some time which of these feathered songsters will prevail, but finally the barytone (Count Moon) gets the better of the tenore, in spite of his tin helmet, and he is carried off to prison. Mrs. Westvalley, for some inscrutable reason, is put into irons and sent off somewhere into the wings, by a large and efficient singing police force, also in tin helmets. Then comes in the prima donna (Leonora) who seems to have a great deal to say, though nobody knows where she came from or who she belongs to. She appears to be a very unhappy young woman, alternating some time between difficult solos and still more difficult pedestrian feats, and finally going off into a "cadulcion," after what appears to be a frantic attempt to climb into the second story window of somebody's private residence, and the curtain goes down upon the dreary scene. The plot is somewhat obscure thus far, but it is beautifully cleared up in the second act, by the appearance of several blacksmiths judiciously clad in armor, who, assisted by the orchestra, commence vigorously hammering upon their respective anvils, but without the intervening piece of hot iron generally used upon such occasions, whereat the Swinevilleans marvelled greatly. After this grand mechanical display they all disappeared, but soon rushed in again armed with swords; and not having their temper sweetened and subdued by the chastening influence of Christianity, they immediately commenced a free fight. It suddenly occurred to them, however, to sing a trio and chorus, which had such a moving effect that they all vanished, forgetting all about the "scrimmage," thus proving conclusively the power of music upon the savage breast. In the next place Count Moon enters, and barytoniously bewails, until Mrs. Westvalley comes in and kindly informs him, by means of severe vocalization and some help from the orchestra, that his rival, whom he has just hanged, is his own brother, and the identical child who so narrowly escaped roasting in the prologue. His emotion at these pleasant tidings is "right smart," and he is obliged to titillate his nose with a lace pocket handkerchief, take several manly strides, and sing a song of considerable length before he can compose himself. Then she takes her turn, and goes off into a paroxysm; but she soon finds that violent gesticulation will not do, because the shackles are too large for her wrists, and she is afraid her irons will drop off, so she subsides into such a magnificent solo that we are all compelled to cry bravo, regardless of gender. Captain Cognosco, the chief of our dilettanti, who was just out of peanuts, commenced applauding in the middle of a shake, and could only be induced to desist when she had finished her cadenza. About this time they all settle away upon the stage with more or less violence, and expire, one after the other, in the flower of their youth, leaving the audience much affected at their untimely fate, although they are nothing but foreigners. We suppose for an instant that they all died like Lord Lovel, of pure sorrow, but are speedily enlightened by a couple of arpeggios from the fiddles, one of which clearly but concisely informs us, that the female party has just poisoned herself with ratsbane, and the other explains that the male party have all punctured the aorta. Notwithstanding they are all dead, very dead, we persist in calling them out, and they have a sort of apotheosis, with the aid of holyhocks and spring onions, and we all go home refreshed and contented.

Where all was so perfect it would be invidious to particularize, but we cannot refrain from commending Mrs. Westvalley, for the foreshortening of her left arm in the grand quintette between herself and Stromboli in the second act. The chorus also deserve great credit for the admirable precision of their gestures, first with the right hand, then with the left. There was a brilliant effect produced by one of the heavy hammers, which came off the handle and rattled upon the feet of the scaly-breeched warriors, causing some unexpected gyrations. We must not overlook some faults, the effect of a too hasty preparation. Capt. Cognosco remarked that Mrs. Westvalley looked badly about the fetlocks, and had the effect generally of not being well groomed; and the voice of the prima donna, whose name we have forgotten, was a little husky, which, we learn, was caused by eating too much coarse corn bread for supper. Mrs. Westvalley's voice is mezzo allegretto, of great power and brilliancy, though somewhat shaky in the da capo notes. We also noticed a muffled tone, which was caused by her wearing a night cap on the stage. Signor Badyeller is a robust barytone, of great power and pre-eminence, whose only faults are those of youth and inexperience. He is only sixty-five, and will improve as he grows older. Signor Stromboli was most excellent in the vocal passages, though his singing was decidedly bad. The orchestra was perfect as a whole; but we think the instrumental parts had better be omitted. The brass was metallic, and there was an unpleasant toughness about the strings. We also noticed a reedy tone in one of the clarionettes. To conclude, we fully agree with Captain Cognosco, that as a whole it has never been equalled, and only surpassed by Ossian's Bards and New England Warblers.

Critics differ in their estimate of Mr. Verdi, as a composer; for our own part, we incline to the opinion that his style has a great many beauties and an equal number of defects. The tout ensemble of his compositions is remarkably fine, though the effect altogether is a decided failure. He has a great majesty of rhythm, with an easy and graceful flow of staccato, and his monotones are full of brilliant and fanciful variety. His sostenuto passages are also much admired for their brevity, and some of his minor chords have a very bold and martial character. On the other hand, he has been accused of introducing too much rigmarole. His style is full of abrupt and startling transitions; for instance, where the chorus leave off blacksmithing and go to fighting and singing at the same time; and his recitative is at times deficient in pathos. The intervals between the acts are too long, and some of his finest passages are liable to be forgotten. His crescendo sometimes degenerates into a mere swell, and his diminuendo has been very justly accused of tapering. — Tomorrow night we are to have Hogarth's grand opera of "Cantharides," and the first act of "Nebuchadnezzar don't know, sir," in which will be introduced the popular Scotch song of "Erin go Braugh."

How they manage refractory Singers in Mexico.

[From "Crotchets and Quavers," by MAX MARSTREE.]

As another instance of Mexican law and Mexican justice, I may mention, that as often as a vocalist got really, or imaginarily, or wilfully sick, and necessitated a change in the performance which had been announced for the evening, it was the unfortunate manager who was fined $100. In vain was it, that I represented to the Governor of the State, and even to the President of the Republic, His Excellency Senor General Arista, that the guilty party was not the manager. In vain did I endeavor to make them understand, that if the artist himself was the party who had to pay the fine, it was more than probable that the artist would manage to avoid getting sick, or at any rate so sick as to necessitate a change of performance after the bills of the evening had been published. The only answer which I received from them, was this—

"That the Representatives and the Senate of the Republic could alone modify or change the laws."

Nevertheless I must exculpate the Republic of Mexico from the charge of treating the artists altogether with an unfair degree of leniency. As a proof of the fact that it does not, allow me, my dear sir, to relate an incident which happened towards the close of the second season's subscription.

Signor Salvi had indulged in some of the usual flirtations (which unindulged in, it would be impossible for an Italian tenor to exist) in Mexico. Anxious to display his equestrianism before the eyes of his fair Senora, he purchased a horse, and intended to exhibit himself in all his beauty and glory, astride of it, in the Paseo. Unfortunately for me, he had not displayed his equestrianism for more than two hundred yards, when his Bucephalus (a remarkably quiet one, by the by), alarmed by the bright eyes and flirting fan of some passing Senorita, started and reared. Unable to keep his seat, Salvi fell from his steed and managed to break his arm. He was immediately carried home, where the physician who was called in to him declared, that although there was not the slightest danger, it would very certainly be six weeks at the least before he could again appear upon the stage. With this announcement, all my reasonable prospects of continuing my campaign successfully, vanished; for it cannot be denied that Salvi was one of my leading attractions. At all events, I endeavored, as far as was in my power, to remedy this unforeseen misfortune for the time being. The opera announced for the same evening was Donizetti's "La Favorita." As I knew that Forti had frequently sung this part before, and had even requested it of me, as a favor, I went to him and asked him to be kind enough to undertake it.

Knowing it would be utterly impossible for Salvi to appear for several weeks, he believed that his time had arrived. At any rate, he showed his inclination to vault into the throne which had heretofore been occupied by that tenor.

Point-blank, he refused to sing upon this evening. His excuse was sickness.

But, as if determined to show me that this was not the actual reason, and, at the same time, to demonstrate that if not a better vocalist, he was at any rate a better rider than his rival (if, indeed, Salvi could be called the rival of any tenor who has been in this country, with the solitary exception of Mario), he went on the very same evening, on horseback, to the neighboring village of Tacubaya.

Going immediately to the Governor, I informed him of what had happened. He chanced to be in a good humor, and permitted me to give a miscellaneous concert on that evening, instead of the opera which had been announced, without paying the customary fine of $100. In the mean time, four soldiers with a corporal, the usual operative quota, were posted at the Gate of Mexico on the road to Tacubaya. Instructions were given them to wait for the return of the willing absentee from his operative duties, and to bring him as soon as he entered the city before the Governor.

The concert took place during his absence, and I am obliged to say that the audience, having heard of Salvi's accident, bore Forti's absence with the most exemplary equanimity.

During the whole night, the non-commissioned officer, with his four men, waited for the refractory tenor. At about nine o'clock on the following morning, he returned. He was in fine spirits touching the trick which he had played me, and was humming, as I was afterwards told, one of the very airs from "La Favorita," which he had so decidedly declined singing. As he entered the city, the corporal strode before him.

"You are the Senor Forti?" was the soldier's address to the vocalist, as he laid his hand upon the bridle of his horse.

"Yes! my good fellow, I am."

"Dismount, then."

"But—"

"Dismount!"

"My dear sir, what on earth does this mean?"

"Dismount!"

"Allow me to ask—" commenced the trembling tenor.

"Dismount!" repeated the corporal, "or I shall be obliged to make you."

The miserable Forti was compelled to obey the imperative order addressed to him, by a man to whom, twelve hours before, he would not have spoken a single word.

Then, he was placed between two of the soldiers, while the two others led his horse between them.

"Dios e Libertad!" said the corporal reverently, but without removing his shako, as, in obedience to his orders, they began to march through the streets of Mexico towards the Deputacion, as the City Hall is there called.

When arrived there, the tenor was immediately carried before the Governor.

What was my astonishment, on learning that without a trial, and even without a hearing, he was condemned to a fortnight's imprisonment.

This order was at once carried into execution. Without giving him time even to change his clothes, permitting him to get clean linen, or to remove the spurs from his boots, he was hurried off to the common jail. Here he was thrust into the society of all the robbers, thieves, leperos, and other scoundrels, who had incurred the notice of the Mexican law. Delighted with his company, these respectable gentlemen disburdened him in the first fifteen minutes that he spent amongst them, of his watch and chain, money, rings, spurs, cigar box, pocket handkerchief, riding whip, gloves, and other supernumerary articles, as they conceived, in such an establishment.

Now this was a just visitation, I will not deny, upon Forti.

But you must observe that his punishment fell with double weight upon my shoulders. Salvi, with his broken arm and confined to his bedroom, might reasonably grumble. While Forti in prison, and thrown among such company, was certainly to the full as much to be pitied. But the miserable manager appeared to me to stand in the least enviable situation. He had by far the worst in the matter. They could not sing, while he was unable to give opera. Their only answer was required by him, personally. His excuse must be given too, as it was demanded by his subscribers.

Of course, we all visited the unfortunate Forti, bearing with us tokens of affection as well as of pity and condolence.

One bore him a box of fragrant Havanas. Another contributed a cold roast turkey to his creature comforts. This one carried him a bottle of brandy, and that one sent him a half dozen of champagne. But, ere our interview with him had terminated, these had all vanished. His associates in the interior of the prison laughed at the sympathy of his friends without the walls. They held the doctrine of a community of property amongst the compulsory inhabitants of that enforced Republic (let me here exclaim "Dios e Libertad!") and appropriated to themselves a large proportion of these gifts, as soon as he had received them. Some devoured the turkey, and others drank the champagne. These emptied his bottle of brandy, and those made free with the cigars. Nothing was left of them save the bones, the bottle, and the box. It was in vain that a Paté de Foie gras was contributed to the list of his imprisoned enjoyments. They had cleaned it out while his back was turned and he was talking to his benefactor. Uselessly was a cold haunch of mutton sent him. In ten minutes he could only contemplate the dish upon which it had erewhile stood.

Meanwhile, pitying him and myself too, I, the miserable manager, had besieged the Governor with supplications for his release.

With great exertion, the permission for the release of Forti was obtained by me, on such evenings as his performance might be required. On these occasions, he was accompanied by four soldiers, who brought him to the theatre and delivered him into my hands, half an hour or an hour before the opera commenced. At the conclusion, they marched him again off to the jail. Pity for Forti, after this, gained fast upon my feelings. Rehearsals were arranged, which necessitated his presence, and he was kept out of his enforced residence for the whole of the day. However he had still to sleep under lock and key. At length, upon the fifth day, by dint of the most unremitting exertions, I obtained from the President himself the remission of the remainder of his term of imprisonment, or, rather, its commutation into a fine of $100.

After this, Forti never afterwards missed a performance in Mexico for sickness (!) or any other cause.

MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS AT BARBERS' SHOPS.

—In the sixteenth century a lute or viol, or some such musical instrument, was part of the furniture of a barber's shop, which was used then to be frequented by persons above the ordinary level of the people, who resorted to the barber either for the cure of wounds, or to undergo some surgical operation, or, as it was then called, to be 'trimmed'—a word that signified either shaving or cutting and curling the hair; these, together with letting blood, were the ancient occupations of the barber-surgeon. The setting of fractured limbs was practised by another set of men called 'bone-setters.' The musical instruments in the barber's shops were for the amusement of waiting customers, and answered the end of the newspaper of the present day.—Sir John Hawkins.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, FEB. 4.—Last Friday a complimentary concert was given to Mr. J. KYLE, the flutist, in acknowledgement of his long artist-activity in our city, by some of the first merchants, artists, literary men, etc.. The programme was curious in quantity as well as quality. It consisted of no less than seventeen numbers, which were executed by a variety of resident artists, and consisted of the most miscellaneous styles of music. There was a good attendance, and all admired the beautiful new hall of the City Assembly Rooms, where the concert was given, and which, in point of tastefulness and decoration, as well as acoustic advantages, approaches more nearly to your Music Hall than anything of the kind we have heretofore attempted. All went well, so well that the lengthy programme was still more drawn out by numerous encores. The novelty of the evening was the debut (before a New York audience, at least) of Miss ELLEN BRENNAN, a favorite pupil of BADIALI, who has instructed her for the last two or three years. Very youthful and pleasing in appearance, and gifted with a fresh, fine and flexible voice, the young lady did her teacher much credit in the duet from Figaro, which she sang with him, as also Rode's Variations, which called forth an encore. Some timidity was observable, particularly in the first piece, but this was natural on the occasion, and is a fault which every re-appearance will remedy. Success to the young artist, who, as we know from good authority, devotes herself to her Art with all truth and earnestness and loves it with her whole heart and soul!

Next Friday, the 15th inst. there is to be a charitable concert, in behalf the German Ladies' Society for Widows and Orphans, of which I will give you due notice. I mention it beforehand, in the hope of inducing some of your New York readers to attend, if not for the object, still for the entertainment, which will be quite an inducement in itself. Miss BRAINERD, Messrs. WM. MASON, TIMM, FEDER and SCHMITZ, Mr. EISEL and his Quartet party, and the German Liederkrantz, have kindly promised their assistance, and the programme will offer various attractions. We hope to see the hall spoken of above well filled on this occasion.

BERLIN, Jan. 14. (From a private letter.) We went to hear Beethoven's Fidelio. It is by far the greatest opera, with the exception of Don Giovanni, I have ever heard. The music is most exquisite. Frau KÖSTER was the Fidelio, and she sang and acted most charmingly. The music is rather high and very difficult to sing; the time of the concerted pieces is particularly difficult, and they were not perfectly well performed. But that splendid orchestra surpassed everything I have heard in the accompaniments throughout. The house was not overflowing, but the audience was intensely enthusiastic.

The opera of Tannhäuser is having a great run at present, and we have found it impossible to get tickets at a reasonable sum. Tickets are bought up by speculators; they have charged from four to six dollars for them, and there have been full houses at these prices. I do not think this opera house, although so much larger than the Boston Theatre, will seat any more persons; and the more I look at it critically, the more I think of "the Boston" in comparison.

To-night we went to the Theatre, which we found rather small, somewhere between the Museum and the Boston Theatre, the seats comfortably arranged in the parquet and three galleries, the decorations simple and tasteful, the stage scenery and accessories very complete. The play was Shakespeare's "Taming of the Shrew," but so clipped and changed, that it was difficult to recognize it. Of course I could not understand half that was said, but the actors were all excellent, and I found a great deal of amusement, particularly in the comic characters; one man's face was so droll that I shall not soon forget it. There was no orchestra, and nothing between the acts upon the stage. As soon as the curtain dropped, the audience stood up and talked, or went out to the refreshment room. Everything was very quiet and orderly—more so than in any theatre I was ever in. The performance commenced at seven, and ended at half-past nine.

On Wednesday, P. M., we all went out as usual to Liebig's Symphony Concert, and enjoyed a splendid programme. First the march in "Midsummer Night's Dream;" then an overture of Beethoven's; the finale to Don Juan, including the Minuetto, Trio, Graveyard scene, &c.; then a Symphony by Schubert, and a Symphony in E flat, by Haydn, that was very beautiful. This garden concert brings all the American gentlemen out. One-half the audience at least, are ladies, and they almost all have knitting or embroidery, and work away, nodding their heads to the time of the music, except at intermission, when they drink beer and talk very fast.

Saturday evening, we went to the concert given by the Dom or Cathedral choir, in the Sing-Akademie. It was one of a series of subscription concerts, which, as they are patronized by the king, are of course fashionable. We found it impossible to get seats anywhere but in the gallery, which we liked very much, as the music sounded finely up there, and we had a grand view of the audience, which looked very much like a fashionable audience in New York or Boston, with the exception of the military trappings, which are always glittering in all the public assemblages here. The hall is very tasteful, and admirably constructed for sound in the form of two cubes. The King's box is on one side of the hall, and is really a large room, lighted by chandeliers. He was not present, but the ladies of his household were there, attended by gentlemen in military dress. The choir is composed of thirty men and fifty-six boys. They sang compositions of Palestrina, Scarlatti, the two Bachs, and Franz Schubert. The music of the two first very old authors (two hundred years at least,) sounds very odd and peculiar to a modern amateur, at least an American. But that of Schubert and Nicolai was enchanting. You can hardly conceive of the perfection which this choir have attained by constant practice of this kind of music. All their voices harmonize so beautifully, that they sound in the loud passages like one great instrument; their diminuendo is wonderful. The concert was not long—no entertainment is made so here. People get just enough without being tired out.

London.

By last accounts Mme. JENNY LIND GOLDSCHMIDT was still singing in one or the other of the three great oratorios, "Elijah," the "Creation," and the "Messiah." The Spectator places her above CLARA NOVELLO as a Handelian singer, and says:

Jenny Lind's singing in The Messiah was the greatest of all her efforts. She rose with the loftiness of her subject, and delivered the inspired language of the musician—grandly interpreting the sacred text—with an inspiration akin to his own. Her distinguishing characteristic has always been, on the stage as well as in the concert-hall, reality, depth, and intensity of feeling. It was this that gave such lofty beauty to her portraiture of the self-devoted Alice, and threw such affecting pathos into the sorrows of the heart-broken Amina. Her voice, as a musical instrument, has been equalled; but as an organ of expression, probably never. Its very tones are often full of tears. Its mere sounds thrill upon the heart and rouse sympathetic emotions. It has power, sweetness, volume, flexibility,—qualities possessed by many; but it penetrates the soul as no voice has done that we have ever heard. It penetrates the soul because it is the voice of the soul; it stirs the inmost heart because it is from the inmost heart that it flows.

She produced numberless fresh and unexpected beauties by the expressive utterance of a single word. But her great triumph was in "I know that my Redeemer liveth." It was not mere singing—it was a fervid outpouring of faith, hope, and joy, which it would be vain to endeavor to describe, because we have never anything in music like it or comparable to it. It is perhaps scarcely necessary to add, that her purity of style was as remarkable in this as in her previous performances. She gave the text of Handel without a note of display or ornament; justly conceiving that its best ornament lies in its divine simplicity.

Mme. Goldschmidt has also commenced some concerts of miscellaneous secular music, with programmes similar to her American ones. At the first, given in the Hanover Square Rooms, which was crammed, she sang the prayer from the Frey-schütz; the scena from Beatrice di Tenda; a selection of four Mazurkas of Chopin, arranged for voice and piano by her husband; "John Anderson," and the Swedish "Echo Song"—as if to represent all styles and suit all tastes. Herr Otto Goldschmidt played on the piano Beethoven's Concerto in G; Mendelssohn's Capriccio in B minor; and a Sarabande and Allegro from one of Bach's Suites de Pièces. Herr Reichardt sang from Mozart's Seraglio and from the Huguenots, and the orchestra, under Benedict, played the overtures to Figaro and to Medea.

The Queen entertained her guests at Windsor Castle on New Year's Day with a performance of Mehul's sacred drama of "Joseph." A new English version of the text had been written by Mr. Bartholomew. The performance was conducted by Mr. Anderson, director of the Queen's private band. The principal characters were sustained by Clara Novello, Sims Reeves, Weiss, Benson, &c. &c., with a chorus and orchestra 140 strong. Several classical works have in the same way been first made known in England under the auspices of the Queen and Prince Albert; for instance, the Edipus and the Athalie of Mendelssohn.

The oratorios "Elijah" and the "Creation" were last month performed by the Sacred Harmonic Society (with Clara Novello, Miss Dolby, Sims Reeves, &c.) Costa should have conducted, but was ill, and M. Sainton took his place.—"St. Paul" was given on the 16th by Mr. John Hullah; principal singers, Mme. Weiss, Miss Primer, Sims Reeves, Buckland and Weiss.

The Piano-Forte Concerts of Mr. W. H. Holmes, assisted by his professional pupils, offer quite a novel programme, to wit:

The following works will be performed, many new to this country, and others rarely performed:—Concertos: Benedict's, in A flat; Otto Goldschmidt's, in B flat; Schumann's in A minor; Ries', in A flat; Steibelt's Mount St. Bernard; Reinecke's in G minor; Herz's 4th in E; concert pieces in G and D minor, Schumann in E, J. W. Davison; A minor, G. A. Macfarren; "Florestan and Eusebius," and F sharp minor, Schumann; F sharp minor, Brahms; E minor, Rubenstein, &c.; "Whispering Music;" "Fairy Fingers," "Midnight Reverie," concerto "Consuelo," W. H. Holmes; 3rd concerto sinfonia, Litolf, &c.

BERLIN.—Tannhäuser, after several years of fruitless negotiation, has at last found entrance to this operatic capital of Germany. It was performed there for the first time on the 7th ult., and tickets sold by speculators at $4 to $6. Has the Barnumbian epidemic broken out in Berlin? At all events we understand that not a little intrigue and "high pressure" has been used there to get up this un-German sort of excitement about Wagner's work.—Those who would know how this "Art-work of the future" seemed in the greatest German theatre, may form some idea, (perhaps one-sided,) from parts of a criticism in the Süd-Deutsche Musik-Zeitung, which we translate:

"The effect as a whole was not convincing; indeed it did not equal my expectation. For the preparations were more formidable than would be possible in any other place; the caste was the strongest to be found, and within a few years the number of musicians of the future has greatly increased in Berlin; there were at least a hundred of them, all resolved to take hold of the work with all their strength. The outfit was pompous, not to say lavish; it must have cost $30,000. The decorations were so artistically beautiful and historically true, that it was worth while to go to the opera for them alone.

"This very exhaustive use of outward means, unless I err, serves only to put the work more in the shade. The works of our classical masters have taught us that what is truly beautiful and deep and great will even in modest representations reveal the inextinguishable traces, and grows infinitely as the representation becomes more complete. Not so the music of Wagner and his friends. For this there are two stumbling blocks; to-wit, with small means the impossibility, and with large means the overdoing of performance. The new direction (school) always insists on having its ideas embodied on the greatest possible scale, and charges all its failures to theatres of the second or third rank. Berlin has set all doubts at rest on this point, but not to the satisfaction of the Wagnerites.

"Hence it always seemed to me a vain fear, which sought to close the way to Berlin against Tannhäuser. Had it been given here for a year and a day, together with the Holländer and Lohengrin, and even letting Liszt direct with all his energies, the case would have been the same.

"At the conclusion of the overture the trombones made a truly barbarous tumult. The whole first act fell powerless, even the phrases, which elsewhere have excited some attention in the public, were received with indifference;—and indeed, the more select and tasteful were the costumes and decorations, the more the music was obscured. The most injurious agent in the matter was the orchestra. The Berlin orchestra, that glorious body of tone, is evidently the greatest enemy that Wagner has; for while it does as it should and must, it one by one annihilates his splendid inspirations. Of the chorus of the guests at Wartburg, for instance, there was nothing to be heard but here and there a tone, and yet the chorus was more than a hundred persons strong. So too for a minute at a time you would see the open mouth of Johanna Wagner (Elizabeth), but whoever heard her strong voice must have been blessed with better ears than your poor correspondent and many fellow sufferers. Whoever thinks it must have sounded more splendidly here than elsewhere in the orchestra, is much mistaken; only the beautiful is capable of being made more beautiful through superior means, and not the overwrought and trivial. To the superior means you must add the superior public; both united yield a result which will greatly damage the new tendency. Berlin does not waver to and fro as easily as the Art-loving portion of a smaller Residenz or a provincial town. . . . The Elizabeth and the Venus found excellent representatives in Johanna Wagner and Herrenburger-Tuczek; in the singers generally, and especially in Herr Fornes as Tannhäuser, there was much room for criticism.

COLOGNE.—Among the larger vocal compositions recently produced was a "Requiem for Mignon," by R. Schumann, which was found excellent, but filled all with sadness at the thought of the composer's malady. Three of the greatest artists here have become deranged: Lenau, the poet, Schumann, the composer, and Rethel, the painter. . . . Marschner and his wife have been in Cologne; the former produced the overture to a Märchen, and the latter sang an original concert aria. . . . The Soirées for chamber music have commenced with excellent programmes. . . . The Männergesang-verein sang some new pieces at their first concert, including some quartets by Niels Gade, which, though finely rendered, were received coldly.

PARIS, Jan. 7.—Last week Tedesco appeared for the first time as Fides in the Prophète, and was received with "storms of sincere applause;" it is said she compares well in this part with her predecessors, Alboni and Mme. Stolz. . . . The Opera Comique expects a new work from Auber, who is confined to his chamber, having had his foot crushed under the hoof of a dragoon's horse. He enjoys the visits of Rossini, who is living very quiet and retired. . . . At the Théâtre Lyrique Mme. Pouilley succeeds Mme. Cabel, and made her debut as Jaguarita. . . . It is thought that Halevy will soon succeed Auber as director of the Conservatoire.

During the past year there have been produced in Paris not less than 295 new dramatic works. The Grand Opera has given three new operas and one ballet; the Théâtre Français seven comedies and two dramas; the Opera Comique nine comic operas; the Odeon one tragedy, ten farces and two dramas; the Italian Opera three works; the Théâtre Lyrique nine; &c., &c. Alas! the list of deaths is as great as that of births. The cradle was the coffin to most of these works!

MUNICH.—During the past year, Tannhäuser has been played ten times, often at advanced prices; Nicolai's "Merry Wives" seven times, and the Prophète six times. The number of new pieces was thirty. . . . A scholar of Liszt, named Pruckner, is creating an excitement by his fine playing.

WEIMAR.—Don Juan was announced for the 100th anniversary of Mozart's birth, for the first time with the original recitatives. . . . Berlioz is expected on the 8th of February, to conduct, as in former years, the concert of the Orchestral Pension Fund, and bring out his entire Faust in four parts. Also his Benvenuto Cellini, revised, will be produced at a festival on the 16th.

DRESDEN.—Among the new works produced here has been "The Goldsmith of Ulm," a romantic popular ballad, with songs and choruses, text by Mosenthal, music by Marschner. The simplicity of the poetic treatment is praised. Of the music, several numbers, as the market chorus, the accompaniment to the dance of gnomes, &c., were highly successful, while on the whole a want of characteristic melody was felt.

LEIPZIG.—Some time ago, at the theatre, Mozart's Figaro was given with more than usual success. Mlle. Neubold, as Cherubino, obtained great applause. She is becoming a favorite with the public, which she well deserves, since, every time she appears, a marked improvement is visible both in her singing and acting. The house was but scantily attended, although Figaro has not been given for some years. On the 3rd ult., Madame Schumann (Clara Wieck) and Herr Joachim gave a soirée at the Gewandhaus, and fully justified their high artistic reputations. The first of the annual quartet soirées came off on the 8th ult. Madame Schumann performed Beethoven's grand sonata in B flat, Op 108, with wonderful success. On the 18th ult., the Gewandhaus programme embraced—PART I.—Overture, King Stephen, Beethoven; Aria, I Montecchi, Mlle. Parisotti, from Rome; Concerto violin, Vieuxtemps, performed by Concertmeister Dreychock; Canzonetten, with pianoforte accompaniment, sung by Mlle. Parisotti, Wichmann. PART II.—Overture, Die Hebriden, Mendelssohn; Duetto, Semiramide, M. Eilers and Mlle. Parisotti; Symphony (No. 3), C minor, Spohr.

Mlle. Parisotti, from Rome, appeared for the first time, but she did not make any impression. She still has much to learn before she can be fit to sing at public concerts. Herr Dreychock was loudly applauded in the concerto by Vieuxtemps, and the orchestra was as usual, excellent. At the eighth concert Madame Schumann performed one of her husband's latest productions—Introduction and Allegro Appassionato—concertstück for piano with orchestra. She also played Beethoven's E flat concerto. This lady is the favorite of the Leipzig connoisseurs. She was heartily welcomed, and her performances elicited the most extravagant applause.

The rest of the eighth concert comprised the overture to Oberon; aria from Figaro, sung by Madame von Holdorp; duetto from ditto, by the same, with Herr A. Eilers; and Schumann's C major (No. 2) symphony. Madame Holdorp possesses no particular merit as a singer, which was proved by the unsatisfactory manner in which she sang the aria. The orchestra again left nothing to be desired.

The king's birthday was celebrated at the Conservatoire on the 7th inst. The hall was crowded, and some of the pupils performed various morceaux from classical composers.

On the same day the theatre was illuminated, and Weber's Jubel overture was played by the band. Mlle. Franke, representing Saxonia, before the commencement of the play, came forward and recited a prologue, written by Theodor Apel for the occasion. The play given was, Ein Deutscher Krieger; or, a German Warrior. Mendelssohn's Antigone has been brought out at the theatre with great success. Linda di Chamouni has also been given.

Last Orchestral Concert.

The sixth and last concert proved a worthy and successful tribute to the memories of the two musicians, MOZART and MENDELSSOHN, whose birthday anniversaries occurring in the week suggested a programme made up wholly of their compositions. The audience, which had steadily increased with every concert, far outnumbered all its predecessors; and there was an interest, a profound attention, an enthusiasm from the beginning to the end, such as we have not witnessed in any concert of the winter. All seemed to enter into the spirit of the occasion. Upon the front of the stage stood the wreathed busts of the two composers, and the whole place and assemblage wore a festal aspect.

The selection of pieces contained nothing that was not excellent and of enduring interest, nothing trivial or flashy, and nothing on the other hand that could be found heavy or de trop. Necessarily the choice was limited to a very few works of each, but those were truly representative creations, particularly in the case of Mozart. In the great Symphony in C (which it was an English notion, before BEETHOVEN, to call "Jupiter," or king of symphonies), especially in its last movement with the fourfold fugue,—and in the Zauberflöte overture (his last secular composition, written but a few months before his death in 1791), Mozart has bequeathed as it were the last result and perfect flower of his consummate learning and musicianship as well as of his spontaneous and poetic genius. These works, now a century since their author's birth, and more than half a century since their composition, pass as perfect in their kind,—and it is a kind in which dwells the essence of nearly all that was great in all kinds up to his time and since. (We mean, speaking of music as an art; of course there have been creations since these, and indeed creations of his own, embodying a deeper and a greater spiritual experience.) The performance of the Symphony was the purest achievement of our orchestra thus far; indeed it was by all odds the best performance which that Symphony has ever yet enjoyed in Boston. All was clear, well balanced and well blended; the outline of the whole and of each intermingling motive and each accessory phrase nicely preserved, as well as the luscious wealth and warmth of coloring from the reeds and brass, which have to take an equal share, according to Mozart's wont, in the most intellectual conversation. This was surely no small thing to do in that last movement; we have never seen an audience so attentive and so interested in a piece so extremely complex. But when it is so well played, the simple, appreciable beauty of the result is equal to the complexity of the means. The chemistry is forgotten in the beauty of the rose. There is a joyous geniality, too, predominating in this symphony, a real Don Giovanni-like tone of abandon and festivity in the bold opening and the end, as well as in the happy Minuet and Trio, which puts an audience in the best humor. The Andante Cantabile alternates from grand to lovely, and reveals the human and the superhuman, the tenderness and the superstitious awe as of one standing on the brink of the Infinite, the "night-side," as it has been called, of his nature.

Between this and the overture, the duet: Cruel, perché, from the Nozze di Figaro, sung very pleasingly by Mrs. LONG and Mr. WETHERBEE, formed an agreeable relief. If any thought the lady's part lacked feeling, they must remember the situation of the parties: the Count is serious, Susanna, gay at heart, pretending to be so.

The Zauberflöte overture was on the whole played as effectively as we have ever heard it, though not in all points as nicely as by the smaller Germania orchestra. The very quick time, combined with the forzando in the little fugue theme, made it impossible (we have always found it so more or less) to catch that little turn of four notes; the sharpest ear could not resolve the nebula into more than three or even two stars; the forzando was too rude, jerking away your attention from all else. With this usual exception, the overture came out splendidly; we do not remember to have heard the brass (trombones) so reinforced before, but they made music and not noise. Thus ended the first part with a pretty vividly refreshed and edifying sense of what we owe to MOZART.

The selections from MENDELSSOHN, if less complete, were characteristic and beautiful and various. The Capriccio Brillant, in B minor, has been pronounced the most difficult of all his works for piano and orchestra to render effectively. It opens with a beautiful and pensive Andante, in broad arpeggio chords, and soon passes into a quick, nervous, delicate Rondo Allegro, much in the same vein with the finale to the G minor Concerto. In subjects, treatment, harmony, instrumentation it is thoroughly Mendelssohnian, full of his melancholy tenderness, yet fiery persistency. Mr. J. C. D. PARKER has hardly the strength for a great Music Hall performance; a chamber concert is much more his element; yet he played it with taste and feeling, in parts with delicacy and distinctness, while in others, particularly the rapid florid passages, the outline seemed a little confused; nervousness and the vast place might account for that, however. The effort was conceived in an artistic spirit, and was generally and warmly applauded.

In the vocal part Mendelssohn was represented in one of his greatest moments, much more than Mozart had been. The great air from "Elijah": Hear ye Israel, with what follows, is about as beautiful and grand a thing as he has written for the singer, and JENNY LIND preëminently was that singer. Who that remembers the celestial purity and tenderness of her voice in that exquisite melody, and the sublime declamation, as of a voice of good cheer from above, of the sentence: Thus, thus saith the Lord, Be not afraid! can expect to be so inspired by mortal song many times in one little life? To expect the same excellence from one of our own singers, who has had only the opportunities of culture which this place affords, were quite unreasonable. Yet to Mrs. LONG we feel indebted for great pleasure in that song. The first melody she sang sweetly, and she threw a good deal of force and abandon into the last; her high tones, as always, were clear and telling; her rendering conscientious; but it lacked more inspiration, more refinement and coloring as it were of tone, especially in those emphatic high tones, which were somewhat hard and crude, when they should have shone with a fine star-like purity in the clear heights of song. Compared with almost any of our usual oratorio solos, the rendering was superior.

No American audience is yet musical to the degree that it will bear two whole Symphonies on the same evening; accordingly Mendelssohn in this great form, in which he has written at least two master-works, (three, if we count the Symphony Cantata: "Song of Praise,"—and why not, as much almost as Beethoven's "Choral"?) was represented by the two most interesting movements from his "Italian" Symphony, in A major, the "Scotch" symphony, in A minor, having already figured in the second concert of this series. The sombre, meditative Andante, with the wind instruments intoning a melancholy hymn-like tune, or dirge, while the strings keep up a running staccato accompaniment, with solemn tread of basses, is quite impressive, and really gives the idea of one moving amid the twilight glories of the past, in some silent old cathedral, as it were. It was finely rendered by the orchestra; and so was the wild, delirious Saltarello, the Italian dance, passing anon into the complete abandon of the Tarentella, which the tone-poet reproduces as they might haunt his brain in exquisite, sad, feverish dreams.

The "Wedding March" recalled the music most peculiarly his own, that of the "Midsummer Night's Dream," and made a popular and enlivening finale to an unusually choice and well-relished feast of harmony.

We have yet to cast a glance back over this important series of concerts, too soon closed, and read the lesson which they yield us with regard to our orchestral, or let us rather say, Symphony concerts in the future. Meanwhile the next great event to which we all look forward is the Beethoven Festival upon the first of March. With that in prospect the spirit of such things cannot die out.

Italian Opera.—Third Week.

At length we have had a good performance of Don Giovanni in Boston. We say a good performance, since there was no part bad,—a thing which could not be said of any previous performance which we have ever witnessed, of this best of all the operas. In the first days of it in Boston, TRUFFI made a Donna Anna pleasant to remember, but BENEVENTANO was a coarse, loud blustering Don, not half so gentlemanly as his knave, the Leporello of SANQUIRICO; and FORTI for his Ottavio merited the fate he found in Mexico (if Maretzek's book be true); BOSIO was the ideal perfection of Zerlina, but none of her companions does one care to recall; insignificant or shocking some of them. SONTAG was a good Zerlina, too, but the Donna Anna was naught. GRISI was a noble, a superb Anna, and MARIO's Il mio tesoro divine, but BADIALI made a clumsy Don; and for the rest, the less said the better. This time we had no Grisi, no Bosio, no Mario; but of the eight important parts, all found fair representatives, and the performance, as a whole, whatever might be thought of it in Germany, was far more satisfactory than any ever given here before.

Sig. MORELLI was of course far enough from realizing Mozart's ideal of the splendid roué; but he came much nearer to it than any we have seen upon our stage before; much nearer than Badiali, not only in the fact that he looked and acted it better, handsomer, younger, sprightlier, with some courtly ease and dignity of manner, as well as with something of that insinuating address, which is supposed to have broken so many hearts; but also that he sang it better. BADIALI's baritone was too ponderous, not equal to the subtle, intellectual grace of the music, which Morelli rendered with artistic understanding, and very effectively. For the first time we heard the champagne song: Fin ch'an del vino, dashed off with the true spirit, and not overdone. He sang the serenade, too, finely, and in the tremendous last scene, with the ghost, his defiant Parla, parla, ascoltando qui sto, rang out richly and musically enough. Sig. ROVERE is a true Italian buffo, perhaps the best specimen of that type that we have had, and possibly for German ideas, his Leporello humor may have seemed too broad. We must say we enjoyed this Leporello more than any of his predecessors, however. He acted finely in the first scene, and, indeed, throughout, never losing an opportunity, and true always to his part. He has a good bass voice and sings well; but sometimes with him the drollery is at the expense of the music—that music which is so fine in itself, that the ear is avaricious of each note of it, and would not have one pushed aside by the laughs and extra admiration points of the funniest actor in the world. Herr MUELLER, like a loyal German subject of Mozart, was quite at home and faithful in the part of the Commendatore. He has a round and telling bass, and used it discreetly. In the first scene, where the old man falls under the sword of Don Juan, he acted well, and for the first time in our recollection that wonderful trio of bass voices was sung distinctly and effectively. Herr Müller was not "made up" well for the statue; that dull, grey, leaden color poorly answered for the white man of marble; but his solid, marble tones told most impressively in the scene where he claims the culprit; he wants, however, a few stronger sub-bass tones.

Having begun with the men, let us finish. SIG. SALVIANI justified the good impression we received of him, in the ungracious part of Pollio. As a singer, he is far from being a MARIO or a SALVI; his Il mio tesoro was infinitely short of Mario's, yet he sang it by no means badly; he shows himself the artist throughout in his singing; his voice is rich, manly, of good volume, and his method sound; he is plainly past his prime, however, and has to husband his power carefully; accordingly, a good sostenuto is the chief desideratum in his singing; he touches the note with certainty and leaves no doubt of its intention, but lets it vanish away instantly; he seems to make a virtue of necessity in rendering so many passages staccato; these are literally his short-comings. Take it throughout, we have scarcely had so unexceptionable an Ottavio. He helped to make the first scene, with Donna Anna over the dead body of her father, unusually effective; we lost less than usual of the wondrous beauty of the music in that hurried scene. And it was no small gain to the general effect to have for once the part of Masetto filled by a singer of such positive power as Sig. GASPARDONI. His fine large bass voice and his hearty way of entering into the spirit of his part and of the whole play, went far to place what has hitherto been a cypher on the telling side. How often it happens that truth and excellence in some modest accessory adds incalculably to the effect of a whole!

With five good male parts, three distinguished prime donne made the personnel uncommonly complete. Mme. DE LA GRANGE was really an admirable Donna Anna; she only lacked the natural warmth of voice and the larger style of beauty of GRISI, to equal her in some parts. To give all its majesty and loftiness of passion, for instance, to the great recitative and aria: Or sai chi l'onore, she must make more effort than is consistent with the (not the less impassioned) repose of high Art, just as in her Norma and Lucrezia. But she conceives it perfectly, and both her action and her singing were a masterpiece to be remembered. Her first scene, over her dead father, could not be much better. The air above-named was splendidly sung. She made the Donna Anna a great part, and made its high spiritual tone rule throughout the play, which many audiences have failed to recognize before; and what contributed not a little to this result was her not omitting (as all our Donna Annas have before) the great air: Non mi dir, which was never before sung here except by JENNY LIND once or twice in concerts. Why this song was announced as "The Letter," we know not. It is properly addressed to her lover, supposed to be present in person and urging the fulfilment of their union; she, poor lady, feeling that her life is for another world, tenderly, religiously resists his importunity. But inasmuch as it would be awkward and too much even for Ottavio's patience, to stay upon the stage merely as listener to this long song, it seemed not a bad device that she should hold a letter in her hand to justify its introduction in his absence. Mme. Lagrange sang it almost to perfection; it closes with a very high and somewhat bravura passage, suited to her best power; and if her voice in the simple cantabile parts is hardly so rich or sympathetic as we could wish, we forget it almost in the admirable good taste and finish of her art. In Mme. LAGRANGE you always feel that the use is greater than the material used; and that marks the artist. Continually she seems rather to pursue a voice than to possess it. Ideally she has it, substantially it is wanting, except just enough to indicate by purest outlines what it fain would be. The effort, however, succeeds at some sacrifice, and leads into what is the only real fault in her singing, that of an habitual tremolo or shakiness of voice in the strong passages.

For the first time, also, we have had a good Elvira. Miss HENSLEER looked, acted, sang the part with more truth and refinement than any who have attempted it before. She is the first Elvira who has conducted herself sensibly upon the stage here during the impertinence of Leporello's "Catalogue Song," repulsing and turning from him, as if absorbed in her own griefs. She sang all the music sweetly, tastefully, expressively, and only wanted more power of voice to compete with other voices, and a too loud orchestra, in the Trio, and the serenade, and supper scenes.

DIDIEE made a charmingly pretty and coquettish Zerlina; her native French vivacity and roguishness gave the part a somewhat different coloring from Bosio's; but it was almost as perfect in its way. She sang the music beautifully, especially the song Vedrai Carino, in which her exceedingly rich mezzo soprano tones came admirably in play. Didiée's mezzo soprano plainly is her natural voice, and one of the very richest and most musical we have ever heard; her lowest contralto register, which she uses in such rôles as Pierotto, and Orsini, and Azucena, is the artificial part. Compared with the husky, mannish low tones of most of the strong contraltos who have been here—all perhaps except Alboni's—her's seemed round and musical at first; but this beauty does not grow upon us. In Zerlina there was no such exception to the rare beauty of her organ, and she won, next to Lagrange, the best share of the honors of the evening.

With such singers the concerted pieces all went better than usual; especially that wonderful quartet, and the trio of maskers, which we never heard so well sung the first time, and it was still better in the repetition. The famous Sextet, too, came out more symmetrically and intelligibly than heretofore. The chief wants were of scenery and outward accessories. The latest part of all was the finale of the first act, the ball scene, owing to the want of dancers, and the music was curtailed somewhat. The unsurpassingly rich and genial instrumentation was well rendered in most parts, yet in some parts there was carelessness, and too little sympathetic deference to the voice. But the at once delicious and wierd music of the graveyard scene, and the terribly sublime finale, were remarkably well done.

The audience in numbers and enthusiasm was worthy of this fine performance; it was by far the largest and the most enthusiastic audience of the season, and leaves no excuse for repeating inferior works in preference to Don Giovanni.

We have begun with the most important, with the highest moment. We must go back a little. Since our last review, La Favorita, Linda (for the second time), and Lucrezia Borgia have been performed. We were only able to be present at the last. The performance is chiefly memorable for LAGRANGE's Borgia and DIDIEE's Orsini. Both impersonations were of a very high order; that of Lagrange intrinsically the greatest, that of Didiée most popular, because the multitude love strong, low tones, and a voice generally of so much positive musical substance as Didiée's, and because the character is a picturesque one, and she looked and acted it so gracefully and cavalierly. She sang the drinking song wonderfully well, and was obliged to sing the first verse three times over. No one ever sang Lucrezia here so transcendently as Lagrange. Sig. BRIGNOLI sang the music of Gennaro very sweetly, but too feebly for the usual effect of the great trio, which suffered also from the dry and lifeless baritone of Signor CASPIANI; whose voice however is above the average in power and quality, and who sings correctly, but makes a very stiff and mechanical duke Alfonso. GASPARDONI's strong voice did excellent service in the important and secondary rôle of Gabetta, and the orchestra and chorus made the ensembles as effective as ever.

Next week we shall have to speak of the long promised Prophète. This afternoon, Semiramide again. One more extra week will prolong the ecstasy of the devoted opera-goers, for which the programme will be found below.

INAUGURATION OF THE STATUEBEETHOVEN.

THE Directors of the BOSTON MUSIC HALL with the co-operation of the Committee of the Orchestral Concerts, propose to celebrate the placing of CRAWFORD'S BRONZE STATUE OF BEETHOVEN in the MUSIC HALL, by a GRAND FESTIVAL to take place on SATURDAY, March 1st, 1866.

The Festival will open with a Poetical Prologue, written and recited by WM. W. STORR, Esq. The Prologue ended, the Programme will be as nearly as possible the following:

Overture to Egmont—Grand Aria from Fidelio—Fantasia for Piano, Chorus and Orchestra—Adelaide song—First movement of Violin Concerto—and the CHORAL SYMPHONY.

As the Festival is consecrated to the memory of the greatest of Composers, and as it is the first time that a Statue of a great artist has been erected in America, the Committee hope there will be shown among the members of the musical profession a desire to assist in the said celebration, and will gratefully receive any proposition from individual artists to that effect.

In behalf of the Committee,
CHARLES C. PERKINS, Chairman.

Secured seats to the above named Festival will be ready for sale at Richardson's Musical Exchange, No. 282 Washington street, on and after Monday, Feb. 4th, 1866. Price of Tickets One Dollar. The diagram of the house may be seen at the above named place.

NEW COURSE OF HARMONY,

The Publishers call the attention of the musical profession to this work, as one eminently calculated to lighten the labors of the teacher, and rapidly advance the pupil. It is emphatically a PRACTICAL work, serving both as a Manual of instruction on the one hand, and a Text-book on the other; and it is believed that the peculiar arrangement of the work, together with the very large number of exercises and examples, presents great advantages, to both scholar and teacher, over any similar work of the kind. Teachers highly commend the work. Mr. WILLIAM MASON says it is a work unsurpassed in the language. Mr. GEORGE J. WESS says that it is a work perspicuous in diction, methodical in arrangement, and sufficiently copious to embrace all the essentials of the general doctrine of accord. It can be ordered through any respectable Music-seller, and will be sent through the mail on the receipt of the price, ($1.75,) postage prepaid.

The Mission of Mozart.

LEADING CHARACTERISTICS OF HIS GENIUS AND HIS WORKS.

BY A. OULIBICHEFF.

MOZART cherished a remarkable contempt for all written theories. In one of his letters he says: "Pretty stuff we should make, my dear, if we did as the books lay it down for us." He could afford indeed to say so, since he possessed a living theory, which contained in itself all cases, rules and exceptions. His ear taught him to break through all the limits, which the narrow view and systematic spirit of the theoreticians had prescribed to modulation. Every given point I overstep, just where I will and as I will, and if I cannot actually overstep it, then I do like the Olympian racers, leap in one period to the extreme opposite end of the horizon of modulation. So thought, so acted Mozart. He used very sparingly, and therefore always with the most sure success, the enharmonic progression, whose misuse in music is as convenient as it is far from edifying; but sometimes we see him bring about the simplest transition in a way that shows more genius than all the \flat s in the world replaced by all the \sharp s in the world, to the great wonder of the ignorant. * * *

Formerly the fuguists modulated very cautiously and carefully. They moved step by step, from one resting point to another, from one key to its next related, and were as far from taking any leaps, as a grave magistrate of that age, going up the steps to the council house. Certain passages of the bass, certain combinations of the perfect chord with the chord of the Seventh gave you well known series sanctioned by the theorists. But with Mozart it was hard to anticipate any thing, or lay down any rule upon this point. His work upset all the old prescriptions for the composition of a fugue, and MARPURG would have rubbed his eyes, could he have seen such new harmonic and contrapuntal analysis of the theme, as we might cite from Mozart. * * *

Who could count the abominations which the learned ones of that day might have found in the finale to the Symphony in C? How the fearful fugue with four subjects must have heated their poor brains! This was neither BACH nor HANDEL, it was none of their acquaintance; it was MOZART. Where could they have found a measure for him, who had shattered their square and compass? Some of their criticisms have come down to us as monuments of their confusion; the fragments which we have cited above, will suffice to give an idea of the difference between the old fugue (strict and regular) and the free fugue of Mozart, which does not subject itself to the methodical periods of the class and admits mixture of style. When we spoke of unity with variety as essential conditions of the fugue, we recognized that variety involved two principles: canonical imitation and contrast of melodies. Bach had exhausted the first means; Mozart understood how to win an advantage from the second, which contributed more than all else to lend to music a new organization. Mozart, who was a not less sharp-sighted canonist than Bach, but who was much more inventive and incomparably bolder, wove into the contrapuntal web melodies so different from one another, that one hardly conceives it possible that they could legitimately stand side by side; and when the eye has finally convinced itself, one still asks whether it can satisfy the ear. A pardonable doubt, which the execution soon turns to enthusiasm. This finale consists of four themes, which surely do not look as if they were made to dwell together. Let the reader convince himself:

* Omitted here on account of length, and as being too scientific for the general reader.—TRANSLATOR.

At the end of the piece the composer brings them all four forward, and the answer to no one of them is wanting. The union of imitation and contrast certainly could go no further.

With such modulation, full of boldness and of genius; with such freedom of style, such incredible power of combinations; with themes so opposite in character and outline; with an orchestral accompaniment, in fine, consisting of from fifteen to twenty voices and instrumented after Mozart's manner, the Fugue must naturally have expanded its effects and rendered itself applicable far beyond the utmost limits ever dreamed of by the contrapuntists old and new. The fugue is no longer the mere abstract expression of some sort of emotion; it can become picture, translate itself into action, paint a battle or anything that is positive, without any danger of falling into that kind of music which requires a programme.

To keep to our example, what then is this finale to the Symphony in C, which dazzles those who read and makes the hearer dizzy? It seems to me, that this Allegro is the sequel to the Grave (representing the emerging of Order out of Chaos) with which "The Creation" of HAYDN begins. Light has illumined the abyss; the laws of creation are in full force; suddenly the elements, indignant at the new yoke, attempt a gigantic revolution to win back the old anarchy. Fire, Air, Earth and Water one by one desert their appointed places and commingle in the vortex, in which the germinating Order seems to sink forever; a sublime spectacle to contemplate, like every great rebellion of matter against mind, its ruler. But this propensity to relapse into chaos has been foreseen; it serves, like order itself, the final ends of the eternal wisdom. The elemental forces may melt in one inextricable mass (the fugued portions of the piece,) but they hear a voice which calls to them: "Thus far and not farther," and in a moment all is disentangled, and the young universe comes forth victorious and beautiful from the midst of this frightful confusion (the portions composed in the melodic style upon the same motives.)

Here we see the fugued style come out from the psychologically indefinite and abstract expression, within which it had so far confined itself, and by its union with the simple style, produce splendid analogies, to which neither the one nor the other could have attained singly. In this way Mozart seems to us the last word of the Flemish school, the primitive tendency of musical Art. Bach, who perfected the Fugue, so far as it was possible within the strict limits and the partially conventional forms, which the contrapuntists of the seventeenth century had prescribed to him, lifted the style to a very lofty height of grandeur and of science. Our hero enhanced this grandeur and this science by the wonders of his orchestral accompaniment and by the expansion which he gave to the principles of contrast. He understood how to make the fugue in the highest degree melodious and expressive, while he made it free. The old scholastic mould broke in pieces in his hands, and out of its ruins sprang its last and richest treasure, the queen of fugues, the work of works, the overture to Zauberflöte in a word.

Who could have believed, that even the strict and literal Canon, under Mozart's pen, could develop itself in periods of grace and elegance, and occasionally with all the passion one could possibly infuse into any opera aria or masterpiece of pure melody? A pathetic Canon! One must see such a thing to believe it. (Example omitted.)

Here counterpoint and expressive melody, poesy and calculation become one, just as two centuries earlier we have seen music in the state of Art and in the state of nature, that is to say harmony and melody, meet and blend in the Romanza of WILLIAM BIRD. * * *

Free as melody itself in its progressions, canonical counterpoint from this time forward mingled itself more or less in all our hero's works, beautified or strengthened everywhere the musical expression, lent a lasting value even to the lightest things, accommodated itself with equal pliancy to the sublime as to the graceful, to the tragic as to the comic, created a multitude of new analogies, of picturesque accessories and psychological nuances, only possible with its aid, and always found again, if need were, its abstract depth and its old church significance, expressed with all the severity of the old forms. The fugues of the Requiem are as methodical as those of Bach and Handel.

The seventeenth century brought as its contribution to the musical reformer its choral melodies, those truly Christian melodies, so totally distinct from the flat opera song, which afterwards supplanted them, without any coloring, and miserably harmonizing with the Latin of the Mass. Mozart sought out these venerable melodies in Rome; he enclosed them in the frame of the thorough science of a German organist and surrounded them with the treasures of his instrumentation, like a setting of sparkling gems; and the church music rose in the Requiem to the highest place, whence its vocation is to rule the entire Art movement, of which it forms an unmoveable pole.

It was important also to take into council the Italian melodists, who mark the transition from the seventeenth to the eighteenth century. Mozart had to thank them for more than one useful and valuable lesson. Some of his duets with canonical progression remind one of the Cantatas of ALESSANDRO SCARLATTI, which were arranged for two voices by DURANTE.

A Letter from Mozart.

The Musical Review, in which we find the following, says very truly: "We do not know of any biography of this distinguished composer, of any document he has left us, which gives such an insight into the character and artistic feelings of Mozart, as the following hitherto unknown letter to the Baron V——, which we translate from the German. It was probably written from Prague, Bohemia, in 1790 or thereabouts." The Review, however, is mistaken in supposing it hitherto unknown. A translation of it appeared in 1840 in the London Musical World, which states that it was written in 1783. A portion of it, in which Mozart describes his habits of composition, has been already copied in this Journal.

Here, my dear Baron, you receive back your scores, and if you should find more windows (marks like X to indicate faults) than notes in it, you will soon find out why. The ideas in the symphony have pleased me best; but yet it will make little impression, for there is too much in it, and it sounds in parts just (with your permission) as an ant-hill would look. I mean to say, there is a little too much of the devil in it. You must not be vexed with me, dear friend, else I shall regret ten thousand times having spoken out so honestly. At the same time, you ought not to be surprised at this; for it happens something the same to all those who have not, as boys, often experienced the trainings of Masters Lash and Thunder, and who afterwards will go on from talent and inclination alone. Some do it pretty correctly, but generally with the ideas of others; they themselves have none; others, who have got their own ideas, can not master them—that's the case with you. But, for the sake of holy Cecilia, don't be cross with me for my bursting out with this! However, the song has a fine cantabile, and that dear Miss Franzl shall sing it to you very often—something I should like to hear and see, too. The minuet and quatuor look also pretty finely, especially from the place where I have put a tail to it. The coda, however, will make more noise than music. Sapienti sat, and also to the nihil sapienti—I mean myself, who can not write very well about such things; I had rather do them.

I have kissed your letter several times, it pleased me so much. Only you should not have praised me so much; in hearing it, one gets accustomed to it, but it won't do to read. All of you like me much, you good fellows! I am not worth it, and many things also do not deserve it. And what shall I say of your present, my dear Baron? That came as a star in a dark night, or as a flower in winter, or a glass of Madeira after a spoilt stomach, or—or—well, you may fill it out yourself. God knows how I am harassed sometimes, in order to gain a poor living, and Stänerl* must also have something. Whoever told you that I had become lazy, I entreat you, dear Baron, to box his ears for my sake. I would work for ever and ever, if I could make only such music as I like and can make, and of which I think something. So I have made, three weeks ago, a symphony, and to-morrow I write again to Hofmeister,† to offer him three quartets with piano, if he has money to buy them. Oh! if I were a rich man, I would say: Mozart, write me what you like, and as good as you can; you don't get a cent before you have finished it, but then I buy from you every manuscript, to prevent your selling it like a fish-wife. How sad I feel sometimes about this, and then again wild and savage. Then I do things, it is true, which I should not do. Look, dear friend, so it is; and not as ignorant or bad people have told you.

But enough of this; and now I come to the most difficult point of your letter, which I would rather not touch at all, because my pen can not answer it. But I will try it, even if it were only to make you laugh.

How am I at work when I compose and write great things?

Truly, I can not say it myself, for I do know no more about it than yourself. When I am quite alone and in good spirits—for instance, on a journey in a travelling-coach, or after a good dinner; in taking a walk, or at night-time, when I can not sleep—then the ideas come like streams, and best. Why and how, I do not know, nor can I prevent them. Those which please me, I retain in my head, and hum them sometimes, as people have told me. In doing so, very soon it occurs to me how one or the other idea may be used, to make a pie out of them according to counterpoint and the sounding of the different instruments. That warms me up, provided I am not disturbed; then it becomes greater and greater, and I spread it out more and more large, and there is more light. Indeed, the thing becomes almost complete in my head, even if it is quite long—so complete, that I can look over it at once like a fine picture, or a handsome man. And I do not hear then the bits one after the other; no, I hear the whole all together. That is a feast! All the finding and making is done as if I were in a beautiful strong dream. But the hearing of all, thus together, is still the best. What has come in this way I do not easily forget, and that is, perhaps, the best faculty God has given to me. When I come, afterwards, to write it down, I take from the sack of my brains what I had collected there before. And therefore it is put quickly on paper; for, as I told you, it was already finished; and it seldom becomes other than it was before in my head. This is the reason that nothing disturbs me when I write: there may be going on around me what there will, I write still; can even have a chat besides, as about geese and chickens, and this and that. But why, when I compose, my things get an appearance and manners like myself, and not like another person, is most probably for the same reason, that my nose is long and crooked; in short, is like Mozart's nose, and not like other people's. For I do not intend to have any peculiarity, and could not even give a description of mine. I think it is quite natural, that people who have really something of their own, must look differently, internally as well as externally. At least, I know that I have given to myself neither the one nor the other.

And now I have finished, my best friend; don't think that I finish for other reasons than that I do not know any thing more. You, a learned man, can not imagine how difficult it has been for me to say so much. Others I would not have answered at all, but would have thought—'pscha!'

I did not make much in Dresden. People there think they still have the best, because years ago they had something good. Besides a few persons, they almost did not know me, with exception that, as a boy, I had given concerts in Paris and London. Opera I did not hear, as in summer the Court is in the country. In the Church, Naumann caused me to hear one of his masses; it was fine, correct, and large, but, as your C——would say, 'a little cool,' something like Hasse, but without his fire, and with newer melodic phrasing. I played a great deal to the men, but I could not make them warm, and, beyond mere politeness, they did not say much. They begged to play the organ also. It was an uncommonly splendid instrument. I told them, as it is true, I had little practice on the organ, but yet I went with them to the church. There I saw that they had another foreign artist, whose instrument was the organ, and who was to put me down. I did not recognize him immediately; he played very well, but without originality or imagination. Then I tried to do my best. I concluded with a double fugue, perfectly strict, and played very slowly, in order to enable them to follow me through all the parts. Then it was all over with the others: no body would play. But Hässler—(that was the name of the foreigner; he has written good things in the style of the Hamburgian Bach,) he was the most faithful of all, although I had given it to him. He jumped for mere pleasure at my neck, and wanted to kiss me. Then I took him to my hotel—the others would not come, although I invited them friendly—which caused the lively Hässler to say 'Zounds!'

Here, best friend and protector, the sheet is full; the bottle of your wine, which must do for to-day, will soon be empty. Since my request for his daughter, to my father-in-law, I have not written such a long letter. Don't be cross with me. In speaking and writing, I must be myself, or hold my tongue and throw away my pen. My last word shall be: My best friend, keep your love for me. Oh! could I bring you some day such happiness as you have brought me! Well, I drink my own glass and say, Vivat, my best, faithful Baron. Amen.

MASTER HUGUES OF SAXE-GOTHA.

BY ROBERT BROWNING.*

1.
Hist, but a word, fair and soft!
Forth and be judged, Master Hugues!
Answer the question I've put you so oft—
What do you mean by your mountainous fugues?
See, we're alone in the loft.
2.
I, the poor organist here,
Hugues, the composer of note—
Dead, though, and done with, this many a year—
Let's have a colloquy, something to quote,
Make the world prick up its ear!
3.
See, the church empties a-pace.
Fast they extinguish the lights—
Hullo, there, sacristan! five minutes' grace!
Here's a crank pedal wants setting to rights,
Baulks one of holding the base.
4.
See, our huge house of the sounds,
Hushing its hundreds at once,
Bids the last loiterer back to his bounds
—Oh, you may challenge them, not a response
Get the church saints on their rounds!
5.
(Saints go their rounds, who shall doubt?
—March, with the moon to admire,
Up nave, down chancel, turn transept about,
Supervise all betwixt pavement and spire,
Put rats and mice to the rout—
6.
Aloys and Jurien and Just—
Order things back to their place,
Have a sharp eye lest the candlesticks rust,
Rub the church plate, darn the sacrament lace,
Clear the desk velvet of dust.)
7.
Here's your book, younger folks shelve!
Played I not off-hand and runningly,
Just now, your master-piece, hard number twelve?
Here's what should strike,—could one handle it cunningly.
Help the axe, give it a belve!
8.
Page after page as I played,
Every bar's rest, where one wipes
Sweat from one's brow, I looked up and surveyed
O'er my three claviars, yon forest of pipes,
Whence you still peeped in the shade.
9.
Sure you were wishful to speak,
You, with brow ruled like a score,
Yes, and eyes buried in pits on each cheek
Like two great breves, as they wrote them of yore
Each: side that bar, your straight beak!
10.
Sure you said—"Good, the mere notes!
Still, couldst thou take my intent,
Know what procured me our Company's votes—
Masters being lauded and scollists shent, Parted the sheep from the goats!"
11.
Well then, speak up, never flinch!
Quick, ere my candle's a snuff
—Burnt, do you see? to its uttermost inch—
I believe in you, but that's not enough.
Give my conviction a clinch!
12.
First you deliver your phrase
—Nothing propound, that I see,
Fit in itself for much blame or much praise—
Answered no less, where no answer needs be;
Off start the Two on their ways!

* From "Men and Women," a new volume of Browning's Poems, published by Ticknor & Fields.

13.
Straight must a Third interpose,
Volunteer needlessly help—
In strikes a Fourth, a Fifth thrusts in his nose,
So the cry's open, the kennel's a-yelp,
Argument's hot to the close!
14.
One diserteates, he is candid—
Two must discept,—has distinguished!
Three helps the couple, if ever yet man did:
Four protests, Five makes a dart at the thing wished—
Back to One, goes the case banded!
15.
One says his say with a difference—
More of expounding, explaining!
All now is wrangle, abuse, and vociferance—
Now there's a truce, all's subdued, self-restraining—
Five, though, stands out all the stiffer hence.
16.
One is incisive, corrosive—
Two retorts, nettled, curt, crepitant—
Three makes rejoinder, expensive, explosive—
Four overbears them all, strident and strepitant—
Five.... O Danaldes, O Sieve!
17.
Now, they ply axes and crowbars—
Now, they prick pins at a tissue
Fine as a skein of the casuist Escobar's
Worked on the bone of a lie. To what issue?
Where is our gain at the Two-bars?
18.
Est fuga, volutur rota!
On we drift. Where looms the dim port?
One, Two, Three, Four, Five, contribute their quota—
Something is gained, if one caught but the import—
Show it us, Hugues of Saxe-Gotha!
19.
What with affirming, denying,
Holding, dispoosing, subjoining,
All's like.... it's like.... for an instance I'm trying...
There! See our roof, its gilt moulding and groining
Under those spider-webs lying!
20.
So your fugue broadens and thickens,
Grentens and deepens and lengthens,
Till one exclaims—"But where's the music, the dickens?
Blot ye the gold, while your spider-web strengthens,
Blackened to the stoutest of tickens?"
21.
I for man's effort am zealous.
Prove me such censure's unfounded!
Seems it surprising a lover grows jealous—
Hopes 'twas for something his organ-pipes sounded,
Tiring three boys at the bellows?
22.
Is it your moral of Life?
Such a web, simple and subtle,
Weave we on earth here in impotent strife,
Backward and forward each throwing his shuttle,
Death ending all with a knife?
23.
Over our heads Truth and Nature—
Still our life's zigzags and dodges,
Ins and outs weaving a new legislature—
God's gold just shining its last where that lodges,
Palled beneath Man's usurpature!
24.
So we o'er-shroud stars and roses,
Cherub and trophy and garland.
Nothings grow something which quietly closes
Heaven's earnest eye,—not a glimpse of the far land
Gets through our comments and glozes.
25.
Ah, but traditions, inventions,
(Say we and make up a visage)
So many men with such various intentions
Down the past ages must know more than this age!
Leave the web all its dimensions!
26.
Who thinks Hugues wrote for the deaf?
Proved a mere mountain in labor?
Better submit—try again—what's the clef?

'Faith, it's no trifle for pipe and for labor—
Four flats—the minor in F.

27.
Friend, your fugue taxes the finger.
Learning it once, who would lose it?
Yet all the while a misgiving will linger—
Truth's golden o'er us although we refuse it—
Nature, thro' dust-clouds we fling her!

28.
Hugues! I advise med pond
(Counterpoint glares like a Gorgon)
Bid One, Two, Three, Four, Five, clear the arena!
Say the word, straight I unstop the Full-Organ,
Blare out the mode Palestrina.

29.
While in the roof, if I'm right there—
...Lo, you, the wick in the socket!
Hallo, you sacristan, show us a light there!
Down it dips, gone like a rocket!
What, you want, do you, to come unawares,
Sweeping the church up for first morning-prayers,
And find a poor devil at end of his cares
At the foot of your rotten-planked rat-riddled stairs?
Do I carry the moon in my pocket?

Music in England in the Olden Time.

[From Chappell's Collection of Ancient English Melodies.]

That music was formerly much more cultivated in England than now, as well as much more common as an amusement with the lower classes, is a fact of which the most abundant proof can be adduced. From Chaucer's Tale of the Prioress, it appears that, in the fourteenth century, "to singen," was as much an established branch of the education of "small children," as "to rede;" and Sir John Hawkins, (vol. ii. p. 260) speaking of the religious houses, says, that besides being schools of learning and education, all the neighbors might have their children instructed in grammar and music, without any expense. Gayton, in his "Festivious Notes upon Don Quixotte," 4to. 1654, enumerates, with others, barbers, cobblers, and plowmen, as "the heires of music;" and the following extract from "Orders appointed to be executed in the Cittie of London, for setting roges and idle persons to worke, and for reliefe of the poore," proves not only that music was taught in Bridewell and Christ's Hospital, but that it was considered an almost necessary qualification for servants, apprentices, or husbandmen. 66th (the last) Order: "That the preachers be moved at the sermons at the crosse, and other convenient times, and that other good notorious meanes be used, to require both citizens, artificers, and other, and also all farmers and other for husbandry, and gentlemen and other for their kitchens and other services, to take servants and children both out of Bridewell and Christ's Hospital at their pleasure," &c. "with further declaration that many of them be of toward qualities in readyng, wryting, grammer, and musike." One of the earliest songs in the English language is on the difficulty of learning music; and when minstrelsy had decayed, every event, however trifling, became instantly the subject of a ballad: "In a word, scarce a cat can looke out of a gutter, but out starts a halfpenny chronicler, and presently a propper new ballet of a new sight is ended."

None could pretend to the character of a gentleman, who was unable to sing a song, or take his part in a glee, catch, or madrigal. Morley thus quaintly mentions it in his Introduction, 1597: "But supper being ended, and musike bookes, according to custom, being brought to the table, the mistresse of the house presented me with a part, earnestly requesting me to sing; but when, after many excuses, I protested unfaindly that I could not, every one began to wonder, yea, some whispered to others, demanding how I was brought up: so that upon shame of my ignorance, I goe now to seeke out mine old friend, master Gnorimus, to make myself his scholler." Every barber's shop had its lute or cittern, for the amusement of waiting customers, instead of a newspaper, as at present; and Sir Richard Steele mentions the custom as still prevailing in his time:

"To this day the barber is still the same; go into a barber's anywhere, no matter in what district, and it is ten to one you will hear the sounds either of a fiddle or a guitar, or see the instruments hanging up somewhere." The barber in Lyly's Midas (1592) says to his apprentice: "Thou knowest I have taught thee the knocking of the hands, like the tuning of a cittern;" and Morley, in the third part of his Introduction, says: "Nay, you sing you know not what; it should seem you came latelie from a barber's shop, where you had Gregory Walker, or a curran'ta, plaide in the new proportions of them lately found out." And in a marginal note upon Gregory Walker, he says: "That name in derision they have given this Quadrant Pavan, because it walketh amongst the barbers and fillers more common than any other. In 'The Trimming of Thomas Nashe,' 1597, speaking in praise of barbers, the author says: 'If idle, they passe their time in life-delighting musique.'" And among the woodcuts in Burton's Winter Evening's Entertainments, in 1687, is one representing the interior of a barber's shop, with a person waiting his turn, and amusing himself in the interim by playing on the lute; and on the other side of the shop hangs another instrument, of the lute or cittern kind. In Ben Johnson's Silent Women, act iii., scene 5, Morose cries out: "That cursed barber! I have married his cittern, that is common to all men; which one of the commentators, not understanding, altered into, 'I have married his cistern, &c. Again, Lord Falkland's Wedding Night:"

— "He has travell'd, and speaks languages
As a barber's boy plays o' the gittern."

And Ward, in his London Spy, says he had rather have heard an old barber ring Whittington's Bells upon a cittern, than all the music houses afforded. There are numberless other quotations to the same purport; but we fear it will be thought that too many have been adduced already. The music of the barbers began, however, to decline about the commencement of the last century. In one of Dr. King's Useful Transactions, he speaks of the castanets used in dances, and says: "They might keep time with the snap of a barber's fingers, though at the present day, turning themselves to perriwig-making, they have forgot their cittern and their music; I had almost said, to the shame of their profession." But independently of the growing rivalry of the newspapers, the barbers' shops were then no longer visited by the same class of customers as the barber-surgeons of former days, who set their apprentices to play and sing to their patients, while they were letting blood, or binding up a wound.

Remarks on Lyrical Dramatic Performance, BY CARL MARIA VON WEBER.

[When Euryanthe was about, for the first time, to be produced in Leipzig, Herr Praeger, who was then director of the theatre, requested the author to furnish him with such directions for its performance as could be expressed in writing, and to mark the time of each movement throughout by Maelzel's Metronome. His application called forth the following remarks from Weber, which were afterwards published in the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung.]

Every singer imparts, however unconsciously, the traits of his own individual character to the dramatic character which he sustains. Thus two singers, the one possessed of a light and flexible voice, the other of an organ of great volume and power, will give the same composition in a manner widely different. The one will, doubtless, be more animated than the other; and yet both may do justice to the composer, inasmuch as both mark the gradations of passion in his composition, faithfully and expressively, according to the nature and degree of power possessed by each. But it is the duty of the music-director to prevent the singer from deceiving himself, by following too exclusively what at first appears to him most suitable. This caution is particularly necessary with respect to certain passages, lest the effect of the whole piece should suffer for the sake of some favorite roudade, which the singer must needs introduce. For instance, if a singer cannot throw sufficient fire and force of expression into the latter passages of the air of Eglantine, he had better simplify, than attempt to ornament them; otherwise the impassioned character of the whole piece must sustain an irreparable injury. By the same rule, if a performer cannot do justice to the strong and vindictive air of Elvira in the Opferfest, she will much less injure the work by omitting it altogether, than by giving it to the hearer in the style of a tame solfeggio.

It is one of the severest of problems, so perfectly to unite song and instrumental accompaniment, in the rhythmical movement of a composition, as to make them amalgamate; that is, to make the latter sustain, heighten, and enforce the expression of the passion; for song and instruments are, in their nature, repugnant to each other.

Through the medium of emphasis, and verbal articulation, song gives to the measure an effect which, perhaps, may be compared to the uniform breaking of waves upon the shore. Instruments, and particularly those of the stringed kind, divide the time into sharp beats, mathematically true, like those of the pendulum. Now, justness of expression requires a union of these conflicting properties. The movement ought not to be a tyrannical check—a driving mill-hammer, but must be to the composition, what pulsation is in the animal economy. There is no slow movement in which passages demanding acceleration do not occur. On the other hand, there is no quick movement but what requires in many passages moderate retardation. These changes, in particular cases, are absolutely necessary to expression.

But, for God's sake, let no singer presume to think himself justified, by what is here said, in rushing into a hair-brained mode of performance, tearing at pleasure into very tatters, any number of bars he may think proper; a mode of proceeding which cannot fail to excite the same feeling in the hearer of taste, as is produced by the clown who distorts his limbs to amuse the mob. No; let the acceleration and retardation of the time be such as to convey the idea of their being dictated by feeling. Nor ought these modifications, whether in a musical or in a poetical point of view, to be admitted, except in accordance with the tone and character of the passion expressed. In a duet, for instance, two characters which contrast with each other, will require a different mode of expression. Of this, the duet between Licinius and the High Priest in the Vestale, may serve as an example; the greater the degree of dignified composure given to the passages in the part of the High Priest, and of energy and passion to those of Licinius, proportionably the more striking will be the effect produced, and yet music has no marks or signs by which all this, important as it confessedly is, can be denoted. Such indications can be found only in the feelings of the performer, or of the director; if they exist not in one of the two, the metronome is unable to supply the want; all that this can do is, mechanically to prevent any gross mistakes. As to an attempt to denote all the delicate shades of feeling, and the consequent modifications necessary to give full effect to a performance, I have found every endeavor fruitless, and have desisted from the task as hopeless.

I send you, however, such indications as I can give, not so much in the hope that they will satisfy the end you have in view, as in compliance with your friendly request.

Musical Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, FEB. 12.—Your invalid correspondent writes to show you that he is in the land of the living, in spite of the cold weather, and of a due proportion of the "ills that flesh is heir to."

I made an error in my last letter; let me correct it without delay. I said that Mr. MEIXNER's oratorio of "The Deluge" was to be performed by the Musical Union,—I was wrong, for the Harmonia, I now understand, has assumed the honor and responsibility of placing it before the public; so much for speaking on hearsay instead of upon my own knowledge, but when one's society consists principally of nurses, doctors and the day's paper, one cannot expect to be well posted up in musical matters.

There have been a great number of concerts during the many weeks I have been obliged to keep in doors, to say nothing of three nights of Italian opera by the Lagrange troupe. I should have much liked to have heard VERDI's Trovatore, and reported to you its real reception by our musical circles, but it was of course impossible. OLD BULL has been here; GOTTSCHALK had a complimentary concert given him and was obliged to perform on a square piano; the Musical Union opened the new hall in Market street with its sixth and last concert, the remaining six of the promised series being indefinitely postponed; the Mozart Centennial Celebration took place as announced and was an entire failure in every point of view; BISHOP's first Ballad Soirée was given last Wednesday, the second is announced for to-morrow; HERMAN THORBECKE's lascivious evening is to take place to-night; the fourth concert of the Harmonia, third of the subscription series, was given last evening, and I hear was as crowded as usual, notwithstanding the condition of the streets, which is atrociously sloppy—the programme was miscellaneous, selected almost without exception from the great masters. The first concert of the Oratorio and Madrigal society (the amiable Crouch's) is announced for the 23d, when LOCK's music to "Macbeth" is to be sung; the Glee and Madrigal Society, a separate affair, composed of Bishop's classes, will give its first on the 29th, while a grand charity concert is talked of for the 27th. So you see there is plenty of music for those who are able to go out and enjoy it. I live in hopes of hearing some of the many entertainments; until I do, farewell.

VERITAS.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, FEB. 16, 1856.

Italian Opera.—"The Prophet."

The great novelty of the season, and the great event—at least after that performance of Don Giovanni—has been the production for the first time in Boston of the far-famed Prophète of MEYERBEER. The Boston Theatre was absolutely crowded with a most brilliant audience on Friday evening of last week, eager for a first taste; and on the repetition, Wednesday evening, the audience was above the average. It was well, for our instruction, that the Prophète had been immediately preceded by Don Giovanni; nothing could have brought out its characteristics in a more bold relief; nothing could appear in greater contrast than the music, genius, and entire methods of Mozart and Meyerbeer. We appreciate them both the better by having heard them in close juxtaposition.

We have all heard of the excitement which attended the first splendidly successful production of "The Prophet" in Paris. It had been composed some eight years earlier under the title of "The Anabaptists;" was re-written, promised to the public of the Grand Opera, and postponed again and again for a year or two, to allow of infinite revisions and rehearsals, and was finally brought out (even then with some curtailments, for it was five hours long) on the 16th of April, 1849. It was the third of Meyerbeer's great masterpieces written for the Grand Opera; and his staunch admirers pronounced it as much greater than the Huguenots, as that was greater than Robert le Diable; while others find an inspiration, a spontaneous, genial flow of musical idea, of melody, in Robert, which disappears for them more and more in the more ingeniously elaborate and imposingly effective works which followed. "The Prophet" is necessarily criticised both from points of view above it and below it; from below, by those who cannot appreciate what there is in it that is greater than what they have been used to,—the physically and quasi passionately exciting common-places of the usual popular Italian operas; there is too much thought, too much design, too much voluntary sacrifice of cheap effects in it for them. On the other hand, those who judge from the highest stand-point, from experience of the inspired creations of genius like Mozart, Beethoven, or even Rossini, while they acknowledge its great merits, see that after all it is a work for effect, and not a pure creation of unquestionable genius. Genius, like Mozart, wins the people, goes to the common heart, and makes its wonders felt by all, at the same time that it tasks the brain of the thinker, of the learned, scientific critic, to discern the tithe of the latent excellencies of its thoroughly learned, yet perfectly spontaneous product. Meyerbeer's music, as such, disappoints the Bellini, Donizetti, Verdi enthusiasts; simply because it is really novel, runs in no well-worn, easy sentimental channels, taxes thought continually to mark what it is, even as it taxed thought and volition on the part of the composer to bring out such a connected series of new designs and weld them all together to his purpose. The mass therefore found it, musically, strange, fatiguing, heavy.

A smaller number, weary of the hacknied Italian opera melody, blessed or cursed with some intellectual curiosity and demanding evermore new thought, something to discover and think about, as well as something just to feel and be stirred up with for the moment, were delighted with the curious wealth of novel effects, if not ideas, in this elaborate score; with the ingenious fitting of quaint, characteristic musical costume to each point of the dramatic plot; with the wonderful calculation of effects, sacrificing such momentary ones as others would often make, to greater effect of the whole. These are refreshed by such abundant evidences of invention, such skilful devices to illustrate and help on the one grand design. They say, here is an opera with something in it, some positive addition to the old stock, even should it be found wanting in the scales of the highest criticism; and many will not believe it can be found so. A still smaller few acknowledge the novelty, the power, the cleverness, enjoy much in detail, and as a whole find it interesting and suggestive, yet feel too clearly that ingenuity is the right word for it, and not genius; that the inspiration is not equal to the study of effect; that the direction after all is false and the success of to-day is made paramount to the higher and eternal truth of Art. Take away the great display, and what greatness is there left? Remove it from the theatre, and indeed from any theatre but the Grand Opera of Paris, try over the music on a small scale, without accessories, and view it simply musically, and what, with all its felicitous and novelties, do you find vitally inherent in its every fibre at all comparable to what you find in music of Mozart, Rossini, Weber, and the real men of genius? Read Mozart's account of his own method of composing great works (in his letter on another page,) and what can be imagined more utterly opposite than the elaborate, painfully piece-meal method of Meyerbeer? He is not inspired with an ineffably beautiful and grand creation all at once, whole, as Minerva leaped from the brain of Jove. As different as possible from all that, must have been the genesis of the Huguenots and the Prophète.

Such, we are quite sure, was the result of these first trials on the audience here; and such it has been everywhere, making allowance for the peculiar passion for stage effect which belongs to the French character] and culture, and makes the Grand Opera the focus of talents such as Meyerbeer's. One cannot but be interested in the play. It has characters in it. Fides and Jean and the Anabaptists are not likely to be soon forgotten. But of these the poet, more than the musician, seems to have been the father. SCRIBE is the most admirable of librettists, really one of the first dramatists of our age; he has furnished the composer with a remarkably fine plot and poem; has Meyerbeer breathed a deeper life and meaning into these characters, re-created them by his music, as Mozart did those furnished by Da Ponte? Does the music indicate more meaning than the words? We cannot yet perceive it; but it is not time to render final judgment on so great a work, which we have heard performed but twice, and that of course with very insufficient means and much curtailment. It is rather our duty simply to report so much as we have thus far found.

Meyerbeer, as M. Fétis well says, loves to deal with mystical ideas. "In Robert, all the interest consists in the struggle of the good and evil genius for the possession of a weak and passionate soul. In the Huguenots, it is the most exalted love in conflict with the sentiment of duty and religious faith; in le Prophète, it is the annihilation of human sentiments by fanaticism." The wild scenes of the Anabaptist peasants' insurrection, and the eventful life of Jean of Leyden afforded fine sphere to the musician and librettist, full of tragedy, of splendid spectacle, of romance and the most striking contrasts. There was the charm of history, too, an opportunity to exercise that tact in local coloring, which Meyerbeer possesses in a very high degree. They could not conform their drama strictly to the facts of history; the conclusion, for instance,—a very lame and impotent one, after the stereotype pattern of a thousand melodramas, ending in a grand explosion, which destroys the hero and all concerned, is but the play-wright's cutting of the knot of difficulty. The historical John was captured and put to death with utmost torture. Then too the mere monotony of carnage and fanaticism required some relief, something to touch the human chords; hence the invention of the love of John and Bertha, and the sublime impersonation of the maternal sentiment in Fides. These elements are skilfully wrought together into a splendid combination of music, spectacle and drama.

The first act gives us a miniature of the times, by a scene in the environs of Dordrecht, in Holland. You have on the one side the castle of the lord of the domain, count Oberthal; on the other the simple peasant life of his vassals; and you are about to see what might occur in any German village at that time. There is no overture, only a few measures of the orchestra as the curtain rises on the rural scene; it is the hour of rest from labor; a peasant on the rocks, with a cornemuse to his lips, summons his companions to their repast, the strain and echoes being given by the low clarinet tones in the orchestra. (Laughably enough, our actor raised his horn to his lips while the echoes were sounding, and left the whole matter to the orchestra the second night.) The chorus of millers and peasants is quite gay and festive, triangle and piccolo quaintly chiming in upon a droning harmony. Bertha, the betrothed of Jean, (Miss HENSLER) enters and sings a song of joy at the thought of soon meeting her lover (omitted here.) Then enters Fides, the mother of Jean, commissioned to conduct his bride to him. Their recitative is treated in quite an original and peculiarly conversational manner, the interest of the orchestra never for a moment ceasing. The picturesque, yet simple costume of both ladies, was exceedingly appropriate and tasteful. Bertha, as vassal of the Count, cannot go without his consent, and they approach the castle. But now, strange, murky sounds of horns and bassoons herald the intervention of a new element, the fate, as it were, in the drama, and we hear the sombre choral, sung in unison and octave, of the three Anabaptist leaders, who soon appear upon the rocks in the background darkening the scene. Here is what they sing:

This has perfectly the tone of the rude chorales of the sixteenth century, yet we have M. Fétis' assurance that it was expressly composed by Meyerbeer. Thrice repeated by these gentlemen in black (MORELLI, ARNOLDI and GASPARDONI, who were capitally made up, especially Morelli, who looked like a genuine old Hussite, and kept a right fanatical expression on his face), and afterwards sung in full chorus by them and the peasants, whom they have effectually preached into insurrection and a belief in a near millennium, this chorale gives a sort of key-note to the whole; it is ominously effective. The loud liberty chorus, which follows, reminds one of the first finale in Don Juan. They seize whatever weapons come to hand and rush to attack the castle, when Count Oberthal, (AMODIO, very oddly dressed), laughing with his nobles, and with a guard, comes out and the valiant rebels shrink and try to hide their weapons. Scarcely noticing them he has the three black crows expelled, pestilent preachers of sedition that they are, and finds a more welcome object in the fair Bertha, who approaches him with Fides, and they make their request in a pretty duet, which was nicely sung, Bertha taking the upper part. The count cannot part with so much beauty and claims Bertha for himself; the peasants are indignant; Bertha and Fides are seized and carried into the castle, and to improve the opportunity, the three gentlemen in black let us hear again from the outside their Ad nos, ad salutarem undam. The music in all this first act is comparatively simple; no great effects are attempted, while every detail shows the most studied care.

Act II. introduces us to Jean, the future prophet. The scene is his inn, at Leyden; John, occupied with sweet thoughts, awaits impatiently the return of Fides with his bride. Peasants, soldiers, &c., enter dancing and singing, and calling for beer. Beautiful is the little tenor strain in which Jean (SALVIANI) thinks of Bertha. The three Anabaptists also enter, and sit down to drink; are struck by the resemblance of John to a picture of David in the cathedral of Munster; inquire of the peasants if he is brave, is an enthusiast, &c., and when the rest are sent out to meet Bertha, they listen to the recital of his dream, from which they are convinced that he is their appointed prophet and king. The music of this dream is remarkable. It is preluded by a snatch of the Coronation march, and accompanied by a melody of low flute tones, with aerial high notes of the violins, which is an anticipation of the hymn of the choir boys, expanded to large proportions in the great cathedral scene of the Fourth Act. The latter portion, where the bloody images start up, is terrific, almost Frey-schütz-like in the accompaniment; brass and tympani do their utmost. (Yet it may be remarked that throughout the opera the noisier orchestral effects are carefully kept from drowning the voices.) The Three are more than ever persuaded that he is the Messiah they are seeking, and tell him the dream betokens that he is to reign! He shrinks from the idea, and in a sweet Andante Pastorale, in 9-8 measure, one of the very few melodies which one carries away from the opera, sings of a sweeter empire: Un impero piu soave, Un affetto piu sincero, in which he hopes to live and die at home. They leave him, repeating: "Thou shalt be king," and he is glad to be rid of their shadow.

Now are heard strange sounds in the orchestra, —a galloping movement by two bassoons, at the same time with a measured march by clarinets, horns and strings, (rather a melodramatic piece of imitation,) which is soon explained by the precipitate entrance of Bertha pursued by soldiers of the Count (in the version here used, the Count himself leads them.) Jean secretes her; they threaten to kill Fides, whom they bring with them, unless he gives Bertha up; the filial sentiment prevails, and he sinks into a seat and buries his head in his hands in despair as his betrothed is hurried off. Here were the materials for a grand concerted finale, according to the usual Italian opera model; but Meyerbeer passes on, giving us the well-known truly dramatic song: Ah, mon fils! in which Fides blesses her son for this self-sacrifice. She leaves him to his own thoughts of vengeance, and just then the Ad nos of the fatal Three is heard again without, conspiring with his thought, as the three witches with the dreams of Macbeth. (It is said that Macbeth was performed in Paris, about the time that Scribe wrote this.) He calls them in, already theirs, and the act closes with a quartet of the four men, in which the zeal of fanaticism gets the better of the simple human, filial sentiment; he must see his mother once before he goes to be their warrior prophet; they warn him from such weakness; again involuntarily he rushes to her chamber to take one last look, but at a sudden explosion of the tympani (one of the peculiar ways of marking a climax in this opera!) he tears himself away and follows the murky Three.

The third act takes us into the midst of the tumult and carnage of the insurrection. Amid chaotic blasts and alarums of the orchestra the curtain rises on a winter scene, a frozen lake, with the towers of Munster in the distance, which the peasants are besieging. Soldiers rush from the sides dragging prisoners, richly dressed, nobles, monks, &c., and the peasantry dance round them, with a chorus, whose strange rhythm has a remorseless, wintry sound: Du sang! Que Judas succombe!

The solo, too, of Zacharias, sung with real fanatical furor by MORELLI; Aussi nombreux que les étoiles, is remarkable for its impetuous and angry rhythm. Another of the Three (leaders under Jean, still in their suits of black) leads in a band of soldiers, from a hard day's fight. The prisoners are led out in hope of ransom; the soldiers are weary and hungry, and now begins the famous skating scene. Groups of women and children, upon skates, bring provisions, and then there is dancing. The music of the dances, especially the Pas des patineurs, is quite original; the accompaniment marks the nervous measured effort that propels the skates, while the melody glides gracefully away in a freer rhythm. The skating may have had some poetical illusion on the Parisian stage; here it was too much in the foreground and lacked remoteness; the clatter of the skates was too great for the music.

Next we enter the tent of the three Anabaptists, who are planning an assault on Munster, without the Prophet's knowledge. A quaint episode is created by the bringing in of Count Oberthal prisoner; it is too dark to recognize him; he asks what they are fighting for, is instructed in their fanatical and communist creed, pretends to wish to join them, and takes the oath, comically enough, to each of their bloody articles. The music to this is called in the French score a Trio bouffe, and indeed you seem for a time to be listening to strains from "the Barber," and begin to confound our solemn friends with Don Basilio; the dialogue is admirably managed, and the music well conveys the hypocritical tone of Oberthal. But the drollest is where they strike a light, singing a couple of lively stanzas as the sparks fly from the flint—more curious than natural—and recognize their foe. As he is sent off to execution, Jean appears and saves him. He is sick of the cruelties perpetrated by his followers, who, finding the city still hold out against them, begin to murmur, and cry "Death to the Prophet!" Here the Prophet rises in the might of his enthusiasm, upbraids and quells them, and compels all to kneel in prayer, and chant a Miserere. Remembering that Bertha is in Munster, he is again inspired to go on, and his appeal to arms and victory rises to one of those climaxes of inspiration, which explains his power over his ignorant and superstitious followers. In the midst of it he thinks of Joan of Arc, sees heaven open, and hears the sound of sacred harps and voices floating over Munster. Poet and musician have here done their best to work up an imposing finale. The theme of this concluding prayer: Re del Cielo, has the very familiar sound of one of those old Catholic hymns, which has also found its way into our Protestant hymn-books.

But we have not room to go through at this slow rate. We must speak of the last two acts next week. So far there has been no very intense personal development; all has been comparatively quiet in the music and characters of Fides and Bertha; they have been only incidental to the historical drama: in the great fourth act their time comes, and we can only hint now of the sublime and thrilling pathos which Mme. LAGRANGE exhibits both in singing and in action, in the part of Fides, one of the most trying rôles, in those two last acts, to be found in the whole range of opera. We have seen nothing greater upon any stage than the scene where she claims the Prophet as her son, and then is forced to disown him. Very great, too, was she in the prison scene, where she brings him to repentance. The music is extremely difficult, of great compass, requiring abundant use of the contralto as well as the soprano register, (it was written for VIARDOT GARCIA,) ranging through unusual intervals, strange rhythmical divisions and declamatory accents; yet she sang all to a marvel. It seemed almost incredible for a voice of such slight substance.

Miss HENSLEY, too, appears to even better advantage than ever before in her (much abridged) character of Bertha; she sang the music very sweetly, fully sharing the applause of the duets with Lagrange, and in one scene showed a good deal of dramatic power. Sig. SALVIANI could not look the majesty or beauty of the man who could pass for a prophet and work almost miracles by the charm of personal presence; but he did well, and sang quite effectively. With the three Anabaptists no fault could be found; MORELLI was capital; GASPARONI too, except in a too merry twinkle of the eye (yet they all turned out to be rogues); and ARNOLDI's tenor, at other times so hard, had just the right sound in the rude Anabaptist unison canticles. The choruses were sung effectively; the orchestra, allowing for its small proportion of strings and the maddening loudness of those drums, gives, we should think, a very fair idea of the rich and curious instrumentation. As for scenic display, it of course was not Paris; but the Coronation scene was made quite brilliant and gorgeous, and is there another country in the world, where a long procession could be encored and repeated as it was done here at both performances!

Our readers will have an opportunity to satisfy themselves of the transcendent power of Mme. LAGRANGE as Fides, this afternoon, when the Prophète will be repeated for the finale of this short operatic season.

On Saturday afternoon was repeated Semiramide, whose free spontaneous outflow of voluptuous melody was really refreshing after the labored novelties of Le Prophète. LAGRANGE and DRIDEX were admirable again. On Monday Lucrezia Borgia was repeated, with AMODIO as the Duke. Last evening Miss HENSLEY's benefit in I Puritani, of which hereafter.

P. S. By announcement in another column it will be seen that Mr. PAINÉ has yielded to pressing petitions from many opera-lovers, and will give four performances next week. Observe the evenings are changed.

New Music.

(From Schuberth & Co., Hamburg, Leipzig and New York.)

CHARLES MAYER. Op. 141. Le Prophète, Grande Fantaisie pour le Piano. Pp. 27.

A brilliant and difficult show-piece for the virtuoso concert-player, or the ambitious amateur, who possesses a good deal of execution and whose fingers itch for more. Ushered by the loud march, some of the principal motives of the Prophète are introduced, illustrated, varied, and bedeviled in the modern fashion, with arpeggios, long passages of tremolo, and so forth, cleverly and gracefully, as Carl Mayer always does, who is one of the more successful of those who follow next, yet a long way after, LISZT. By the way, is it not greatly to Liszt's honor, whatever his earlier career, that he, acknowledged king in all that concerns execution, effect, virtuosity in piano-playing, never consents to play a thing of this kind now in public, but devotes his skill to the interpretation of the master works of genius?

A. GÖCKEL. Op. 19. Souvenir de Niagara; Caprice Caractéristique. Pp. 13.

A rapid, galop like Allegro, not without grace and sparkle; not very difficult, but nothing without clear and free execution, and likely to please many.—What influences Niagara may have mingled in its birth, are not apparent. Niagara (pictured on the title-page) may help to sell it, as the grand falls have turned many a mill ere now.

A. GÖCKEL. Op. 20. Les Adieux, Notturmo Sentimentale, for Piano; pp. 10.

In the usual form of Notturmes, by Field, Kalkbrenner, &c.; a long, flowing 4-4 melody, in A-flat at first plain, with occasional little tendrils of ornament, and light arpeggio chords extended through two octaves or more; afterwards varied, the chords struck alternately below and above, with hands crossing. Not particularly easy to play well. The author on the title page styles himself Élève de F. Mendelssohn Bartholdy.

FERDINAND FICKER. I. Pädagogische Bibliothek (Pedagogic Library) für Piano. Section 2. pp. 22.—II. Farewell Notturmo, op. 12, pp. 7.—III. La Gracieuse, Schottish de Salon.

No. 1 contains thirty little pieces for beginners, beginning with the very simplest and progressing by easy degrees to more difficult; yet all quite simple. The pieces are in many forms of waltz, march, andante cantabile, tremolo, &c., and must interest the scholar. Nos. 2 and 3 form numbers of a series of larger-pieces for more advanced players, and seem clever in their way.

The Family Pianist (Piano Blumenlese), a selection of Dances, Marches, Airs, &c., arranged by J. SCHUBERTH. Book I., pp. 11.

Here are very simple and short arrangements of such pieces as the Polacca air: Son vergin vezzosa, from I Puritani; the Rhenish Polka; the Coronation March from "The Prophet"; Reissiger's Feen Waltz, Rossini's Turantella; "Last Rose of Summer," &c., &c.

(Published by Nathan Richardson.)

C. A. ADLER. Trois Bayadères Caractéristiques, for Piano-forte. No. 3. Reverie; pp. 5.

A pleasing, pensive little melody in E major, with the four parts of the harmony well individuated; the treatment and modulation refined, and nothing very common-place, until you reach an unmeaningly long die-away see-saw upon tonic and dominant at the end. The only difficulty to the player will be found in some widely dispersed harmonies near the beginning.

A. HENSELT. Op. 13. Mazurka et Polka; pp. 9.

After CHOPIN few preserve the spirit of the Mazurka—that wildflower of native Polish melody, full of a delicate, deep, burning feeling, so happily as Henselt. The form in itself is always interesting, but doubly so when it becomes a mould to the inspirations of so poetic a composer. This one is well worth the trouble to learn it. The Polka too, is above the common humdrum character of polkas.—the work of an artist. Both pieces are above medium difficulty.

H. BERTINI. Mother and Daughter; four easy, pretty Duets, for the piano; pp. 5 each. Price 25 cts. each.

The domestic title tells the purpose of these very nice little pieces for the juvenile stages of four-hand practice. There is a certain grace of style about even the least things of Bertini.

C. T. BRUNNER. Twenty-four very easy melodies for young pupils, for four hands. In five numbers, each of 5 pages; 20 cts. each.

These are of the very simplest sort of exercises. The hand remains in one position through each piece, and in the upper part the two hands play the melody all through in octaves, with scarce an exception. All are kept, too, in the natural key until the last few numbers, which enter A minor, F and G.

Musical Chat.

Tickets are already selling briskly for the BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL on the 1st of March. Those who would secure choice seats must lose no time. The original plan of the programme has been somewhat varied; it will probably be announced in full next week. . . . OTTO DRESEL'S Second Soirée cannot take place to-night on account of indisposition. It will probably occur on Wednesday. Among the classical novelties of the occasion Mr. Dresel will produce a Trio (for piano, violin and 'cello) composed by a lady, namely the gifted and early lamented sister of MENDELSSOHN, Madame FANNY HENSEL. . . . The HANDEL and HAYDN SOCIETY announce a Sacred Concert to-morrow evening with the aid of LAGRANGE, HENSEL, and the other artists of the Italian Opera, just about to leave us.

London gossip says, quite positively, and without contradiction so far, that Mme. JENNY LIND GOLDSCHMIDT is about to appear once more in opera. The story is that Messrs. Lumley, Mitchell and Otto Goldschmidt have taken Her Majesty's Theatre, which has been shut up for two or three years (ever since the great JOHANNA WAGNER law-suit), and which Jenny alone was able to make profitable. She is to be the prima donna; but what further has not transpired. We wish it might prove true. That the greatest singer of our age, the one prima donna who has genius in the highest sense, and who knows music and all its masterworks as well as she knows how to sing, should now, in the fullness of her powers, abandon their greatest sphere of exercise, is a calamity to the best interests of Art. In a great artist humanity realizes one of its own ideals; the artist is for us what we cannot all be for ourselves; the world cannot afford that private life should claim the whole of such an one; they come too seldom and their age needs their gift. May the rumor prove true, and may we yet see Jenny Lind in opera in America!

Kladderadatsch, the German Punch, is very funny about Tannhäuser, as performed last month at Berlin. It gives a parody of the poem, of which the hero and the plot are RICHARD WAGNER himself and his fortunes, with a series of pictorial caricatures, representing scenes before, during and after the performance. Under the first head we have the poor conductor, spent with his gigantic labors of rehearsal, put to bed; on the floor a heap of used-up batons, with one more, marked "reserve," lying across the score of Tannhäuser upon the music-stand. . . . Punch himself, the great original all-sided Mr. Punch, who lives and rules in England, has been amusing himself, seeing that it was so much the fashion, with manufacturing "Rossiniana," in which of course he succeeds better than anybody else. Here they are:

The French, Belgians and German papers are full of the sayings of Rossini. Since the "illustrious maestro" has given up music, he has taken to composing jokes. Most of his bon-mots are in the Bouffe style. Nothing is too extravagant for his humor, so long as he succeeds in making you laugh. We will endeavor, from memory, to reproduce a few of his most brilliant sayings, as they have been reproduced lately, by Hiller, Le-comte, Escudier, and others:—

He said of the celebrated Marquise de Z—, that she had "a mind that changed as often as a play-bill; what she promised to-day she rarely performed to-morrow."

Rossini defines Bellini, Halévy, and Weber as follows: "The first is natural, the second unnatural, and the third supernatural."

He says Costa is "honest and clever; but extremely conceited. The reason why he wears gloves when he conducts, is for fear of soiling his fingers with other composers' music."

He gives as his reason for not composing anything more, that the "musical market is overdone. What will you, when the opera is turned into nothing better than a stock-exchange—overrun with worthless notes?"

"The English go to the opera to sleep—the French to talk—the Germans to dream—the Italians to listen."

Rossini said of a Belgian, who had more than his fair share of national ugliness, "If that fellow had been in the Ark, we should not have had one of the Singe species left. All the monkeys on board would have died of envy."

A lady, with whom he had been dining was pressing him to favor the society with a song. "Really, madame," exclaimed Rossini, "you treat us poor musicians as if we were so many starved-out robins; you throw us a few crumbs from your table, and then expect us to perch on your window-sill, and begin singing!"

Wagner offered to play him a few specimens of his Music of the Future. "No, no," eagerly ejaculated Rossini; "let us rather enjoy the Music of the Present; it is wrong, you know, to anticipate the future. Besides, mon cher Docteur, I can tell you, I do not take the slightest pleasure in listening to Post-Obits."

CROWDED OUT. Notices of the past week's concerts, already in type, must lie over till our next.

Italian Opera....Boston Theatre.

The Director of the Italian Opera Troupe has the honor to announce that, in deference to the general demand of the Public and the Press, he has determined to give four more representations at the Boston Theatre.

In making the above announcement he deems it but just to himself to state that it is only at the reiterated requests, both personal and by letter, of the patrons of the Opera, that he has determined to abandon the giving of three representations in New York during the week, giving four here instead, and that Friday the 22d inst. will be most positively the last time that the artists comprising this troupe can appear in Boston, as they are under contract to commence an engagement in Philadelphia on Monday the 25th inst.

INAUGURATION OF THE STATUEBEETHOVEN.

THE Directors of the BOSTON MUSIC HALL with the co-operation of the Committee of the Orchestral Concerts, propose to celebrate the placing of CRAWFORD'S BRONZE STATUE OF BEETHOVEN in the MUSIC HALL, by a GRAND FESTIVAL to take place on SATURDAY, March 1st, 1866.

The Festival will open with a Poetical Prologue, written and recited by Wm. W. STORY, Esq. The Prologue ended, the Programme will be as nearly as possible the following:

The three orchestral movements of the NINTH (CHORAL) SYMPHONY—Hallelujah Chorus from the "Mount of Olives"—Fantasia for Piano, Chorus and Orchestra—Grand Aria from Fidelio—First movement of Violin Concerto—all being compositions of BEETHOVEN.

As the Festival is consecrated to the memory of the greatest of Composers, and as it is the first time that a Statue of a great artist has been erected in America, the Committee hope there will be shown among the members of the musical profession a desire to assist in the said celebration, and will gratefully receive any proposition from individual artists to that effect.

In behalf of the Committee,
CHARLES C. PARKINS, Chairman.

Secured seats to the above named Festival will be ready for sale at Richardson's Musical Exchange, No. 282 Washington street, on and after Monday, Feb. 4th, 1866. Price of Tickets One Dollar. The diagram of the house may be seen at the above named place.

The Mission of Mozart.

LEADING CHARACTERISTICS OF HIS GENIUS AND HIS WORKS.

BY A. OULIBICHEFF.

MOZART'S models for the Opera and Orchestral Music were his contemporaries; on the one side the Italians taken in a mass, as representatives of vocal melody, on the other side his famous countrymen and friends, GLUCK and JOSEPH HAYDN. Placed between the interests of song and of the drama, it was his task to harmonize their rival claims, by subordinating them to a third interest, which was peculiarly his own. In other words, he had to uphold with all the power at his command the principle of lyric-dramatic truth; to point out a significant and brilliant sphere for execution, when the singers had more than was necessary; especially to lend to theatrical music a value independent of its application, so that a piece, taken out from its connection and its text, should still always be good music, clear, expressive, beautiful, in harmony with itself as well as with the libretto. Nowhere did Mozart introduce so great a number of combinations and develop such a wonderful variety of talents, as in the opera, which compels us to treat this subject more at length and in detail, than all the others.

It has been maintained, that Mozart's operas are a mixture of Italian music and French declamation. This is true; and yet the most classical passages of Mozart resemble neither the operas of GLUCK, nor those of the Italians of the last century, nor any that have been made in our times. The reason is, that in the study of the masters Mozart studied the principle or tendency of the school far more than the individual manner; borrowing from all periods of music, he yet copied nothing, but modified all according to the nature of its universal spirit, and according to the conditions under which the harmonious co-operation of these different contributions could be realized. The science of counterpoint had become quite a different thing under his hands from what it had at first been. Just so with the French declamation; just so with the Italian melody.

In the musical drama every kind of song has its proper and appointed place, which is indicated in the very nature of things. Conversation and monologue are treated as simple recitative; a certain warmth and interest in the action give occasion for the obligato recitative, which, in quite natural sequence, leads in the true lyrical moment, the moment of impassioned outgush, in which melodic song predominates. When the recitative is incorporated into the piece of music and subjected to a positive rhythm, it takes more especially the name of declamation. There are a multitude of cases in which declamation must be used pre-eminently before melody. As often as one speaks without being strongly moved, or when one is in the highest degree excited, or when the action must follow the progress of the words, or when an animated and rapid dialogue does not allow the music to round itself off in periods, or when the situation is too pressing for one to dwell long upon what he feels, the declamatory movement will in general produce a far more dramatic effect, than the melodic song. The simplest common sense shows us, that a man, who knows that it is certain destruction for him to remain a minute longer where he is, will not stop long to express his feelings in an aria or a tender duet, when every note increases the danger and deals a deadly blow to the illusion. And these are the absurdities, with which the lyric drama has been so much and so often reproached, as if the kind were answerable for the stupidities of text-makers and musicians.

It is a fact that neither the Italians nor the French understood the art of so dividing dialogue and music, song and declamation, as to satisfy the music-lovers. The Italians multiplied the arias entirely at the pleasure of the singer, without troubling themselves about the dramatic reasons; which did not prevent them, however, from making their recitative in opera seria terribly long and tedious. Gluck never employed arias unfitly; but he turned over to dialogue a great many situations, in which the music might have developed itself to good advantage. The grand French and the grand Italian opera, different as they were in principle, yet had one fault in common: the recitative took far too great a part in them. To what shall we ascribe this want of proportion between the parts which make up the musical drama, and this preponderance of a form of song which in its nature is least pleasing? The question is easily answered. They understood how to make cavatins, bravura airs and choruses, even duets, though these not quite so well. But what was understood by neither one school nor the other, was the ensemble pieces. Even Gluck had shown no very remarkable skill in this. Accordingly they treated a musical situation, when it divided itself between three or four persons, in recitative dialogue, and seldom used it for a Terzet or a Quartet. The literati triumphed upon such occasions. See, exclaimed they to the friends of music, what is made out of the verse of Arcas in the Iphigenia:

Il l'attend à l'autel, pour la sacrifier!

Compare the effect of the tragic scene with the effect of the lyric scenes, and then measure the relative power of the two arts, which you place upon a level. They had but too much reason, not as against music, but as against Gluck. RACINE's flash of lightning, which falls upon some shreds of recitative: Mon époux! mon père! son père! ô désespoir! ô crime! produces precisely the effect of an exploded petard. To wish with a meagre recitative to contend against the tragic and harmonious power of a great poet, is actually a ridiculous sham-fight, in which the musician makes use of the scabbard instead of the blade.

But patience; here comes one, who will put an end to the cry of the music-hating critics and will prove that the most ideal form of the drama is also the truest. The Nozze di Figaro and Don Giovanni gave at last the normal plan, according to which a libretto and a score, whether in the tragic or the comic, should be made. In them, both poets and musicians learned a new trade. In them all the musical situations, whether in motion or points of rest, were cut out for music: arias, duets, terzets, quartets, quintets and sextets, choruses and finales; the recitative, reduced to the indispensably necessary, was stripped of its right, which it had exercised in the fullest degree for almost two centuries, of wearying and exhausting the hearers; instead of occupying the half of an opera, or more, it now filled but an insignificant part of it. In the 590 pages of the score of Don Juan (Leipzig edition), we find not more than 45 of simple or of obligato recitative. Now for the first time could a rational comparison be made between the drama spoken and the drama sung.

It was but a small thing, however, to have shortened the recitative; it was necessary to make it beautiful, to lend it a degree of musical interest, which in itself it had not. PORPORA and GLUCK had perfected declamation; they brought it to the point of truth and accuracy, where it is as little liable to any further change, as are the natural inflexions of the voice, which it imitates, or as are the chords. However well the recitative may be declaimed, it has value only as pure music; this the harmony and instrumentation can lend it. Gluck in this regard had done much; Mozart did much more. With the one the instrumentation is still nothing but a more or less figured accompaniment, happily adapted to the text and nothing without that. With the other, on the contrary, it is a whole world of musical thoughts by itself,—thoughts beautiful in themselves, and still more beautiful through the immense service which they render to the drama; there is a variety and richness of figures in it, worthy of a Symphony; a multitude of details and a contrapuntal depth, worthy of a worked up Quartet. To estimate precisely what Mozart achieved in recitative, one has only to examine the score of Idomeneo, in which the dialogue takes up by far more room than in his other operas. But few amateurs of the present time know Idomeneo; on the contrary the recitatives of Donna Anna, the sublimest patterns of the kind, are in every one's recollection, which saves me the necessity of supporting my remark by proofs and examples.

When the situation required declamatory effects in a piece of music, Mozart did not strive to make the text agreeably singable, but he left to the orchestra in such cases the interest or pleasure for the ear, the musical sense, properly speaking. While the voice recites its speech in one breath and even with the natural intonation of the words, the orchestra comments upon the situation, expresses its total effect and reveals the inward progress of the feeling, outwardly announced by declamation and by gesture. In this way music realizes the drama as well in its poetical, as in its pictorial and psychological form, which belongs to it exclusively; it shows it at once as subject and object; it presents it under all the real, visible and hidden phases that it has in nature. A little duet between Figaro and Susanna: Aprite presto, aprite, may serve for an example. Almaviva, in a perfect rage, is expected every moment. Should the count find the page in the boudoir of the countess, he would kill him on the spot and the countess too; but the doors are fastened. Che risolvere, che far? (What is to be done?) Expose her neck to her enraged husband, or run the risk of breaking it by leaping from the window? The dilemma is inevitable, and surely it is no time now for Cherubino and Susanna to hold out a tone or coo in loving thirds and sixths. A few abrupt phrases, uttered in a voice almost choked by the extreme agitation of the speakers, were the thing in place, and our maestro was not the man to make a mistake here. His duet is a rapid, anxious colloquy, which runs swifter than the word, and only lasts a minute. The orchestra points out the danger and plays a figure, in which the situation is depicted from beginning to end. This figure exhorts, encourages, urges on the persons, and draws them through the crooks and turns of modulation, through which it would fain escape with them; at last it knows no more than they do where its head stands, it scrambles up upon the window sill, it struggles in mortal anguish. There is nothing dramatically truer than this duet, and nothing more logical than the simple development of a musical thought. Declamation, thus combined with song and orchestra, unites consequently all the advantages of applied music with the merits of pure music. Admire therefore the wisdom of the critics, who have reproached Mozart with having sacrificed the voice to the instruments.—he, the most singable of all composers, the moment that he could sing without committing an absurdity!

We have said that the Italian melody has changed its character in Mozart's operas; but the change it underwent is one of those things which criticism must give up trying to explain in any positive and rational manner. Old people, who for forty years have heard Voi, chi sapete, Vedrai carino, Mi tradi quell' alma ingrata, Fin c'han dal vino, &c., &c., still tremble with delight at these melodies of a past century almost, and how wonderful! Young music-lovers find, it is the same with them as with their grandfathers! This is hard to comprehend. There was a time, in which Nel cor più non mi sento, Ura fida pastorella, Di tanti palpiti, Una voce poco fa, and many other pieces, which have stood in favor with the public since Mozart, have seemed (to me at least) to come near to the finest arias of the latter. What a difference to-day! The Molinara has become a toothless old woman, begging in her mill for alms, if she is not already dead. Of PAER's operas only he himself is left; the beard of the hero Tancredi is already visibly becoming gray; Ninette, although very pretty, is no longer in her first bloom of youth. They are passed or passing, all these pet children of the public, to which Italy has given birth in the nineteenth century. And their older cousins, Mozart's children? Look at them. Giovanni still possesses the whole power of his fascinating look; Elvira is still ever the most constant lover; Ottavio the most melodious of tenors and the most tender bridegroom; Anna still sublime in her grief, her passion and her energy; Cherubino is still as fresh as on the day when he was presented to the countess Almaviva. He still promises, what he has promised fifty years, and as the full-blown Don Juan in the Dissoluto punito he has admirably kept his word. But what do I say? All these personages weighed down with years still seem in their growth. Like old friends, they gain more and more the sympathy of the soul, which contemplates itself in them, as in the clearest and most faithful of all poetic mirrors.

In what then lies the mystery of this fabulously long life-time of operatic arias? The mystery, I repeat it, will remain still a mystery for all others, as for the musicians of genius, who tread in Mozart's footsteps. What may be said of it in general perhaps is, that the vocal melody, which does not grow old, is that which, free from all conventionalisms, bears the character of absolute truth in regard to the situation and the words. Thus Mozart's finest arias show us the pure and simple result, the perfect musical analogy of the impressions, which by turns held sway over a susceptible and variable nature, as its countless phases turned and shifted to the influences of the moment. If the words were proper for a melody, if they went straight to the heart or excited the imagination, then the text inspired our hero; he worked with fire; he flung upon paper a portion of himself, which instantly transformed itself into a melodic masterpiece. If on the contrary he had to work upon one of those texts, which are neither good for song nor declamation, one of the thousand trivial reflections, maxims, commonplaces of a loose morality, such as the text-makers put into the mouths of persons, when they have nothing to say, then Mozart stepped down to the level of the rhymers, forgot himself and neglected himself more than a great artist ever should do. Hence the presence in his operas of several ordinary, insignificant and now obsolete melodies; the same may be said of a still greater number of his songs. He slept occasionally the Homeric sleep, and indeed very deeply, as we must confess. But he knew how to choose his moments.

On the Structure of Italian Opera.

(From "Brown's Letters upon the Poetry and Music of the Italian Opera.")

The music of the Opera is divided into RECITATIVE and AIR, and the RECITATIVE is again classed under two denominations—simple and accompanied.

The SIMPLE RECITATIVE is appropriated to passages of narration or of dialogue that are devoid of passion or sentiment, and such as by their own nature can never become the subject of musical expression.

The ACCOMPANIED RECITATIVE is on the contrary entirely devoted to passion. It was very justly observed, that "passages in which the mind of the speaker is agitated by a rapid succession of various emotions, are incompatible with any particular strain of length of melody; for that which constitutes such a particular strain is the relation of several parts to one whole. Now it is this whole which the Italians distinguish by the name of motivo, which may be translated strain or subject of the air, and which they conceive to be inconsistent with the brevity and desultory sense of those ejaculations which are the effect of a high degree of agitation. Air they think even inadmissible in those passages, in which, though the emotions be not various, yet the sentences are broken and incoherent. To give an instance: the following speech, though terror be uniformly expressed by the whole of it, seems not at all a subject fit to be comprehended under or expressed by one regular strain:

"Bring me unto my trial when you will—
Died he not in his bed?—Where should he die?
Oh? torture me no more—I will confess.—
Alive again!—then show me where he is;
I'll give a thousand pounds to look on him.—
He hath no eyes;—the dust hath blinded them:
Comb down his hair;—look! look! it stands upright,
Like lime-twigs set to catch my winged soul.
Give me some drink," &c. Shakespeare's Henry VI.

On such passages, however, the composer bestows his strongest light. It is here that he shows the effect of modulation, in order to characterize the transitions from one emotion to another, and that he employs the "accompaniments, to produce such sounds as serve to awaken in the audience sensations and emotions similar to those which are supposed to agitate the speaker." Here again another fine distinction is made by the Italians, between the descriptive and the pathetic powers of music. The last are proper to the voice, the former to the orchestra alone. Thus the symphonies which accompany this kind of recitative, besides the general analogy they must have to the immediate sentiments, and even to the character of the speaker, are often particularly descriptive of the place in which he is, or of some other concomitant circumstance which may serve to heighten the effect of the speech itself. Suppose, for example, the scene to be a prison; the symphonies, whilst they accord with the general tenor of the words, will paint, if I may be allowed the expression, the horrors of the dungeon itself. Again, suppose the scene by moon-light, and the general tone of the passion plaintive; the sweetness, the serenity, and even the solitude, nay, the silence of the scene, would make part of the ideas suggested by the symphonies. In this kind of recitative, the singer is, in a more especial manner, left to the dictates of his own feelings and judgments with respect to the measure: he must not indeed reverse the natural prosody of the language, by making short what should be long, or vice versa; but he may not only proportionally lengthen the duration of each syllable, but he may give to particular syllables what length he pleases, and precipitate considerably the pronunciation of others, just as he thinks the expression requires.

Our author next proceeds to the classification of the different kinds of air marked by the Italians, and which he is inclined to consider rather as technical in their eyes than as philosophical, although founded on distinctions of the various affections of the mind. After a few observations on the use of the symphony in preparing the audience by the enunciation of the subject or motivo, to listen with more intelligence and more interest to the song, and after pointing out the beautiful and striking effect which may be produced by the omission of it, where any sudden or violent gust of passion is to be expressed, he gives the following account of the divisions of THE AIR.

ARIA CANTABILE, by pre-eminence so called, as if it alone were song, and indeed it is the only kind of song, which gives the singer an opportunity of displaying at once, and in the highest degree, all his powers, of whatever description they be. The proper objects of this air are sentiments of tenderness. Though this be an expression which always tends to sadness, yet the sadness is of that pleasing kind which the mind loves to indulge. Hence it arises that the ARIA CANTABILE, whilst it is susceptible of pathos, admits, without prejudice to the expression, of being highly ornamented, for this plain reason—that though the sentiments it expresses are affecting, they are at the same time such as the mind dwells on with pleasure; and it is likewise for this reason, that the subject of the cantabile must never border on deep distress, nor approach to violent agitation, both of which are evidently inconsistent with ornament. The motion of this air, though not so solemn as that which belongs to still graver subjects, is very slow, and its constituent notes of consequence proportionally long: I say constituent notes, in order to distinguish those which the singer introduces as ornamental from those which constitute the melody itself. These last are in general very few, extremely simple in their march, and so arranged as to allow great latitude to the skill of the singer. The instrumental parts are, in this kind of song, restricted to almost nothing; for, though the accompaniment is of use to the singer, because it supports the voice, yet it ought to be kept so subordinate to the vocal parts, as never, during the song, to become the object of attention. In listening to an air of this description, though the mind is all awake to feeling, yet are the emotions it experiences of that gentle kind which unfit it neither for the contemplation of beauty nor the admiration of art; on the contrary, they serve to dispose it more effectually for both. Thus many of the noblest faculties of the mind are gratified at once; we judge, we feel, we admire, at the same instant of time.

ARIA DI PORTAMENTO, a denomination expressive of the carriage (as they call it) of the voice. This kind of air is chiefly composed of long notes, such as the singer can dwell on, and have thereby an opportunity of more effectually displaying the beauties and calling forth the powers of his voice; for the beauty of sound itself, and of voice in particular, as being the finest of all sounds, is held by the Italians to be one of the chief sources of the pleasure we derive from music. The subjects proper for this air are sentiments of dignity, but calm and undisturbed by passion. The subject of the PORTAMENTO is of a nature too serious and important to admit of that degree of ornament which is essential to the CANTABILE. To illustrate the specific difference of these two classes, I might say, that were Venus to sing, her mode of song would be the CANTABILE; the PORTAMENTO would be that of the queen of gods and men.

ARIA DI MEZZO CARATTERE is a species of air, which, though expressive neither of the dignity of this last, nor of the pathos of the former, is, however, serious and pleasing. There may be an almost infinite variety of sentiments, very pretty and very interesting, which are not, nevertheless, of sufficient importance to be made the subject either of the CANTABILE or the PORTAMENTO: the ARIA DI MEZZO CARATTERE comprehends all such. From the great variety which this air, of consequence embraces, as well as from the less emphatic nature of the sentiments to which it belongs, its general expression is not so determined as that of the former classes; yet with respect to each individual air, the expression is far from being vague or dubious; and though some greater latitude be here granted to the fancy of the composer, nothing is given to his caprice, the sense itself of the words clearly ascertaining, in point both of degree and quality, the expression. The degree ought to be in exact proportion to the placidity or warmth of the sentiment, and its particular cast ought to be regulated by the nature of that passion to which the sentiment is allied, for sentiments are but gentler degrees of passion. Thus this class of airs, whilst it retains its own particular character, may by turns have some affinity with almost all the other classes; but, whilst its latitude is great in respect of variety, its limitations, with regard to degree, are obvious; it may be soothing, but not sad; it may be pleasing, but not elevated; it may be lively, but not gay. The motion of this air is by the Italians termed andante, which is the exact medium of musical time between its extremes of slow and quick.

As the vocal part is never supposed here to be so beautiful and interesting as in the higher classes, the orchestra, though it ought never to cover the voice, is not, however, kept in subordination to it; it is only allowed to play louder, but may be more frequently introduced by itself, and may on the whole contribute more to the general effect of the air. This kind of song is admirably well calculated to give repose and relief to the mind, from the great degree of attention (with respect to myself, at least, I might say) agitation excited by the higher and more pathetic parts of the piece. They possess the true character which belongs to the subordinate parts of a beautiful whole, as affording a repose, not the effect of a total want of interest, but of an interest which they call forth of a different and more placid kind, which the mind can attend to with more ease, and can enjoy without being exhausted.

ARIA PARLANTE—speaking air, is that which, from the nature of its subject, admits neither of long notes in the composition, nor of many ornaments in the execution. The rapidity of the motion of this air is proportioned to the violence of the passion which is expressed by it. This species of air goes sometimes by the name of aria di nota e parola, and likewise of aria agitato; but these are rather subdivisions of the species, and relate to the different degrees of violence of the passion expressed. It may be said to take up expression just where the aria di mezzo carattere leaves it. Some airs of this last class, of the liveliest cast, may approach indeed so near to some of the parlante of the least agitated kind, that it might perhaps be difficult to say to which class they belonged; but, as soon as the expression begins to be in any degree impetuous, the distinction is evident; as the degree of passion to be expressed increases, the air assumes the name of aria agitata, aria di strepito, aria infuriata. Expressions of fear, of joy, of grief, of rage, when at all impetuous, to their highest and most frantic degrees, are all comprehended under the various subdivisions of the class. Their rhythm has its peculiar province, the effect of this kind of airs depending, perhaps, chiefly on its powers. The instrumental parts are here likewise of great efficacy, particularly in the expression of the more violent passions, giving, by the addition of a great body of sound, and by the distinctness and rapidity of their execution, a force and energy to the whole, which could never be the effect of the voice alone, however flexible, however powerful. Rousseau, somewhere in his works, makes a very ingenious observation, the truth of which the Italian composers seem evidently to have felt, that, as violent passion has a tendency to choke the voice, so, in the expression of it by musical sounds, a roulade, which is a regular succession of notes up or down, or both, rapidly pronounced on one vowel, has often a more powerful effect than distinct articulation: such passages are sometimes introduced into airs of this kind.

ARIA DI BRAVURA—ARIA DI AGILITA, is that which is composed chiefly, indeed too often, merely to indulge the singer in the display of certain powers in the execution, particularly extraordinary agility or compass of voice. Though this kind of air may be sometimes introduced with some effect, and without any great violation of propriety, yet, in general, the means are here confounded with the end. Dexterity (if I may be allowed the expression) and artifice, instead of serving as the instruments, being made the object of the work.—Such are the airs which with us we so frequently observe sung to ears erect and gaping mouths, whilst the heart, in honest apathy, is carrying on its mere animal function: and of this kind, indeed, are all the attempts in the different arts, to substitute what is difficult or novel for what is beautiful and natural. Where there has ever been a genuine taste for any of the arts, this aptness to admire what is new and difficult, is one of the first symptoms of the decline of that taste.

Thus it is, that this very elegant and judicious critic has arranged the several species of composition which we find in an opera. He concludes his work however by the addition of a kind which he says he ventures to call airs of imitation, by which he modestly indicates that he considers the other distinctions to belong to the Italians, but that this is his own. Nothing however can be more just, as your readers will admit, when they find that he quotes the air of "Hush ye pretty warbling choir," in Handel's Acis and Galatea, as the example. To introduce this description, he images the resemblances and analogies which a pregnant fancy suggests, between the powers of music and the appearances of nature; in the example, he says, "there is no comparison made; the imitative part is only suggested by the sense, and the composer has taken the hint in adapting the music to it, and has indeed done it with the utmost propriety as well as ingenuity. It is plain, in this air, that if the imitation of any thing is to be at all attempted, it must be that of the warbling choir; and it is as plain, that the passionate expression of the speaker has not even the most distant relation to the singing of birds; to have set the voice a singing, in imitation of the birds, or, whilst the voice sang the passionate part, to have made the birds sing either in unison or direct harmony with the voice, would have been each equally absurd. It would seem, indeed, at first sight, almost impossible to reconcile two things so different; yet this great genius, by confining each part to its proper province, has so artfully managed the composition, that, whilst the vocal most feelingly speaks the passion, a little flag-boat from the orchestra carries on, throughout, the delightful warbling of the choir, and though perfectly different in sound, melody, and rhythm, from the notes sung by the voice, instead of distracting the attention from it or confounding the expression, it serves to add new beauty and grace the effect; just as we may conceive a naked figure so veiled with some light and transparent vestment floating to the wind, as at once completely to reveal the figure, and by its undulating folds add new charms both to the motion and the form." Such were the characteristic distinctions which governed the poetry and the music of the last century.

Popular Music of the Olden Time:

A Collection of Ancient Songs, Ballads, and Dance Tunes, illustrative of the National Music of England. By W. Chappell, F.S.A. Cramer & Co., London.

* * * Mr. Chappell has been at extraordinary labor to collect, classify and describe every interesting specimen of national English music that could be obtained. The merest inspection of its musical contents will be sufficient to show that the quantity of research directed to this object alone must give this book high place among works of antiquarian interest. But, unlike most musical lecturers, Mr. Chappell's illustrations are by no means the most admirable part of his discourse. In writing about "Popular Music of the Olden Time," he has two objects in view, far more important than his collection of specimens, large and elaborate as that is. He designs to prove that, up to a certain period, England was not only a musical country, but the first and chief of all; and in no country in the world was music so universally esteemed and successfully cultivated. His second, but subordinate purpose, is the demolition of the common fallacy that music is mainly indebted to the church for its artistic progress. A large part of the introductory matter of the book, is, in fact—under such headings as "Minstrusly from the Saxon Period to the Reign of Edward I.," and "Music of the Middle Ages"—a succinct but most ably-digested history of all that was then known of music, both theoretically and practically. Here, at almost every step, we encounter passages asserting, in terms admitting of no dispute, the high antiquity of music, as an executive art, in England; the extraordinary, and now almost incredible, prevalence of a knowledge of it among all ranks of the people, the prodigious esteem in which it was held, and the large sums of money expended on its cultivation. No reasonable space would suffice us to transcribe even a satisfactory amount of the arguments used by Mr. Chappell, to enforce these positions, or of the authorities he brings to his assistance. A few, however, are too curious and full of purpose to be omitted. Thus, as to the antiquity of music in this island, we find the following:

"That the people of England have, in all ages, delighted in secular or social music, can be proved by numerous testimonies. The scalds and minstrels were held in great repute for many ages, and it is but fair to infer that the reverence shown to them arose from the love and esteem in which their art was held. The Romans, on the first invasion of this island, found three orders of priesthood established here from a period long anterior. The first and most influential were the Druids; the second the Bards, whose business it was to celebrate the praises of their heroes in verses and songs, which they sang to their harps; and the third were the Eubates, or those who applied themselves to the study of philosophy."

Again, as to the early period at which a knowledge of music was practically enumerated among the necessary accomplishments of a scholar; and further, as showing that it had attained an academical position in England, not, even then or since, conceded to it in any other country:

"Our great King, Alfred, according to Sir John Spelman, 'provided himself of musicians, not common, or such as knew but the practice part, but men skilful in the art itself;' and in 866, according to the annals of the church of Winchester, and the testimony of many ancient writers, he founded a professorship at Oxford, for the cultivation of music as a science. The first who filled the chair was Friar John, of St. David's, who read not only lectures on music, but also on logic and arithmetic. Academical honors in the faculty of music have only been traced back to the year 1463, when Henry Habington was admitted to the degree of Bachelor of Music, at Cambridge, and Thomas Saintwix, Doctor of Music, was made Master of King's College, in the same university; but it is remarkable that music was the only one of the seven sciences that conferred degrees upon its students, and England the only country in which those degrees were, and are still conferred."

Still, foremost in the march of improvement, we find that, at even a much earlier period than that to which the foundation of academical honors in music can be authoritatively traced, the practice of part-singing was prevalent in this country. This Mr. Chappell substantiates by means of the following passage from one of John of Salisbury, who, writing in 1170, evidently refers to the effect of singing in parts, and, as evidently, is by no means delighted with the then novelty:

"The rites of religion are now profaned by music, and it seems as if no other use were made of it than to corrupt the mind by wanton modulations, effeminate inflexions, and frittered notes and periods, even in the Penetralia, or sanctuary itself. The senseless crowd, delighted with these vagaries, imagine they hear a concert of sirens, in which the performers strive to imitate the notes of nightingales and parrots, not those of men, sometimes descending to the bottom of the scale, sometimes mounting to the summit; now softening, and now enforcing the tones, repeating the passages, mixing in such a manner the grave sounds with the more grave, and the acute with the most acute, that the astonished and bewildered ear is unable to distinguish one voice from another."

To this Mr. Chappell also adds:

"It was probably this abuse of descent that excited John's opposition to music, and his censures on the minstrels, as shown in the passage before quoted. It proves also, that descent in England did not then consist merely of singing in two parts, but included the licenses and ornaments of florid song. Even singing in canon seems to be comprised in the words, 'præcinentium et succinentium, canentium et decinentium.'"

The authority of a number of writers is quoted to a similar purpose; and, so far as words have a relation to ideas, they prove in the most satisfactory manner, not only that a knowledge of music in parts had here a very early existence, but also that England was greatly in the advance of the rest of Europe in this respect. It is obviously needless to insist on the magnitude and importance, in the history of the art, of that step given to music by the invention of part-writing. Long before this, it appears, there had existed a practice of making extempore vocal accompaniments—then termed "descant"—to known melodies, both in sacred or secular performance. All this, however, must have been wild and vague in the last degree. Its great feature of interest to the modern musician is the high probability, almost certainty, that it suggested the invention of written counterpoint. Here, then, was the key to the whole arcana of polyphonic composition. From this point it became at once possible to systematize, to establish principles, to march step by step upwards on that long path which now lies between the untaught song of the minstrel, or the barbarous chant of the Romish priest, and the last and greatest achievement of modern art. As this invention, then, constitutes the most important era in the history of music, it must be greatly interesting to ascertain the date and place of its birth. Fortunately, on these particulars, the evidence is full and indisputable. Among the manuscripts in the British Museum is an English composition for six voices, in the form of a round or canon, called "Sumer Is Icumen In." It is well known to antiquaries, and its early date and English origin have never been doubted. It now, however, appears to be the earliest piece of part music known to exist. After a most able and searching examination of the evidence, circumstantial and direct, that can be obtained concerning it, Mr. Chappell thus sums up the result of his inquiry:

"I have thus entered into detail concerning this song (though all the judges of manuscripts, whom I have been enabled to consult, are of the same opinion as to its antiquity,) because it is not only one of the first English songs, with or without music, but the first example of counterpoint in six parts, as well as of fugue, catch, and canon; and at least a century, if not two hundred years, earlier than any composition of the kind produced out of England."

The music of this song is given among the illustrations of the text; and, apart from its merit, which is of a high order, considering its date, has the highest historical interest.

Having thus assigned the invention of counterpoint to England, beyond the reach of dispute, Mr. Chappell proceeds, with a large amount of entertaining detail, to show the vast social importance accorded to music in this country, and the large sums of money habitually expended on its cultivation during the periods of which he writes. Space will not permit us to examine all this amusing and instructive matter with the closeness it merits. No one, however, can read it without the conviction that there is a difference between now and then, in the motive for, as well as the amount of musical cultivation, that leaves a decided balance in favor of our forefathers. Most ordinary people are now satisfied with claiming a liking for music. In the times of which Mr. Chappell writes, a knowledge of music—to the extent, at least, of singing at sight—was deemed essential, not only to the education of a gentleman, but even to the acceptability of the humblest individual among his fellows. Out of almost innumerable testimonies to the universal prevalence of musical ability, two must suffice:

"In Delony's History of the Gentle Craft, 1598, one who tried to pass for a shoemaker was detected as an impostor, because he could neither 'sing, sound the trumpet, play upon the flute, nor reckon up his tools in rhyme.' Tinkers sang catches; milkmaids sang ballads; carters whistled; each trade, and even the beggars, had their special songs; the haas-viol hung in the drawing-room for the amusement of waiting visitors; and the lute, cittern, and virginals, for the amusement of waiting customers, were the necessary furniture of the barber's shop. They had music at dinner; music at supper; music at weddings; music at funerals; music at night; music at dawn; music at work; and music at play."

And again:

"Morley, in his Introduction to Practical Music, 1597, written in dialogue, introduces the pupil thus: 'But snpper being ended, and music books, according to custom, being brought to the table, the mistress of the house presented me with a part, earnestly requesting me to sing; but when, after many excuses, I protested unfeignedly that I could not, every one began to wonder; yea, some whispered to others, demanding how I was brought up; so that upon shame of mine ignorance, I go now to seek out mine old friend, Master Gnorimus, to make myself his scholar.'"

As to the cost of musical entertainments, even in very early times, it may be sufficient to state, on Mr. Chappell's showing, that at a cour plenièrre, held by Edward I., at the Feast of Whitsuntide, 1306, at Westminster, a sum amounting to no less than £3,000 of the present currency was expended in remunerating the minstrels employed on the occasion.

In the four parts of this work, as yet issued, Mr. Chappell has arrived only at the period of Elizabeth. As much again, then, may probably be necessary to complete his design. But, even so far as he goes, the literary, and, to our view, the most important part of his work, completely succeeds in proving that there was a time when music was better understood in England than in any country in the world, even when English composers—and he has not reached mention of the greatest of them all, Henry Purcell—were the ablest in existence.

In taking leave of Mr. Chappell's book, we must bear testimony, not only to the great labor and skill expended on the collection and arrangement of its materials, but also to the graceful and entertaining style in which it is written throughout. Besides it is obvious relish for the professed antiquary, it is replete with charms for every one possessing a particle of interest in the social doings of the people who have gone before us. Viewed simply as a collection of national airs, it is by far the most complete and authoritative extant; while, as a musical history of the periods to which those airs belong, it is equally creditable to the author's research and literary acquirement.—Sunday Times, London.

THE BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL.—The approaching festival for the inauguration of the Statue of Beethoven in the Boston Music Hall, is exciting not a little attention in other cities as well as our own. The true importance and significance of the occasion are well set forth in the following article, which we find in the New York Evening Post, and which we copy the more willingly because it places certain matters in their true light, which we have seen commented on not very graciously nor wisely in some quarters.

An event is about to take place in Boston which in its way marks an onward step in our national progress. * * The history of music in this country shows that by a few only, patiently and in silence, has the tender spark, wafted here from parent fires in Germany, been nursed; only by degrees has it grown under their care to a steady flame. Recently, however, the happy issue of their labors has become apparent. Already, in New York and Boston at least, exists a school of classical music, of which a musical journal, published in either city, is an exponent. Their disciples are increasing, and a taste for the best music is gradually passing from the confined limits of chamber concerts and quintette clubs to the wider field of crowded music halls and Philharmonic concerts.

A proof of this growing taste, and as we hope a further stimulus to the cultivation of it, is about to be given by a musical festival in honor of Beethoven, announced to take place in Boston on the 1st of March next.

The immediate occasion for this celebration is the placing in the Music Hall of that city of the bronze statue of that great composer, presented to it by Mr. Perkins.

It is well known, that at the time of the completion of this spacious and appropriate temple of music, this accomplished young citizen of Boston, then pursuing in Europe the study of music, to which he devotes himself—who, with a competent fortune, has inherited, too, their enlightened liberality from the founders of the Boston Athenæum—commissioned our countryman, Crawford, to make a cast for a bronze statue of Beethoven, to be placed in the new hall as its presiding genius. The artist responded with alacrity, and while declining to receive from a warm personal friend, in such a cause, any compensation, furnished a design which was at once pronounced a master-piece.

The casting was entrusted to the royal foundry at Munich, the same that had produced the monster statue of Germania—and when in that home of modern Art the noble form stood forth complete, it was greeted with acclamation. Nor would they suffer so agreeable an evidence, not only of enlightened munificence and high attainment in Art, in America, as was thus evinced by her sons, but also of her appreciation of their beloved composer, to pass from them unnoticed. It was determined that so auspicious an event should be celebrated by one of those popular festivals so dear and so peculiar to Germany.

The various musical societies voluntarily offered their services for the occasion, eager to do homage at the feet of their great master as he was about to take possession of the new realm in the West, which had acknowledged his sway; and on the appointed day, while the sublime harmonies of his own immortal ninth symphony floated in the air, and the swelling chant of glad choral voices rose to the heavens, where his spirit dwells, the veil which had shrouded this his best counterfeit on earth was withdrawn, and revealed to the gaze of those assembled, among whom were the royal family of Bavaria and the King of Greece, the features and form of Beethoven, as they were to live in the hearts of their brethren across the water.

The statue arrived in this country in June last, and has since been exhibited at the Boston Athenæum. We have heard but one opinion expressed of it, that of unqualified praise. It is of colossal proportions, in pale copper-colored bronze. The figure stands erect, with the head inclined forward and brow slightly contracted, as in meditation. The long and waving hair, rising from the massive forehead, flows negligently over the head—the right hand grasps a scroll, the ninth symphony—the limbs are strong and muscular—the whole attitude commanding and expressive. The garb is simple and unobtrusive, neither classical nor too familiar.

The statue is now about to be removed to its destined position at the Music Hall; and in the hope that his inspiring presence will kindle a new zeal in the cause of music, and in commemoration of this his symbolic landing on our shores, the musical societies of Boston are to mark the occasion by a festival in honor of Beethoven.

Mr. Perkins, who is one of the most active of their members, is to unite, we understand, with his brother artists, and take himself some parts in the performances. This is as it should be. Mr. Perkins cannot escape a grateful recognition from the lovers of music and from the public of his liberality; but by thus identifying himself with the other performers, who, both professional and amateur, have come forward, animated with a like admiration for the genius of Beethoven—a like zeal for the promotion of a correct taste in music among us, to tender their services upon the occasion—he manifests the same disinterested devotion to the cause which prompted his gift.

An interesting feature of the programme will be an Ode, written for the occasion by W. W. Story—the gifted sculptor recently returned from Italy—to be recited by the author.

The music to be performed, will, we learn, consist mainly of selections from the works of the composer to whose memory the occasion is consecrated—and among them, as the most grateful incense which can rise from this new altar—his own ninth symphony—executed by willing and conscientious hands—will be conspicuous.

It is to be hoped that the invitation which is extended to the performers of other cities to unite with those of Boston in producing these pieces in a manner worthy of their author—and of the high estimation in which he is held in this country—will be generally responded to.

A celebration like this is a powerful lever in stirring up the popular mass to interest and sympathy.

American sculpture—through two of the most favored of her votaries—has lent her hand to illustrate the triumph of her sister art, and lead her forth from her seclusion. May not the lovers of music indulge the hope that a bright omen is here visible, of a new era about to dawn in the history of music in America?

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, FEB. 10.—The past week has again brought us quite a number of concerts. Thursday night GOTTSCHALK gave one of his Soirées, as usual, to a crowded house, and, also as usual, to the general enthusiastic satisfaction of his public. I see, by the way, that he announces that "at the urgent request of his numerous friends," he has consented to take pupils during the six or eight weeks that he will remain here, at the modest price of $60 per twelve lessons! I wish him success! On Friday we had a concert by PAUL JULIEN, and that of the German Ladies' Society, which I mentioned in my last. The young violinist had not a very full house, I hear. He was assisted by GÖCKEL, APTOMMAS, and one or two other artists. The second-named concert was eminently successful in every way—the hall looked even more beautiful than at KYLE's concert, and was crowded, and the performances were, as a general thing, very satisfactory. Both parts opened with portions of Quintets of Spohr—the first from the C minor, the second from that in D minor, which were very finely rendered by Mr. TIMM and Mr. EISENFELD's Quartet party. Mr. FEDER sang two songs by Kücken and Schubert's "Hark, hark, the lark," very successfully, being much better in tune than on previous occasions. But this gentleman should be a little more careful to choose songs which lie entirely within the scope of his voice; several of those I have heard from him are too low for his voice. Mr. MASOX played several of Liszt's Transcriptions from the Prophète, which were, I fear, hardly suited to the general taste of the audience, and were not as well received as their rendering and the performer's volunteer aid demanded. Young SCHMITZ, in his solo on the French horn, surpassed himself, and received a well merited encore. The composition which he played, by Lorenz, was well calculated to bring out the greatest beauties of his instrument, and not, as the piece by Weber, played at the last Philharmonic concert, its greatest difficulties. The rich, mellow tones in which the very pleasing themes of the composition came forth, filled the hall well, and the exquisite pp. of the last part was admirably executed. The German Liederkrantz also gave us a serious and a comic piece with much spirit. Miss BRAINERD only remains to be spoken of, and, I am happy to say, most favorably. She can be well satisfied with her success before an audience composed almost entirely of Germans, for she was rapturously applauded at each appearance, encored in Robert, toi que j'aime, and a pretty song, "Our Home," of Mr. Beames, and would probably have been so in the aria from the Freischütz too, had it not been so near the end, when people were already beginning to leave. I never heard this young lady's voice sound better; it has something very pure and fresh in it, which accords well with her simplicity of manner and unassuming appearance. She has a very fine intonation, much flexibility, and a very distinct enunciation; if there is at times some coldness, too little expression in her singing, may it not be because she is yet young, and life has not yet brought her those struggles from which alone the true artist can arise? In the aria from the Freischütz, Miss BRAINERD did not seem quite as sure of her ground as when I have heard it before. This may have been owing to the fact of her singing it for the first time, as I am told, with the German words, in honor of the occasion. If indeed, as was said, her very correct and distinct pronunciation was acquired without any previous acquaintance with the language, she deserves all praise, and lenient judgment upon the very small faults in her rendering of the music.

CONCERTS.

[Crowded out last week.]

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.—The "Creation" was acceptably performed on Sunday evening, the 10th inst. The choruses were finely sung, with the exception of the concluding fugue, by some two hundred and fifty voices; and the delicious instrumentation, with all its little descriptive points, rendered to a charm by Mr. ZERRAHN's well-drilled orchestra. As for the solos, Mrs. WENTWORTH sang "With verdure clad" and the music of Eve, with her accustomed purity and accuracy of style; Mrs. LONG was hardly in her best voice; there was a certain lifelessness in: "On Mighty pens," she did not soar, JENNY LIND-like, with the eagle to the sun; but that was partly because the movement was taken altogether too slow; in the cooing and nightingale passages she won much applause; as also in the song: "Most beautiful appear." We have no voice like ANNA STONE's, to ride upon the top of those choruses. Mr. WETTERBEKE gave excellent readings of the Bass songs and recitatives, and was in good voice. Mr. C. R. ADAMS, (his first appearance in large oratorio,) has scarcely the calibre or the endurance for the principal tenor of such a work; yet portions of his task were achieved quite creditably.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—One of the very best chamber concerts of the season was that on Tuesday night, 12th inst. What could be choicer than the following programme?

- PART I.
1. Quintet in G minor, No. 4, Mozart.
Moderato—Minuetto—Adagio—Finale, Adagio and Allegro.
2. Second Sonata in D, for Piano and Violoncello, Mendelssohn.
Allegro animato—Allegretto—Adagio—Finale.
Messrs. Dressel and W. Fries.
PART II.
3. Larghetto and Scherzo Allegretto Quartet in E flat, No. 1, Cherubini.
4. Quintet in E flat, op. 52, for Piano and Quartet, R. Schumann.
Allegro Brillante—Tempo di marcia funebre—Molto animato—Finale, Allegro.

That delicious Quintet of MOZART, the best of them all, with its heavenly Adagio, a pure inspiration from beginning to end, was remarkably well played. The movements from CHERUBINI's Quartet; the Larghetto, with its strange, quaint variations, and the Scherzo, fine and fairy-like enough for Mendelssohn, yet in another vein, were extremely interesting, in spite of their great length and elaborate treatment, always characteristic of this author. The points were all brought out distinctly and delicately. Mr. DRESEL seldom has seemed to us more happy in his renderings, than he was this time both in the Sonata and the SCHUMANN Quintet. In the former he was finely seconded by WULF FRIES; we could have wished, however, a little less stiffness in the recitative phrases, which alternate with those glorious broad chords of the piano in the Adagio. The Schumann composition had been played here several times in former seasons, but never went so well before; there was good unity between the instruments; the wild funereal march, with its variations, was profoundly impressive; the pianist threw himself into the spirit of the piece with all that verve and fine appreciation which distinguish him above all the pianists we have had in this country, and the audience were quite transported with the power and beauty of a work by a composer whom it is too common to suppose entirely outré and unnatural.

The Eighth and last concert of the series (alas! that there should a last!) will take place Tuesday evening, Feb. 26.

[We are again compelled to defer our review of the Concerts of the week; but hope next time to tell of the delightful Soirée of OTTO DRESEL, and of the Handel and Haydn Concert of last Sunday.]

Italian Opera.

"THE PROPHET."—(Concluded.)—The Prophète was repeated for the third time Saturday afternoon—a better performance than before—which gives us an opportunity to resume our slight sketch of the opera where we left it, namely at the close of the third act, where Jean of Leyden inspires his army to the final assault of Munster, whose spires and battlements are suddenly revealed beyond the frozen lake scene, flashing in the sunrise—that famous sun which rose in the Grand Opera, but not for us! The fourth act shows the climax of this Anabaptist insurrection. Munster is taken. The curtain rises on the public square; groups of citizens, afraid for their lives, are hurrying up the steps of the Council House, to lay their gold and other valuables at the feet of stern Egalité! In low snatches of chorus they express their fear; shouting aloud Viva il Profeta! whenever Anabaptist soldiers cross the scene, but adding "Death to the Prophet!" sotto voce. The music here is quite expressive; that doubling of the melody in the low bass of the orchestra has a certain effect of over-much-ness, which well suits the insincerity of those Vivas! A few hurried, whispered bits of conversation: what news? The Prophet is to be crowned king of the Anabaptists! All are summoned, as they value their lives. But who is this poor weeping woman, in beggar's garb, seated on a stone? They lead her forward: it is Fides, who does not know the prophet is her son. After a few bars of sad and sombre introduction, by low reeds and basses, she begs alms that she may buy masses for her supposed dead son, in a truly touching melody: Pietà, pietà, whose supplicatory tone grows painfully, yet not unmusically intense in the syncopated deep contralto notes at the close. This was sung most touchingly by Mme. LAGRANGE. They drop coins in her hand, and as they hasten off with curiosity and terror to the coronation, the orchestra announces hurried footsteps, and Bertha enters disguised as a pilgrim. Surprise of recognition; in a breathless allegro she explains to Fides how she escaped from the Count and is in search of Jean; the melody (in G minor) climbs by semi-tones crescendo at the end, in good Verdi style, to the high G fortissimo in the major, as she gives way to the rapturous thought of seeing him again. Alas! Fides must tell the painful truth: he is dead! Their duet: Vana illusion, fatal speranza, the outpouring of two breaking hearts, is one of the most beautiful, impressive, and original pieces in the work—still subject to the charge, perhaps, of being a little over-ingenious. It was exquisitely sung by Miss HENSLE and Mme. Lagrange; the curious and difficult cadence at the end was true to the sentiment of the piece, while it displayed the very perfect execution of the singers. It was the Prophet's will! says the poor mother. Bertha breaks out in an indignant strain of vengeance; she is inspired to seek the hated prophet's life: Dio mi guidi! a song of more energy than beauty (compare it with Donna Anna's Or sai chi, &c.) but affording scope for dramatic abandon, which the young singer improved so effectually as to surprise her friends, while she executed the bravura passages, prolonged trills, and runs in the upper octave, with great accuracy and beauty.

We have now reached the grand Coronation scene, in which Meyerbeer has exerted his utmost skill in musical, dramatic, and scenic effect. Scene, the interior of the cathedral of Munster. The brazen pomp and splendor of the famous Marche du sacre, played by orchestra and band upon the stage, is in good keeping with the pomp of the procession, of electors, priests, soldiers, altar boys, virgins, choristers, &c., (even scarlet cardinals!) followed by the Prophet in white robes, and as thus heard redeems itself from the hacknied, noisy character which every brass band in our streets has helped to give it. The display was the most gorgeous we have seen upon our stage, and we cannot wonder that the multitude were so excited by the strong appeal to eye and ear as to insist on a repetition of the whole procession! (What a comment on Meyerbeer and the effect school generally!) The procession has disappeared at the side, where all are supposed kneeling at the altar; the crowd, excluded, kneel upon the stage before us. There is a muffled roll of drums, the organ sounds from within, and a prayer for men's voices (the three preachers and another Anabaptist) swells in solemn church-like choral, in the rich, dark key of G flat: Domine, saluum fac regem, in which, at intervals, the people on the stage join in fragmentary chant in quick syllables, exceedingly impressive. But the impression is heightened by a new element, a voice from one outside the crowd, the mendicant Fides, who kneels with them, but not of them, and in impassioned solo vents her horror at the blasphemous ceremony, and her curse upon the Prophet who has stained all Germany with blood. She thinks of Bertha's stern resolve and invokes heaven's blessing on this second Judith; and thus the intensely tragic music of her private feelings goes on mingling with the prayer and chant. The procession reappears; priests, dignitaries, electors bearing crown and sceptre, boys swinging censers, &c., take a raised position in the back of the stage; maidens strew flowers in the path of the prophet; there is an organ prelude, in the light arabesque fugue style, which sounds quite ancient, and the chorus of boys sing the melody which we heard touched in the orchestra during John's recital of his dream in the second act; muted violins make aerial accompaniment, whose sound blends mystically enough with the smell of incense (harmonies of sight, smell, and hearing appealing to the three more spiritual senses all at once), to the words: Ecco già il re (Behold the prophet king!) This is in unison; then a choir of women add a three-part harmony in long notes, while the boys' voices ascending and descending the octave give a singularly beautiful and contrapuntally curious effect. He was not born of mortal parents: recites one boy, echoed by another. John, crowned and invested, ascends the centre of the platform, surrounded by the dignitaries, and now the melody of the choir-boys becomes the motive of a general chorus full of majesty, and rich in contrapuntal treatment. All kneel; John alone is standing. There is a pause in the choral flood, and a few slight snatches of arpeggi, as John, with serious air, lifts his hand to his crown and recalls the prophetic words of the dream. Yet not alone; one other stands apart—in the foreground, eagerly watching all, with look of desperation and suppressed hate; it is the mendicant, who suddenly recognizes him, and, screaming mio figlio! rushes to him, while all spring up in confusion. The fatal Three are too near; fanaticism forbids all filial recognition; he pretends not to know her; Chi son io? she repeats his question, and in a strain of rare energy and pathos answers and reproaches his ingratitude. It is impossible to describe the effect, both musical and dramatic, of this scene, where the alternate indignation and tenderness of the mother, the assumed ignorance and divinity of the son, the vigilance of the inexorable Three, the surprise and horror of the crowd, are all swept into one great vortex of concerted harmony, with effective instrumentation. It is a combination of solos, quartets, two distinct choruses, and orchestra. The little half-choked, scornful phrase with which Fides ends her solo on the syllables: E tu non mi conosci più! impresses itself as a leading motive upon the whole. The tutti is wrought up to an overwhelming climax.

Next comes the scene of the exorcism. The Anabaptists surround Fides with drawn daggers; John withholds them, pronouncing her insane. He is inspired as prophet to restore her; standing over her, with his hands raised above her head, and fixing her eyes to his with a sort of magnetic glance, he compels her reluctantly to kneel; then bids all to draw their weapons and destroy him if she answers to his question that she is his mother; alarmed for him, she answers No; and all exclaim: a miracle! All this is wonderfully dramatic, and closes with a march-like chorus, mingled with religious strains again, as all exeunt while the curtain falls. LAGRANGE, in all this scene was up to the full height of lyric tragedy which it demands. Both in singing and in action it was a thrilling, beautiful, and great impersonation; we dare not say that we have seen greater in any operatic character. Sig. SALVIANI, on the contrary, is by no means adequate in dignity of person, voice, or action for so great a scene. Yet he did it passably well; his voice is telling, although limited in compass; he cannot reach a very high note without grotesque fulsetto, nor does he often try to sustain a high note; but his recitative is fair and singing generally true and artistic.

The fifth act is the weakest. The city is besieged. The three Anabaptists, holding secret counsel in a cellar of the palace, hear that the Emperor is approaching with large forces, and determine to betray John. They turn out knaves, and that is the end of them, and also of all further interest in the plot. Thus far they have figured as a sort of Fate in the background of the drama; nothing takes their place. After they vanish, Fides is brought in prisoner. Her thoughts of course turn on one theme; and her soliloquy is made intensely dramatic by the studied art with which Meyerbeer has set notes to words. The Andantino cantabile: L'ingrato m'abbandona is a real Meyerbeer-ish melody, quite in his own vein, and one of the most interesting in the work; in it all the mother's forgiving tenderness returns to her. A visit from the Prophet is announced; then is she inspired with hope that he may be converted from his error, and she breaks out in a rapid Verdi-ish bravura air: O Verità, figlia del ciel, which is full of impetus and difficulty, and illustrates the virtuosity of the prima donna, more than it does the sentiment of the song, a prayer for light from above to descend upon her ungrateful, guilty and deluded son. He enters. A long and impassioned duet follows, in which she charges him with blood and blasphemous assumption; the whole scene, as she leads him forward and, pointing him to heaven, gradually works upon him and makes him penitent, is highly dramatic, at all events in the acting of Lagrange; but the music, in its unisons and otherwise, still recalls Verdi; it seeks to carry you by storm, and does not in itself (as music) touch the feelings.

The remaining scenes are devoted to the speediest disposal of the characters to make an end. Bertha finds her way to this subterranean place, having learned that here combustibles are stored, to which she can set fire and blow up the Prophet and his household. We omit their trio, in which Bertha only sees her lover, and her air: O spettro abbominevol, when she finds her lover is the Prophet, since they were omitted in the performance. Bertha stabs herself. The last scene has little interest, beyond some brilliant festive music and a drinking song sung by Jean, who is seated on a dais at a luxurious table, surrounded with dancers, cup-bearers, &c., a sketch of the sensual paradise of his theocracy. The conclusion, as we have said, is lame enough; he has given orders, as soon as the enemy yet within the gates, to fire the palace, and a grand explosion melo-dramatically ends all in smoke.

We would gladly go back to recall some subsequent impressions of the first acts, and closer observations of their beauties in detail; but we have no room. Frequent hearing, and still more a perusal of the score, reveals more and more points of interest, things always ingenious and effective, often beautiful, sometimes original. We must qualify the common remark that the Prophète has no melodies. It may have few of the melodies which sing themselves, and set every hearer humming them. We recall just now but one, the pastorale, which Jean sings in the 2d act; and that, when you have heard or thought it over a few times, becomes the weakest and most insipid of all the songs. But melodies of a certain kind, dramatic melodies, melodies in which every phrase is wonderfully fitted to its purpose, even if it be more by a reflective than by a spontaneous process, there certainly are not a few. We need not again recall them. Music here, though taxing all the resources of a consummate musician, is always subordinate to dramatic effect. How different, we say again, from Mozart! With him the music is ever dramatically true, yet the soul, the inspiration, and the chief end and interest of the work is music. We do not change, therefore, our first impression, that "the Prophet" is more a work of ingenuity than of genius; a masterpiece of musical and dramatic mechanism, rather than a true creation. It has ten times the material, the musical thought and science, the wealth of detail, vocal and instrumental, ten times the novelty and provocation to a curious mind, with all of the effect, of any of the popular Italian operas. Yet is it not true Art in the best and highest sense. Not from the soul, but from the ambition to strike and to astonish, do such works proceed; not upon the Ideal, but upon success is the eye eagerly bent; Art, not for Art's sake, but for effect, is imperturbed with this a pompous kind of worship.

Let us thank, however, Mr. Conductor MARETZKE, and his efficient orchestra (small as it is for a Grand Opera piece), the chorus-singers, principals and all, for ministering to our curiosity and giving us upon the whole so vivid an idea of this famous opera. To have seen and heard Lagrange's Fides, is to have something worth remembering.

BELLINI's finest opera, I Puritani, was performed on Friday of last week for the benefit of Miss ELISE HENSLER, who sustained the leading part of Elvira in a manner to create increased confidence both in her vocal and dramatic powers. The part was new to her, she had not even seen it played; yet her impersonation was throughout appropriate, consistent, beautiful. The character as a whole was well conceived; it only needed more abandon. We can hardly imagine her destined to be a great actress, but a very good one, which is more than we expect of many an admirable singer. In the long and difficult music of the part, she was never at fault; but sang all with truth and expression, only a little chilled occasionally by the natural anxiety of undertaking so much for the first time. BRIGNOLI's sweet and musical tenor continually gains upon us; he sang the music of Arturo finely, but the memory of MARIO was too fresh in the quartet: A te o cara. We are not partial to the thick and coarse baritone of AMODIO, who carries the day by volume and loudness and a very uniform sort of full swing in his parts. MORELLI was admirable, as the uncle, as he is in all his parts; and Herr MUELLER made a respectable father. The liberty duet: Suoni la tromba, was roared as usual with immense acceptance.

We were not present at the performance of Lucia di Lammermoor on Monday night, which all accounts agree in reckoning among the finest triumphs of Mme. LAGRANGE.

On Tuesday, those who eagerly went expecting Don Giovanni, were turned off with Norma, owing to the sudden illness of Mlle. DIDIEE.

Musical Chat-Chat.

The programme of the BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL, for next Saturday, is now definitely settled and appears in full on our last page. It has been found impracticable to prepare the extremely difficult vocal portions of the Choral Symphony in a style that would be really worthy of the occasion. It is a thing for which few German cities afford the means, and Boston has by no means reached that point. It is quite common abroad to perform the three first (instrumental) movements, without the choral finale, and these form a glorious symphony in themselves. All the compositions are from the pen of the great master, and all masterpieces. Many more works one would gladly hear, but we must accept the limitations of time and means. The performers have all volunteered in the true spirit, as bringing their offering to Art and to the memory of a great artist. Many more, no doubt, stood ready, had there been room for them. On such an occasion there is no question of preference or precedence; personal considerations are merged; there is but one person, and that is BEETHOVEN, in whose honor the sculptor in his noble statue, the donor in his art-loving munificence, the founders and directors of the Hall which is to hold the monument, the artists with their voices and their instruments, forget themselves. The music-loving public will not fail to bring their offering of enthusiasm and fill the Hall.

The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB offer an uncommonly rich programme for their last concert next Tuesday evening. Many will be eager to hear that quartet by the young composer, RUBINSTEIN. Mr. J. C. D. PARKER assists as pianist.

The MOZART centennial was celebrated at St. Louis. We are sorry to hear (by a correspondent) that the Philadelphia festival was a failure. This accounts for the silence of the newspapers. In Berlin the day was celebrated on Sunday, Jan. 27, by a concert in the Sing-Academie at noon. The programme contained the overture to Belmonte e Costanza; duet from the same; air from Tito, sung by Johanna Wagner; Ave verum corpus, by the Dom Chor; quartet from Idomeno. Part II., the Requiem by the combined societies. Prof. KISS was to erect a colossal statue of Mozart in the hall. In the evening Figaro was performed, and at half past nine there was a grand supper at Arnim's hotel. A rich week that in Berlin! The Tannhäuser, Gluck's Armida, the "Midsummer Night's Dream," with Mendelssohn's music, besides Liebig's symphony concerts, all invited the music lover. . . . In Vienna the celebration was under the direction of counsellor Riedl, with the kapellmeisters Preyer, Assmeyer, Eckert, Hellmesberger, &c. The concert was conducted by Liszt, and included the overture to Zauberflöte; chorus: O Isis et Osiris; part of the Requiem; Symphony in G minor; and the first finale to Don Juan.

[Correspondence of London Musical World, Jan. 26.]

M. Adolphe Adam has been endeavoring to give a musical illustration of Shakespeare's Falstaff, in no wise deterred by the success achieved by your countryman, Michael William Balfe, at Her Majesty's Theatre, in the palmy days of Grisi, Rubini, Tamburini, and Loblache—Mr. Lumley's never-to-be-equalled "quartet." On Wednesday last, the 16th, M. Adam's Falstaff was produced at the Théâtre Lyrique for the debut of M. Hermann-Léon, for whom the piece was especially written, he choosing to exhibit himself before his new public as fat Jack, that "ton of man." The piece is in one act, and the whole weight of the acting rests with Falstaff. The humor is very placid, and not at all unctuous and racy. Not a vestige of the Shakespearian quaintness and drollery is to be detected. The part was stuffed well and acted indifferent ill by M. Hermann-Léon, who appeared to me to entertain no idea of the original. The last scene is farcical, but, I think, saved the piece. Falstaff, as he supposes, is being conducted to execution. His eyes are bandaged. He is led to the foot of the scaffold. Here he is about to make disclosures not at all creditable to the author of this strange joke, when they hasten to take away the handkerchief from his eyes, whereupon he finds himself seated on a wine-cask, before a table well furnished with comestibles. Of course, this incident brings the piece to a prosperous conclusion. The music of M. Adolphe Adam is, as usual, light and facile, but without inspiration. Moreover, it is not comic. The humor of Falstaff is beyond M. Adolphe Adam. It would require the genius of Rossini to embody it musically. The success of the new operetta, however, was decided, and it will serve as an excellent lever de rideau.

BY FRANZ LISZT.

 ROBERT FRANZ has not had to contend against a systematic opposition, an armed league of contemporary criticism; yet criticism, as it seems to us, has failed to recognize the important position which he occupies in the development of modern music. Robert Franz is self-taught. As the founder of a new dynastic line of lyrical composers he is no one's heir, and the dethroner of no one. He discovered for himself an unknown planet, a stray isle on the wide ocean, and stepping on its shores with lyre in hand, he attuned a new song. His tender, far-reaching and euphonious voice seized hold of, without wounding, everybody, and the crowd listened deeply touched, without being conscious how unusual these tones, how strange this language was to them. Every German musician knows the name of Robert Franz; to all it has a sympathetic sound, without their having a distinct perception of its noble significance, just as in SCHUBERT's lifetime few anticipated how high posterity would place him. Franz writes songs (Lieder), as Schubert did; but he differs from him so essentially that under his pen the Lied has entered upon a new stadium; he will build up a school and find imitators, if he has not already found them, as Franz Schubert did.

The Lied, poetically as well as musically, is an exclusive product of the German Muse; just as the words *Sehnsucht and Gemüth†, which indicate its province and compose its vital marrow, belong only to the German language and are un-

* Sehnsucht: Longing, ardent desire, aspiration.—Adler's Dictionary.

† Gemüth: Mind, soul, heart; disposition, nature.—Ibid.

translateable. Not that other nations have not possessed lyric songs; but they have nothing of the character of the Lied. In France the romance and especially the chanson is a product necessarily provided with some sort of piquant seasoning; cheerful or melancholy, these are always tempered with esprit, and never strive to correspond to some mood of mind through a certain assonance of ideas, through a certain diapason of feeling, through a sort of poetic tonality. In Italy the Canzonets, Barcaroles, &c., like the operatic Cavatinas, are pervaded by a warmth of passion, which affords no room to passive, dreamy musing, at all events admits of no delivery from scenic background, no abstraction of oneself from every object of passion. In some Slavonic countries we find something more nearly related to the German Lied, but confined mostly to the rhythmical dance form. In Great Britain, MOORE's Irish Melodies have called forth no musical interpretations of any marked originality, and the national tunes, which might be suited to them, belong, through the remote period of their origin, to another category of songs. The Volkslieder (people's songs) bear this name neither as having been composed by any one and every one (for certainly every Volkslied sprang from an individual poet,) nor as having been sung by everybody, (for wandering minstrels cannot transform an opera aria into a Volkslied)—but because they were made by unlearned and unpractised people, simply following the inspiration of their feeling, and not animated by an impulse to increase their power, to penetrate the mysteries of Art; not anxious to become artists, but content to be natural poets and to see their little works in verse and song live on in simple hearts, which beat to them as freshly or with as much quivering anguish as their own. The music of the people is pervaded by the breath of an altogether peculiar naïveté, which, like that of childhood, which even in its helplessness remains attractive, and in its aspiration may reach the sublime, is inimitable, because nothing can chase away the shadow which the knowledge of good and evil casts upon our soul, robbing us forever of the grace and beauty of unconsciousness. The artist, when he has once tasted of knowledge, strives not for the mere outpouring of a feeling, but selects a form and is not satisfied with any one which he may catch instinctively; he who loves Art for Art's sake can no longer claim to be a member in the group of these unconsciously admitted into the service of the Muses, who for the most part would lack the capacity to become deeply initiated adepts. This is not saying that the conscious artist earns his knowledge by the sacrifice of every kind of naïveté. There is another, higher kind, which is the portion of great and beautiful souls, and remains true to many an one through all his life. We meet it in heroes as in men of learning. If the "sapid" naïveté, as MONTAIGNE called it, is undermined and crowded out by reflection, it is often in the lyric poet replaced by a second naïveté, which, if less enchanting by its spontaneity, less piquant in its expression and surprising in its turns, often works upon us so much the more touchingly and deeply. This naïveté Robert Franz possesses in the highest degree, and therein is he especially distinguished from Franz Schubert.

Schubert's imagination was of an excited and impassioned order; impassioned to such a degree, that it wholly put aside certain faculties whose development might have been easy to it. A long-breathed labor was a hard thing to him, since he did not reach the point of concentrating his fire, of economizing his forces. His dramatizing inspiration sought, so to say, to make a scene of every subject; but he crowded it into a single scene, and thereby the Lied remained with him a Lied in so far as it did not simply strive to describe an action; this dramatic lyricist was content with lending the form of a scene to a purely subjective impression, and so he did not leave the natural element of the Lied, which embraces the portrayal of moods of mind and seeks to give to its pure dreams not so much shape as groundwork. Franz on the contrary is so far from being dramatically constituted, that he never once requires a scene. He is preëminently a psychical colorist, and, as with certain painters, the contour for him is only a necessity to which he yields as little as possible. In a few, but all the more correct and well-marked lines he indicates the situation and the landscape, and he succeeds in his limitation all the more admirably in accentuating this part of the picture. The greater the poverty of room which he allows himself on this side, the more earnestly he strives to invent the lines which, although moderately and simply, shall suffice to characterize his object. In his pictures the atmosphere is the essential thing; he seems to forget the earth in his attempt to describe the sky, its color, its clouds, its transparency, its enticing and mysterious infinity. With him speaks, in the noblest language of Art, the clear, intelligible echo of the feeling which has moved him. Here or there a grief, a joy has touched his soul; this he imparts to us, but lays paramount stress upon making us companions of his feelings, upon drawing us with him into the sweet or bitter satiety of an emotion, into his wavering and floating between ecstasy and anguish. To this end he does not, like Schubert, get the mastery of our imagination; he does not seek to rivet by the frame-work, by the pictorial environment, to thrill us by a stirring spectacle, by the nervous excitement of a painful impression, to overpower us by his irresistible pathos. He only sketches his contours with precise strokes, to draw us at once gently into the magic circle of his emotion, and drop by drop impart to us the burning charm of his impressions, until we have drained the cup with him.

His songs are mostly moods, inwrought in themselves, and seldom striving dramatically beyond themselves; his lyrical quality has much of the sensibility peculiar to feminine feeling. Anything like Schubert's Zuleika, or Trückne Blumen, we scarcely meet with in Franz. This exclusiveness of his mode of feeling naturally influenced his treatment and even selection of the texts to which he composed. A certain sensitive-plant delicacy of his musical feeling, shrinking from outward contact, must have necessarily made him shy of treating objects too boldly drawn. Since his conception of his theme reduces itself for the most part to one sharply pointed fundamental feeling, he is compelled to supply the stronger tone demanded for his accent by the scenic sketching of an event. Thus it may happen that his tone-poems often pass by ears uneducated leaving no trace, while upon the appreciative heart and thought they imprint all the more deeply what these have the sense to feel and understand. This sense is frequently a very complex one, since Franz particularly deals with poetic moods which conceal in themselves a contradiction between feeling and situation. In his numerous productions in this direction of feeling we find that vague, half-hinted, half-divined somewhat, glimmering through the whole, which corresponds completely with the partiality for fine nuances, without the need of crying colors to excite sensation. If we chance many a time with him upon a song which is destined to express a whole, predominating, undivided feeling, it involuntarily seems to us shaded by another tone; with the joy there mingles a breath of despondency, and sorrow is transformed almost before our eyes into a blissful self-forgetfulness. Tragical themes predominate throughout; naïve ones may come next in number; then follow the narrative and descriptive epic; humorous, comic ones are scarcely found. Since every feeling which goes very deep is in a certain manner a religious act, his tendency on this side has given rise to a number of songs, which coincide with the church types, and adopt the forms which it had been usual before him to apply only in the severe style. ¶ [To be continued]

JENNY LIND.

(From Punch.)

And have you not been to the PHILADELPHIC?
That's Exeter Hall, if you please, in the Strand,
Where M'HOWL and M'BLARE keep a Protestant eye on
The Lady in Red, and the Pope's brazen band.
But don't go for that—go to JENNY LIND's concert—
A far better sight will be set for your view,
Mrs. JENNY in white, and Miss DOLBY in lilac,
Miss MESSENT in pink, and Miss WILLIAMS in blue.

Our own darling JENNY, who comes on the platform
To warble the best of our MENDELSSOHN'S strains,
A trifle, it may be, more slight than she left us,
Worn down, let us hope, by the weight of her gains.
She comes, with Amina's old smile on her features,
And down sit four ladies—dainty in their hue—
Mrs. JENNY in white, and Miss DOLBY in lilac,
Miss MESSENT in pink, and Miss WILLIAMS in blue.

And the marvellous voice, unclouded in its glory,
Comes forth, like a Spirit commissioned for good,
Whether sparkling in air like the spray of a fountain,
Or gushing in silver abroad like a flood.
To Sermons, like CAIRD'S, be all honor—yet JENNY
Can say to the stall what he says to the pew.
As she sings, all in white, with Miss DOLBY in lilac,
Miss MESSENT in pink, and Miss WILLIAMS in blue.

We don't quite forgive her, our darling Amina,
For quitting the stage where her triumph was won,
And never had patience to ascertain whether Through blabber, or husband, or whim, it was done.
We hope she'll come back, and meantime we're delighted
To hear in Elijah what things she can do,
As she sings there in white, with Miss DOLBY in lilac,
Miss MESSENT in pink, and Miss WILLIAMS in blue.

She brought out our tears as she shudder'd in sorrow,
And dried them away with the flash of her joy,
As Zarepath's widow alternate lamented
The death, and rejoiced o'er the life, of her boy.
And never was justice more amply accorded
To the exquisite strains of the wonderful Jew,
Than by JENNY in white, and Miss DOLBY in lilac,
Miss MESSENT in pink, and Miss WILLIAMS in blue.

But her place is the Stage, from whose art she still borrows
The glance, and the pathos, the gesture, the thrill;
And we'll bet Mr. MITCHELL he opens the Opera
One day, with her fortunate name in his bill.
Yet still we shall have, at the PHILADELPHIC
A voice that's as liquid and clear as the dew,
Miss DOLBY'S, who sang in contralto and lilac,
With Miss MESSENT in pink, and Miss WILLIAMS in blue.

The Mission of Mozart.

LEADING CHARACTERISTICS OF HIS GENIUS AND HIS WORKS.

BY A. OULIBICHEFF.

The musician, who summed up in his style of composition all the tendencies of music, of the past and of his own time, could not altogether exclude from the opera the bravura aria. GLUCK had banished it and indeed for good reasons; he had to do with French singers. MOZART'S singers, on the contrary, shone in roulades and floriture at least quite as much as in expression. It would have been poor policy for him to rob the singers of their most approved means of success and of existence, the public of one of its favorite enjoyments, and the opera itself of an ornament that had become indispensable to it. Mozart accepted all the necessities of the lyric drama and did not sacrifice a single one of them. The expressive arias were saved for the most select situations; those, which were composed in favor of the singer mark the resting-places in the drama, which are almost unavoidable if one cares more for the music than the piece, as we do. Often Mozart did still more; he let the bravura cooperate with the expression, so that even the roulades meant something. The most beautiful, most brilliant and most expressive of all tenor arias, that we know, Il mio tesoro, is neither more nor less than a bravura aria.

Let us pass to the duets, terzets and ensemble pieces. J. J. ROUSSEAU'S view of the dramatic duet deserves notice, as proceeding from a theorist of the eighteenth century, in whom the exclusive taste for the Italian music was occasionally damped by the critico-philosophical spirit of the French savants. According to him the essential form of a duet is dialogue; the union of voices and their movement in thirds and sixths are rare and brief exceptions, which find their motive in the transporting energy of passion at its height. To prolong and multiply these exceptions he esteems the greatest impropriety, inasmuch as kings, princesses, heroes and their train, indeed all well-bred people, must know, that it is impossible for two or more persons to be speaking at the same time. Of the Terzet he says nothing, and the real Quartet he declares impossible. Pretty work we should make of it, if we did just as the books teach us! Ah! Mozart was very right. He, who had had only a common education, did not shrink from the gross impropriety of letting two, three or four persons speak at once in two, three or four different melodies. Quite in contradiction to the old theory, the more speakers he had to employ at the same time, the more were they distinguished by contrast of feeling and of character, that is to say, by variety of melodic plan and rhythm, and the more did the musical picture gain in beauty, richness, weight and interest.

The ensemble pieces, which had formerly been mere subordinate matters, occurring only incidentally and rather seldom, and making at most but little effect in the opera, became with him one of the principal affairs. Very fine choruses had been composed before Mozart; but between a chorus and an ensemble piece there is a wide difference. The chorus is a collective being, which has only one thought, one feeling, one text. The ensemble-piece unites individual beings, whose passions, alike or contrasted, friendly or hostile, express themselves side by side and in perfect freedom, according as character and situation may prescribe to each. And all these distinct individualities, all these oft-times multifarious forms of existence, animate the same chords and make a part of the same musical thought. Nothing is so difficult, yet also nothing is so beautiful, as the happy and complete solution of such a problem. One has only to recall the Quartet in Idomeneo, the Terzet at the death of the Commendatore, the Trio of maskers, the Quartet, the Sextet and the first finale in Don Juan, the first finale in Così fan tutte, and so many other masterpieces of musical style, which constitute the most astonishing wonders of the operas of Mozart and the highest which it is possible for a theatrical composition to achieve.

If there is a study which can attract the musician, it is to see how Mozart has understood how to reconcile musical unity with the most whimsical incidents in the drama, in ensemble-pieces where the action goes on. Could anything for example run in more seeming contradiction to this unity, than the scene, which forms the Andante of the Sextet in Don Juan! Leporello tries to find his way out of the room; then come Anna and Ottavio, and after them Masetto and Zerlina, all full of thoughts of vengeance against the individual whom they suppose to be Giovanni;

Elvira, who shares their mistake, entreats for mercy for her faithless one. A peremptory No rejects her supplication. Leporello is recognized and only begs for mercy for himself. General astonishment. Here each one speaks the language of the feeling that controls him, and yet each remains true to his character as a tragic or comic person, whatever the bond of unity between these heterogeneous fragments of melody and declamation may be; whatever the common basis, upon which are announced one by one or all at once the pathetic consternation of Elvira, the anger of the injured pair of lovers, the grotesque cowardice of Leporello, the astonishment of all, when the torches expose the bird under the plumage of the eagle whom they think that they have got in person. Around this bond, this basis, winds an instrumental figure, whose modulation and outline include all, and out of a masterpiece of a natural and life-like scene make a masterpiece of composition, independent of the drama. Moreover the unity lies in a vocal phrase, which is reproduced with wonderful tact, and by immediate repetition on the part of the orchestra is stamped as it were upon the ear, fixed in the memory of the hearer, leading him as by a thread through dialogue and action, and reminding him by its repetitions, that he has not stepped out of the circle of ideas in which the musician leads him round. Of this kind is especially the precious phrase in "Don Juan:" Te vuol tradir ancor, which you at once recognize as the musical pivot of this ensemble. We should never reach an end, were we to try to explain all the means which Mozart employed to produce this unity, this essential condition of pure music, or Art in and for itself, which it is so difficult, however, to bring into harmony with the conditions of the theatrical style.

Beethoven's Choral Symphony.

For the benefit of many readers, who will listen to this sublime composition for the first time this evening, and who surely must need some key to its general intention, to enable them to enjoy it understandingly and truly (especially in the absence of the last, the choral movement, which explains all) we have thought it well to reproduce here portions of the remarks which we translated or were moved to write before and after its performance in the same hall by the Germania Orchestra three years ago. Of course, such attempts at interpretation, such slight records of impressions, are anything but satisfactory; yet they are better than nothing. Richard Wagner's parallels of the first three movements with passages in Goethe's "Faust," although of course fanciful, yet furnish a good thread of connection, as one listens for the first time to the successive parts. Then, too, it seems absolutely necessary to give some sort of description or bare outline of what is contained in the concluding movement, seeing that we are not to hear it. Shall we never, then, have this great work completely realized? Must it ever end in the clouds for us?—fit type in that, too, of Beethoven's genius, which awakens in us such insatiable yearnings for the Infinite! We have had it done, poorly enough no doubt, once, but even then it left such an impression upon some of us, that we would not for the world have missed it. But for our extracts. First from Richard Wagner. Those who care to read his whole "Programme" to the Symphony may find it in our Volume II. No. 18.

FIRST MOVEMENT (Allegro ma non troppo, D minor).—A most sublimely conceived conflict of the soul, struggling after joy, against the pressure of that hostile power, that stations itself between us and all earthly bliss, appears to lie at the foundation of this movement. The great main theme, which at the very outset steps forth from a gloomy veil in all the nakedness of its terrible might, may perhaps, not altogether inappropriately to the sense of the entire tone-poem, be translated by the words of Goethe:

"Entbehren sollst du! Sollst entbehren!"
(Renounce! Thou must renounce!)

Opposed to this powerful enemy we recognize a noble spirit of defiance, a manly energy of resistance, which to the very middle of the movement rises to an open conflict with the adversary, in which we seem to see two mighty wrestlers, each of whom leaves off invincible. In isolated gleams of light we may discern the sweet and smile of happiness, that seems to seek us, as we seek it, but from whose attainment we are withheld by that malicious powerful foe, who overshadows us with his nocturnal wings, so that even to ourselves the prospect of that far off grace is dimmed and we relapse into a dark brooding, which has only power to rouse itself again to new defiance and resistance, and to new wrestlings with the demon who robs us of true joy. Thus force, resistance, struggle, longing, hoping, almost reaching, again losing, again seeking, again battling—such are the elements of restless movement in this marvellous piece of music, which droops however now and then into that more continuous state of utter joylessness, which Goethe denotes by the words:

"But to new horror I awake each morn,
And I could weep hot tears, to see the sun
Dawn on another day, whose round forlorn
Accomplishes no wish of mine—no one:
Which still, with froward captiousness, impairs
Even the presentment of every joy,
While low realities and paltry cares
The spirit's fond imaginings destroy.
And then when falls again the veil of night,
Stretch'd on my couch I languish in despair;
Appalling dreams my troubled soul affright;
No soothing rest vouchsafed me even there," &c.

At the close of the movement, this dreary, joyless mood, growing to gigantic magnitude, seems to embrace the All, as if in grand and awful majesty it would fain take possession of this world, which God has made—for Joy!

SECOND MOVEMENT. (Scherzo molto vivace.) A wild delight seizes us at once with the first rhythms of this second movement: it is a new world into which we enter, in which we are whirled away to giddiness, to loss of reason; it is as if, urged by desperation, we fled before it, in ceaseless, restless efforts chasing a new and unknown happiness, since the old one, that once sunned us with its distant smile, seems to have utterly forsaken us. Goethe expresses this impulse, not without significance perhaps for the present case, in the following words:

"The end I aim at is not Joy.
I crave excitement, agonising bliss," &c.
"In depths of sensual pleasure drown'd,
Let us our fiery passions still!
Enwrapped in magic's veil profound,
Let wondrous charms our senses thrill!
Plunge we in time's tempestuous flow,
Even we the rolling surge of chance!
There may alternate weal and woe,
Success and failure, as they can,
Mingle and shift in changeful dance;
Excitement is the sphere for man!"

With the headlong entrance of the middle-subject there suddenly opens upon us one of those scenes of earthly recreation and indulgence; a certain downright jollity seems expressed in the simple, oft-repeated theme; it is full of naïveté and self-satisfied cheerfulness, and we are tempted to think of Goethe's description of such homely contentment:

"I now must introduce to you
Before aught else, this jovial crew;
To show how lightly life may glide away;
With them each day 's a holiday;
With little wit and much content,
Each on his own small round intent," &c.

But to recognize such limited enjoyment as the goal of our restless chase after satisfaction and the noblest joy, is not our destiny: our look upon this scene grows clouded; we turn away and resign ourselves anew to that restless impulse, which with the goading of despair urges us unceasingly on to seize the fortune, which, alas! we are not destined to reach so; for at the close of the movement we are again impelled toward that scene of comfortable indulgence, which we have already met, and which we this time at the first recognition of it repulse from us with impatient haste.

THIRD MOVEMENT. (Adagio molto e cantabile, in B flat major). How differently these tones speak to our hearts! How pure, how heavenly soothing, they melt the defiance, the wild impulse of the soul tormented by despair, into a tender and melancholy feeling! It is as if memory awoke within us,—the memory of an early enjoyed and purest happiness:

"Then would celestial love, with holy kiss,
Come o'er me in the Sabbath's stilly hour,
While, fraught with solemn and mysterious power,
Chimed the deep-sounding bell, and prayer was bliss."

And with this recollection there comes over us once more that sweet longing, that is so beautifully expressed in the second theme of this movement (Andante moderato, D major), and to which we may not unfitly apply Goethe's words:

"A yearning impulse, undefined yet dear,
Drove me to wander on through wood and field;
With heaving breast and many a burning tear,
I felt with holy joy a world revealed."

It seems like the longing of love, which again is answered, only with more movement and embellishment of expression, by that hope-promising and sweetly-tranquilizing first theme, so that on the return of the second it seems to us as if love and hope embraced, so that they might the more entirely exert their gentle power over our tormented soul. It is as when Faust speaks, after the Easter bells and chorus of angels:

"Wherefore, ye tones celestial, sweet and strong,
Come ye a dweller in the dust to seek?
Ring out your chimes believing crowds among."

Even so seems the yet quivering heart with soft resistance to wish to keep them off: but their sweet power is greater than our already mitigated defiance; we throw ourselves overpowered into the arms of this gracious messenger of purest bliss:

"O still sound on, thou sweet celestial strain, Tears now are gushing,—Earth, I'm thine again!"

Yes, the bleeding heart seems to be getting healed and re-invigorated, and to be manning itself to that exalted courage which we think we recognize in the almost triumphant passage, towards the end of the movement. Still, this elevation is not yet free from the reaction of the storms survived; but every approach of the old pain is instantly met with renewed alleviation from that gentle, magic power, before which, finally, as in the last expiring gleams of lighting, the dispersed storm disappears.

FOURTH MOVEMENT.—The transition from the third to the fourth movement, which begins as it were with a shrill shriek, may be pretty well indicated again by Goethe's words:

"But ah! I feel, how'er I yearn for rest, Content flows now no longer from my breast."
—"A wondrous show! but ah! a show alone!
Where shall I grasp thee, infinite nature, where?
Ye breathe, ye fountains of all life, whereon
Hang heaven and earth, from which the blighted soul
Yearneth to draw sweet solace, still ye roll
Your sweet and soothing tides—where are ye—where!
Ye gush, and must I languish in despair!"

With this beginning of the last movement, Beethoven's music assumes decidedly a more speaking character. It quits the character, preserved in the three first movements, of pure instrumental music, which is marked by an infinite and indeterminate expression. The progress of the musical invention or poem presses to a decision such as can only be expressed in human speech. Let us admire the way in which the master prepares the introduction of speech and the human voice, as a necessity to be expected, in this thrilling Recitative of the instrumental basses, which, already almost forsaking the limits of absolute music, as it were with eloquent, pathetic speech approaches the other instruments, urging them to a decision, and finally itself passes over into a song-theme, which sweeps the other instruments along with it in its simple, solemn, joyous current, and so swells to a mighty pitch. This seems like the final effort to express by instrumental music alone a secure, well-defined, and never clouded state of joy; but the intractable element seems incapable of this limitation; it foams up to a roaring sea, subsides again, and stronger than ever presses the wild, chaotic shriek of unsatisfied passion upon our ear.—Then steps forth toward the tumult of the instruments a human voice, with the clear and sure expression of speech, and we know not whether we shall most admire the bold suggestion or the great naïveté of the master, when he lets this voice exclaim to the instruments:

"Friends, no more of these tones! rather let us sing together more pleasant and more joyful strains!"

With these words it grows light in the chaos; a definite and sure utterance is gained, in which we, borne upon the subdued element of the instrumental music, may hear now clearly and distinctly expressed, what to our tormented striving after joy must seem enduring, highest bliss. And here commences Schiller's

"HYMN TO JOY."

"Joy, thou brightest heaven-lit spark,
Daughter from the Elysian choir,
On thy holy ground we walk,
Reeling with ecstatic fire."

Thou canst bind in one again
All that custom tears apart;
All mankind are brothers, when Waves thy soft wing o'er the heart.

CHORUS—"Myriads, join the fond embrace!
'Tis the world's inspiring kiss!
Friends, yon dome of starry-bliss
Is a loving Father's place.

"Who the happy lot doth share,
Friends to have, and friend to be—
Who a lovely wife holds dear—
Mingle in our Jubilee!
Yea—who calls one soul his own,
One on all earth's ample round:—
Who can not, may steal alone,
Weeping from our holy ground!

CHORUS—"Sympathy with blessings crown
All that in life's circles are!
To the stars she lends us, where Dwells enthroned the great Unknown.

"Joy on every living thing
Nature's bounty doth bestow,
Good and bad still welcoming;—
In her way path they go.
Kisses she to us has given,
Wine, and friends in death approved;—
Sense the world has;—but in heaven
Stands the soul, of God beloved.

CHORUS—"Myriads, do ye prostrate fall?
Feel ye the Creator near?
Seek him in yon starry sphere:
O'er the stars he governs all.

"Joy impels the quick rotation,
Sure return of night and day;
Joy's the main-spring of Creation,
Keeping every wheel in play;
Draws from buds the flowerets fair,
Brilliant suns from azure sky,
Rolls the spheres in trackless air,
Realms unreach'd by mortal eye.

CHORUS—"As his suns, in joyful play,
On their airy circles fly,—
As the knight to victory,—
Brothers, speed upon your way.

"From Truth's burning mirror still
Her sweet smiles th' inquirer greet;
She up Virtue's toilsome hill
Guides the weary pilgrim's feet;
On Faith's sunny mountain, wave,
Floating far, her banners bright;
Through the rent walls of the grave
Flits her form in angel light.

CHORUS—"Patient, then, ye myriads, live!
To a better world press on!
Seated on his starry throne,
God the rich reward will give.

"For the Gods what thanks are meet?
Like the Gods, then, let us be:
All the poor and lowly greet
With the glad-some and the free;
Banish vengeance from our breast,
And forgive our deadliest foe;
Bid no anguish mar his rest,
No consuming tear-drops flow.

CHORUS—"Be the world from sin set free!
Be all mutual wrong forgiven;
Brothers, in that starry heaven,
As we judge, our doom shall be.

"Joy upon the red wine dances;
By the magic of the cup
Rage dissolves in gentle trances,
Dead despair is lifted up.
Brothers, round the nectar flies,
Mounting to the beaker's edge;
Toss the foam off to the skies!
Our Good Spirit here we pledge!

CHORUS—"Him the seraphs ever praise,
Him the stars that rise and sink:
Drink to our good Spirit, drink!
High to him our glasses raise!

"Spirits firm in hour of woe—
Help to innocence oppress'd—
Truth alike to friend or foe—
Faith unbroken—wrong's redress'd—
Manly pride before the throne,
Cost it fortune, cost it blood—
Wreaths to just deserts alone—
Downfall to all Falsehood's brood!

CHORUS—"Closer draw the holy ring!
By the sparkling wine-cup now,
Swear to keep the solemn vow—
Swear it by the heavenly King!

To eke out some clearer conception of this last movement and of the connected meaning of the whole symphony, we append some extracts from our attempts to record our impressions at the period to which we have alluded.

(After the first performance, Feb. 5, 1853.)

The voice parts are extremely difficult, climbing high, and holding (where the "Joy" chorus reaches its philanthropic and religious acme of enthusiasm) upon high notes through long series of measures; there had been few opportunities of rehearsal; and worse than all, the singers had never before heard the whole work put together;—had not, by listening to the three preceding movements, got gradually warmed to that pitch of enthusiasm and inspiration which is the key to the last part, and without sharing which no singers could have sung it well. The arduous range of the voices, the earnest prolongation and repeated renewals and variations of the musical ideas in that chorus are fully explained and justified by the poetic thought that animates it—the most splendid thought that ever inspired brain of poet, hero or prophet,—an idea fully borne out in those words of Schiller, to which Beethoven's music, if you will examine it, is marvellously well married, verse by verse. Was any ordinary form of music adequate to so great a thought as this: namely, first the struggle of the soul with destiny for the full joy of being, and then the recognition and celebration of Joy as the true destiny and state most God-like;—then the finding of true joy only in the largest and most unselfish sympathies, in the universal love and embrace of all Mankind; and finally, by a natural ascent, the rising from this thought to the thought of the Creator, the All-Father, who in the most inspired moment of the poet's imagination, is made as it were visible face to face, and to whom we seem borne up as upon the swelling, yeasty waves of Beethoven's music? And accordingly the last part of the vocal music assumes a grave, and ancient choral form.—"Hold there! don't let your enthusiasm run away with you." Well, friends, we tell you one thing: not to have been enthusiastic is not to have heard and not to be qualified to judge or speak of this concluding part and key-note to the Choral Symphony. Consider what that music professes, what its text and purport, and say whether it does not demand enthusiasm in the hearer as one of the first conditions, quite as essential as his ears, to apprehending and receiving it at all.

A true criticism of the vocal performance requires an analysis of the whole structure of the last movement. For the present this may suffice. A few quick, impatient chords, beginning on a discordant ground, like an effort to break away or break through into a freer sphere, open the movement. Then the double-basses utter a sentence of Recitative. More impatient chords, and the orchestra touches upon a few bars of the theme of the first movement. The Recitative likes it not. The Scherzo theme, is touched. That is no better. A few notes of the heavenly Adagio. To that the basses reply less abruptly, but sadly, musingly. Then they begin themselves to dictate the tune they would have it all go to, the strangely simple, but pregnant melody soon about to be sung. More impatient chords, and then the human voice (bass solo) in a Recitative of exceeding dignity and beauty exclaims: "Friends, no more of these mournful tones! let us sing joyful strains." To do this effectually, as it was the key to the whole, required a voice of the rarest grandeur and most telling quality. Mr. BALL did perhaps the best that could have been done for us by any resident artist, and deserves the thanks of all. Then comes the alternation of full chorus and quartet. It was in the latter that we felt the most inadequacy. Every voice, to do the music justice, should have been as rare and telling for its kind as was the high and clarion-toned soprano of Miss STONE; we fancy the piece has sometimes failed elsewhere for the want of just such a voice; and on the top-wave of the chorus, too, how splendidly it told. After one round of the voices, there is a sudden modulation of the instruments, exciting expectation, and a long pause, filled at intervals by measured beats, whereby the common-time rhythm of the "Joy" tune becomes changed to a more elastic step (six-eight) in a delicious bit of instrumental symphony, precluding to the heroic verse in the poem:

"As his suns, in joyful play,
On their airy circles fly,—
As the knight to victory,
Brothers, speed upon your way."

Here comes in the trying task for the tenor solo. We cannot go on through the choral passages that follow; but will simply say that portions, as they were given, sounded sublimely, even if it was not all entirely clear, and we presume the singers themselves knew how well their own music sounded to those out in the room.

On the whole, then, it was a great success. The first three movements were clear to most musical listeners. These three once stood as completely under water, as the last now is to many; may we not fairly presume that it too will one day emerge and stand out equally revealed in all its fair, appreciable, although colossal proportions?

(After the second performance, April 2, 1853.)

The two middle movements, Scherzo and Adagio, were doubtless the most widely appreciated, as it is in the nature of those movements to be always. The Scherzo, though very long and for the most part very uniform in its motion, is yet the liveliest possible expression of pure, outward gaiety and careless, reckless, social exhilaration. Not the joy that satisfies, but that in which the deeply unsatisfied soul seeks oblivion of its torturing aspiration in the most desperate abandonment to the philosophy which makes the live-long day and life itself a feast. The ceaseless repetition of the melodic figure, in rapid triple time, delicately staccato, like the leaping of the fresh blood in the veins of youth and pleasure, never seems the repetition of mere feeble routine; it is the inspiring rhythm of nature, in which you feel always something rich and new, and with such delicious blending of the instrumental colors and varied distribution of the harmonies, that you never exhaust its charm. The impetuous refrain reminds you of the peasants' dance in the Pastorale, and what could be more happy, and more positively jolly, yet with the inflexible gracefulness of finest humor, than the introduction of the common-time rhythm, where the bassoon plays such a pleasant running accompaniment to the simple tune of the oboe humming as it were so merrily to itself;—both figures being passed round at once in imitative duet through all the members of the orchestra.

But more than any part, the divine melody and harmony of that Adagio seemed to sink into the souls of the audience, as the sound of the Easter Bells sank into the soul of Faust when he was on the verge of self-destruction, and their sudden music brought all the sweet, child-like piety of life back again, and "the kiss of heaven descended upon his brow."—to borrow Wagner's clever parallel. The soothing, heavenly comfort of those strains is indescribable. Is it not the most beautiful of all Adagios? The strong, martial chords, which ring out unanimously before its close, so full of cheerful and inspired determination, indicate the heroic, manly, hopeful mood that naturally follows upon communion of so sweet and pure a kind. It is the trumpet warning of that grand resolution of life's discords that is to follow in the last movement, of which the theme is universal Joy, raised to a religious ecstasy of a general embrace and love feast of the myriads of mankind,—the merging of self in the largest sympathies, and therein finding God!

The first movement (allegro ma non troppo) is less calculated to interest the many; yet a little familiarity with its themes and the light shed upon it by the progress of the whole work, once heard through, and the summing up in the fragmentary introduction to the "Joy" chorus, gave it a stronger hold upon the audience this time. The important key to it which lies in the very first bars, (that rustling of naked fifths, conveying such a sense of emptiness and unrest), is apt to escape ears not eagerly upon the watch, since it commences pianissimo in a very rapid movement. It is well to have possessed oneself of the theme beforehand, and to have analyzed what seems in the performance a mere rustling tremolo, into its constituent notes. Upon this back-ground of empty and uneasy fifths is soon pronounced with startling emphasis the principal theme, the union in D minor, which is like the gigantic shadow of Fate interposing itself between the soul and its harmonious destiny. The alternation of this theme with little pathetic, pleading wind-instrument passages, flowing in melodious thirds and sixths, so characteristic of Beethoven, together with an occasional re-exposure of that dark background of barren fifths,—furnishes the substantial ideas out of which this whole Allegro is wrought up. It indicates the same deep, restless, earnest nature, and the same spiritual state somewhat, from which emanated the Allegro to the symphony in C minor,—for there is a singular unity of thought and feeling in the entire development of Beethoven's genius. Those who did not comprehend this Allegro clearly, nevertheless, felt its gloomy grandeur and its amazing strength.

The Finale was more clearly rendered this time than it was before; and many, to whom it was then all strangeness and confusion, now recognized some distinct and intelligible outlines of a connected meaning and felt that it was unspeakably sublime. We could have wished a larger orchestra, (say such an one as that of the New Philharmonic in London), to give all the imposing effect of those recitatives of the double basses, which seem suddenly endowed with the gift of human speech in their earnest craving for a fuller utterance of the thought, or rather the desire, with which the whole symphony is teeming, and which reject impatiently the themes of the Allegro, the Scherzo and the Adagio, as they are successively recalled (as much as to say: no, no, that will not do!) The sweet Adagio, to be sure, elicits a less petulant response; but the double-basses must pursue their foretaste of human speech still farther and dictate the melody, the simple, beautiful, all-reconciling tune that seems as if predestined in the fitness of all things to an everlasting marriage with the words of Schiller's "Hymn of Joy." These double-bass recitatives seem to mark the transition from mere instrumental to human music; and in the whole of this exciting, fragmentary introduction, putting you on the qui vive of expectation, the orchestra seems laboring with the presentiment of a marvellous transformation and new birth; it reminds one of the passage. "The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now," &c.

Of course, after this successful climax, in which the orchestra rises above itself enough to seize the actual form and outline of the human utterance to which all is tending, there is a momentary reaction, or rather relapse into the stormy and chaotic mood again, (the diminished seventh,) with which the movement opened. But now an actual human voice is heard: "Friends, no more of these mournful sounds, let us sing," &c., and the rich, ponderous bass recites, almost without accompaniment, the tune, (which seems so simple but which proves so pregnant, and clings to the memory which such charm afterwards) to the first verse of Schiller's words. Then the chorus breaks in; and solo voices, singly or in quartet, vary the tune to the succeeding verses, and carry it up higher and higher, as in the natural tendency of such enthusiasm. The change of the 4-4 rhythm to the 6-8 march time, where the full chorus suddenly modulates and ceases, the several measures of the pause being strangely marked by a single bass trombone note, with which a higher note at length chimes in, and then all the wind instruments blend in so deliciously and buoyantly, as a prelude to the verse which tells of heroic youths rushing joyfully to victory,—is one of the most marvellous effects in music. The energetic, closely involved, arm to arm and face to face sort of symphony which follows, indicates perhaps the conflict, the heroic struggle of and for Humanity. And now the strain of Joy breaks out more overwhelmingly in the consciousness of universal sympathies. ("Embrace, ye millions! 'tis the world's inspiring kiss"), the chorus rises to a pitch of religious sublimity and the thought of Deity, of the "dear Father, that dwelleth above the stars," absorbs all. —To follow this through exceeds our power. But we have here reached the point at which the whole meaning and connection of the symphony become clear. It is only from this acme of the whole, this top-wave of the composer's joy-inspired enthusiasm, that we can look back over the preceding movements, and feel how they were all tending in their order to one goal.

And here we have the secret of the success or non-success of the vocal part of the performance. The voice-parts climb high, and ordinary singers are dismayed at the task of sustaining themselves so long at such heights. Evidently the one indispensable condition of fairly singing such music, is ENTHUSIASM! Such excitement as in the orchestra made the double-basses speak, must here in the chorus carry the singers up above themselves, and make them achieve what in our commonplace moods is impossible. How can you interpret enthusiasm, unless you feel it? The singers must realize in their own souls the sentiment of the chorus, which is Joy and Unity with all Mankind, all souls. They must be inspired with the idea of the symphony, and animated by a common fervor. Such impossibilities are only achieved in that state of exaltation pervading a united mass, which makes a troop of soldiers move as one man in the carrying of a fort by storm; on the cool morrow each looks back and wonders what he did in the excitement of yesterday; he could not do the same thing over again now, but then he was greater than himself. It is unfortunate, in the performance of such a symphony that the chorus could not have been made perfectly familiar with the entire work (instrumental parts and all) beforehand, till they were possessed and inspired with the idea of the whole. But this was hardly possible in such a busy state of society as ours. Enthusiasm cannot be forced, nor always "got up" on purpose; therefore we can excuse the absence of at least a third part of the Handel and Haydn Society on that occasion, simply regretting that the absent ones had not more spirit. Nevertheless the chorus-singing was more effectual and more clear than before, and really did credit to those who so bravely stood in the breach. The solo singers, too, deserve thanks for so well studying and rendering their arduous parts. On the whole it was a proud achievement for Boston, to have brought out and appreciated so much of the life and power of Beethoven's Choral Symphony.

NEW YORK, FEB. 27th.—It is a pity that our subscription concerts do not occur at more regular intervals during the winter. I think we should enjoy them more, if we had, for instance, one a week, or perhaps two in every three weeks, which would just about fill the concert-season. As it is, two or three follow close upon each other, and then a long pause occurs before another comes straggling along. During the past week two have taken place, besides another concert by GOTTSCHALK; i. e. EISEL's Soirée, and one of the Matinées. Both brought us an unusual degree of enjoyment. At the former, an uncommonly large audience was assembled, the name of Gottschalk upon the programme attracting a great many. He played CHOPIN's Scherzo, op. 31, which abounds in difficulties—as if it were the easiest thing in the world—carried away his listeners, as usual, and was recalled twice, playing, the first time, LISZT's transposition of the Prayer from Benvenuto Cellini, a grand, solemn composition; and at the second encore a delicate, tender little thing of his own, I should judge. He thus illustrated three widely different styles of playing, and all with like perfection. He is doubtless a wonderful pianist, but I should like to hear him play the "Moonlight" Sonata, or the Appassionata, for instance. He has taken New York fairly by storm; it is very long since any one created such an enthusiasm. All young ladies in their teens are said to be desperately in love with him. His soirées, of which he has given nearly a dozen, are over-crowded, so that now the number of tickets to each are to be limited, a very sensible arrangement, and one which Mr. Gottschalk owes to the public. He is wise, too, in not taking a larger hall, as his instrument certainly sounds to better advantage in a small concert-room like Dodworth's.

The Quartets on Saturday night were HAYDN's, in B flat, No. 78, one of his freshest, most sparkling ones, with an exquisite Adagio; and one of the later ones, No. 9, in C major, by BEETHOVEN. This latter I liked best of any which we have recently heard, and our two parties of Quartetists have vied with each other this winter in making known to us the Master's later works of this description. The Allegro, with a majestic introduction, plays upon a pert little staccato melody, and is wonderfully worked up. So the unsurpassable fugue in the Finale. The Minnetto pleased me least—but all the more the exquisitely beautiful Andante quasi Allegretto, which I class among the finest slow movements of the composer. The execution of both of these slow movements was faultless, and the first violin was particularly pure and clear in tone, I am happy to say. The remaining numbers of the programme were filled by Mr. FEDER, who seemed determined not to detract from the excellent total effect of the evening, and sang uncommonly well. His "God have mercy," from MENDELSSOHN's "St. Paul," was rendered infinitely better than at the first Philharmonic concert; and a song by PROCH, a pleasing, though rather mawkish melody, with cello accompaniment, was well received. The gentleman has a good voice, though small in compass, and a very good school; his enunciation, too, is remarkably distinct, even in the English, in which language he sang on this occasion; and as long as he does not fall into the bad habit of singing out of tune, which was noticeable the first few times he appeared, he may be considered a good singer.

MASON and BERGMANN's Matinée was a worthy successor to the above named concert in point of programme, and in many respects, of execution, too; for these Quartetists show a very satisfactory degree of improvement from one appearance to the other. The performances were solely instrumental. Another of Beethoven's latest quartets, No. 11, op. 95, which was very clearly rendered, and seemed, on the first slight acquaintance, a true type of the composer's state of mind at the period of its creation, when the sad, dark struggles of his soul had already begun to exert their embittering and yet at the same time exalting influence upon him.

The Trio by RUBINSTEIN, which was played at the third Matinée, was repeated by request, and appeared to afford unanimous satisfaction. I, for one, was only confirmed in my favorable impression of it, and discovered in it, besides the pleasing, agreeable elements which struck me on the first hearing, many grand and deep points which brought to my mind what the "Diarist" said of the composer: "I can think of him only as a young Beethoven," etc.

After a solo by Mr. MASON, STEPHEN HELLER's Quartet, which has made great sensation lately in Europe, and than which I never heard this pianist play anything better, (in answer to an encore he played his own exquisite little "Silver Spring") came the grand and most interesting feature of the concert; BACH's Concerto for three pianos, with quintet accompaniment. You have the advantage of us in having heard this curious work repeatedly. It is, indeed, exceedingly curious,—almost transporting the hearer back to the far distant time of its composition. The effect of three pianos, and their blending with the stringed instruments, particularly the heavy bass viol, is very singular. How stately in its measured tread, the first part—how old fashioned, with its tripping movement, and its many graces and turns, the alla Siciliana, and then that wondrous fugue! It was most admirably performed,—with Mr. SCHARFENBERG at the first piano, Mr. TIMM at the second, and Mr. MASON taking the third part. The whole was so rococo, that I agree heartily with the critic of the Daily Times, who says: "It is a pity the performers did not appear in peruques and knee-breeches." I hardly know whether to call it beautiful or not, but it is certainly one of the most interesting things I have ever heard.

And so the programme of your Beethoven Festival is arranged. Not, I must confess, in a manner that you Bostonians can be proud of! The Choral Symphony without the Choral movement—something like Hamlet with the part of Hamlet left out—why not rather have one of the other Symphonies entire? the Eighth, in F, for instance, which, I think, has rarely, if ever, been played in Boston. Then one movement of the Violin Concerto—what a piecemeal affair! There is but one complete composition on the list. I had wished much to be present, but since I have seen this programme, am less disappointed than I should otherwise have been, at my being unable to leave New York just now. I think we shall outdo you yet, as there is some talk of having the Ninth Symphony here.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAR. 1, 1856.

In honor of Beethoven.

To-night our Boston Music Hall will be the scene of an occasion, the like of which has not occurred among Americans before. We meet to inaugurate the statue of an Artist, of the great Musician of our age. CRAWFORD's colossal bronze statue of BEETHOVEN, presented by our townsman, CHARLES C. PERKINS, after standing since last summer in the sculpture gallery of the Athenæum, where it has been unanimously acknowledged as one of the noblest works of modern monumental statuary, has ascended its pedestal, in the middle of the orchestral platform, where we trust it will long preside over harmonies of instruments and voices worthy of such a presence. To-night the majestic figure will be unveiled, and we shall look at Beethoven through the atmosphere of his own music, and perhaps feel more deeply than before how grand the mission, the genius, the life of that earnest, uncompromising, misunderstood, long-suffering, sublime master in the most spiritual, most human of the Arts. There he will stand high above the groups of singers and of instrumentalists, who have met to do him honor in the performance of some of his great works. There he will stand amid wreaths and flowers, the offering of fair hands,—the tardy gratitude (as in the history of all greatest artists) of an after-generation:—his cotch upon this earth was not one of roses!

The stage end of the hall has been beautifully decorated. The exercises will commence with a Prologue in verse, written and recited by WILLIAM W. STORY, himself a sculptor and poet and one of the truest lovers of great music. No doubt he will tell us the lesson of Beethoven; and the Symphony, which is to follow, will enforce it in the master's own peculiar language. There seemed to be no room for question as to which composition should form the leading feature of the programme. In Crawford's statue we have Beethoven at the highest moment of his creative faculties, with the score of the Ninth Symphony achieved in his hands, with the first words and notes of the "Joy" chorus written on it,—that work in which he summed up the whole meaning and aspiration of his life; the last word, as it were, of pure instrumental music, ever a language (in Beethoven especially) of the deepest and eternal instincts of the soul, and here now seeking their fulfilment in that perfect Joy, wherein genius realizes the full and conscious exercise of all its powers, but which it only can so exercise and so enjoy through perfect human sympathies, through the universal bond of Brotherhood, in which loving one another we find God! This sublime thought, this essential Christianity, grows and develops itself out of the orchestra of Beethoven, like a spontaneous inspiration, to meet the other revelations of the same truth. Arrived at this height it needs the human voice, and seizes upon Schiller's glorious words as just its fitting and predestined text. Hence the propriety of opening the Concert with the Choral Symphony.

Very deeply we regret that it has not been found practicable to bring out the last, the choral movement, as well as the three first. But we cannot sympathize with those who say: better one of the other symphonies entire, than this without the chorus. No other is so peculiarly pertinent to the occasion; no other so illustrates the design of the statue, so sets forth the soul and character of Beethoven; no other has so much of Beethoven in it; and no other is so little known to us. Next in grandeur and importance as representative works, would come the Seventh and the Fifth; but the Ninth is both the Seventh and the Fifth at once, and more besides; it sums up all the spiritual experience, the sufferings, the longings, the Titanic struggles, the sense of the Infinite, the glooms, the joys, the far-reaching enthusiasms and undying ideals, the storms and dark Fate shadows, the sweet low gushing streams of tenderness, the heavenly sunbeams visiting and comforting mysterious depths of sorrow, the joy in Nature and in human sympathies—all that has appealed to us in all the symphonies. And this it does, too, even in the first three purely instrumental movements. It is a great thing to hear these, if we can hear them understandingly and feelingly. All the others we have heard repeatedly; this only once or twice. What if we are not strong enough to ascend the mount of inspiration to its full height? what if its summit must still be hid in the clouds to us? Do we gain nothing, do we learn nothing by pressing on as far as we can go? Is not the aspiration in itself worth cherishing, worth asserting, until the better time when it shall be fulfilled? This Choral symphony has nowhere more than once or twice had real justice done it in performance; it points beyond the limits (practically) of our Art. The very soul and essence of the music of Beethoven is the yearning for the Infinite, is the aspiration which time and the actual cannot satisfy. He always leaves you with the feeling there is more beyond, there can be nothing here and now complete. If the three movements take deep hold of us (as we cannot doubt they will), to-night, they will make the present moment full and great, and they will create in us no stronger a demand for the conclusion, than do all the last strains of Beethoven for a conclusion greater than Art or life can yet express.

But in the absence of that chorus we are to have what we are perhaps better qualified to render and enjoy; and that is a work in which Beethoven seems to have made a first far-off sketch and forerunner of the Choral Symphony, namely his Fantasia for piano, orchestra and chorus, in which the donor of the statue, in his desire as an artist to partake practically with artists in rendering this homage to the master, will play the piano part. This is Beethoven's opus 80, composed and played by him for the first time in Vienna, Dec. 22, 1808, when he was thirty-eight years old, and sixteen years before the Choral Symphony. This too explains itself in the chorus, to words (author unknown) in "Praise of Harmony." Here too the animus of the whole work is joy;—the joy of genius in its own harmonious creative exercise, the joy of humanity in Art as a type of true union and of heaven. The piano as it were improvises in the happy creative mood; after a while it is joined by the orchestra which prefigures and sketches something that requires the human voice; the voices when they come sing in quartet and in chorus a tune which is almost identical with that of the Choral Symphony, the same tread and rhythm, the same song-of-the-people character, the same melodic idea, only inverted; it really seems as if here we had the germ of the Ninth Symphony. It is an extremely pleasing, genial and suggestive work, a much lighter affair than the Symphony of course, a mere sketch compared with that; but like the bright, elastic first inspiration, which, earnestly pursued through years and slowly elaborated in the mind's silent chambers, resulted in the latter sublime work. This may fitly close the concert.

Besides two such works there is not room in one evening for other copious or long selections. The pieces from Fidelio, the chorus from his Oratorio,—both works of which Humanity again is the key-note,—and the violin Concerto, cannot fail to interest, and to illustrate the composer's genius. We cannot do all in an hour. Let us not forget the purpose of the statue. It is to preside over a continued festival, over artistic gatherings and uses, which shall be worthy of that noble hall and of Beethoven's presence; a continuance henceforward of musical feast-days by which this community shall really be carried onward and upward in the humanizing culture of true Art. It matters not so much what we shall do to-night, as what we shall do henceforward, having erected such a type and pledge before us in our Hall of noble music.

CONCERTS.

OTTO DRESEL'S SOIREEs.—The second of these ever welcome entertainments took place on Wednesday evening of last week. Chickering's saloon was nearly filled. We scarcely recall a chamber concert, even of Mr. Dresel's, with more unalloyed satisfaction. The programme was not perhaps intrinsically better, did not contain more, than many he has made up for us. His programmes are always good; he is an artist in the composition thereof, as he is in his performance and the whole relation of his life to music. But this time, while everything was choice, there was the rare charm too of novelty, which did not disappoint. To listen for the first time to one of the finest Trios of BEETHOVEN was in itself enough to make the evening memorable. The programme was as follows:

- PART I.
1. Trio for Piano, Violin and Violoncello,.....Fanny Hensel.
1. Allegro molto vivace—2. Andante espressivo—
3. "Lied"—4. Finale.
 2. Songs,.....Robert Franz.
"O banger Traum," (Op. 5, No. 10)
"Umsenst," (Op. 10, No. 6.)
Serenade, (Op. 17, No. 2.)
 3. Variations for Piano and Violoncello,.....Mendelssohn.
 4. Andante from the Symphony by.....Schubert.
(Arranged for Piano Solo by Otto Dresel.)
- PART II.
5. Trio, Op. 70, No. 2,.....Beethoven.
1. Poco animato, Allegro non troppo—2. Allegretto—
3. Allegretto non troppo—4. Finale.
 6. Fourth Scherzo,.....Chopin.
 7. Songs,.....Robert Franz.
Spring Song, (Op. 23, No. 3)
A Grave-yard, (Op. 18, No. 3)
Welcome to the Woods, (Op. 21, No. 1.)

Two (to us) new Trios! And both remarkable. The first particularly so as the production of a woman, in a sphere of Art which woman has so seldom entered; indeed we have heard of but one other Trio written by a lady, and that by Mme. CLARA SCHUMANN. This Trio in D minor is published as the opus 11, of FANNY CAECILIA HENSEL. She was the gifted and much loved sister of MENDELSSOHN, and her early death is said to have worked a sad change in him, who survived her only about a year. She was the wife of a German painter of considerable distinction. The Trio we cannot regard as solving the question whether the genius for musical creation is among the attributes of woman; but it is certainly a fine Trio; full of interest and beauty. The most striking thing about it is that it is so vigorous, so full of fire, especially in the first and last movements. The Andante reminds you of her brother; and still more that little "Lied," which she gives in the place of the traditional Minuet or Scherzo, which has the fresh "Spring Song" character, at once naive and refined, of several of the Songs without Words. The Trio nowhere sinks into weak or morbid sentiment; in sustained strength, indeed, it exceeds some favorite productions of the brother. It is a difficult piece to execute, and shows musician-like resources, invention, treatment, skill in modulation, and knowledge of the capacities of string instruments, to a degree that one would hardly credit who had not heard.

The Trio in E flat, of Beethoven, is the mate to that wonderful one in D with the mystical Adagio, both being included in the Op. 70. It is an exquisitely beautiful creation; simple and naive in its themes, which however seem so to possess and grow upon the serenely blissful soul of the composer, that one fancies the whole work to have been inspired at once, whole, like the best things of MOZART. It is full of ecstasy, of a dainty, yet spontaneous and fruitful refining upon the themes and happy phrases; the shadows that ever and anon cross its sunshine, only show how deeply human the heart that rejoices in its warmth. The first Allegretto, in C, is as quaint and as happy as HAYDN in his best vein. The Allegretto in A flat, simple and common as its melody seems at first, breathes a purity and sweetness almost heavenly. The finale has all that rush and crowd of inspired thoughts and images, that uncontrollable fire and aspiration, in which such a genius naturally seeks an outlet at the close. This Trio for the pianist is not mechanically so difficult as many, but it requires just that artistic, sympathetic touch and coloring of the note and phrase, that freedom, that union of strength and delicacy, which exist so eminently in Mr. Dresel. He seldom has played better than that evening. Mr. D. was finely accompanied in both Trios by Messrs. SCHULZE and JUNGNIKKEL.

A happier variety could not have been added than those fresh little bouquets of songs by ROBERT FRANZ; and we must make our most sincere compliments to Mr. KREISSMANN for the truly beautiful, artistic manner in which he gave to each its true expression. We certainly have never heard them sung so well; his tenor voice, seemed to possess itself with more fulness and sweetness than we remember in past times, and he entered into the spirit of these wonderfully original and characteristic little melodies so fully, and reproduced them so successfully, that we recognized an artist in that speciality—a very important one—of interpreting the Franz Lieder.

Mendelssohn's Variations for piano and 'cello are the work of a master, each a new development of a vital thought. They were beautifully played by Messrs. Dresel and Jungnickel.—One is commonly suspicious of "arrangements;" but the audience were charmed, and well they might be, by Mr. Dresel's very successful piano-forte reproduction of that most witching and original Andante from the SCHUBERT symphony,—the one thing perhaps which we regretted most that it found no place in this winter's Orchestral Concerts, after such a haunting memory of it and desire for it as the Germanians left us. Instead of the Scherzo of CHOPIN, Mr. Dresel played three shorter pieces, finding himself, we suppose, more in the mood, or the new instrument more favoring Mr. Dresel loves to play these little gems out of the mood of the moment; and thereby his audience are not the losers. He played first a fascinating, dainty, piquant little thing from certain Fantasies by JULIUS SCHAEFER, a pianist who has fresh and genial fancies, somewhat of the SCHUMANN school; 2nd, a soft, meditative, as it were whispered little reverie from that queer collection, the "Carnival" or Scènes Mignonnes of Schumann; 3rd, the exquisite Adagio, commencing with a long trill, from a Concerto of Chopin, which every one remembers with delight in Mr. Dresel's former concerts.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—Chickering's Saloon literally overflowed with music-lovers eager not to lose the eighth and last of the series of Chamber Concerts, on Tuesday evening. The Club had the valuable assistance of Mr. J. C. D. PARKER, as pianist. The selection, not the best which they have given us, was yet a rich one, very much enjoyed. It was this:

- PART I.
1. Quartet, in C minor, No. 2, Op. 17, (first time,) Rubinstein. Allegro—Scherzo—Andante—Finale, Allegro con fuoco.
 2. Piano Trio, in G, No. 2, Op. 1, Beethoven. Adagio and Allegro—Largo—Scherzo—Finale, Presto. Messrs. Parker, A. & W. Fries.
- PART II.
3. Adagio and Rondo Finale from the Clarinet Quintet, Weber.
 4. Andante and Variations for Piano, in E flat, Op. 82, Mendelssohn. J. C. D. Parker.
 5. Meditation on Bach's Prelude, in C, for Piano, Gounod. Violin obbligato, A. Fries.
 6. Second Quintet in B flat, Op. 87, Mendelssohn. Allegro vivace—Allegretto Scherzando—Adagio—Finale, vivace.

The fault may have been in our own mood or condition—it was not in the performance—but the RUBINSTEIN Quartet upon a second hearing somewhat disappointed us; we did not find so much in it as we had thought we found upon a previous hearing. That Andante, with muted strings, we found empty of idea; it leaves only the impression of certain pretty, sentimental æolian effects, an aimless flow of chords, which are taking enough for the time being, and witching to the many, but do not prove the gift from above. The Scherzo seemed an aimless flutter, as if aspiring (rather awkwardly) to stay poised in air upon the humming-bird wings of a Mendelssohnian fairy fancy; and the Trio too grotesquely, wilfully in contrast with it. Yet there was power displayed there, and one could be amused. The first movement we liked best; the fugued first theme is striking, the second subject comes in aptly, and the whole is worked up logically and clearly to the end; but without revealing any decidedly new tendency. We might speak as well of about half of the finale, which after that did not appear to tend to any clear result. We have yet to begin to know Rubinstein, as he is glowingly reported.

The BEETHOVEN Trio in G, for piano, violin and 'cello, is the second of the three comprised in the opus 1, of the young giant. Of course it is not one of his most peculiarly Beethovenish productions. It was composed in 1795, when he was twenty-five years old and his style partook so largely of Mozart and Haydn. The three Trios were played for the first time at a soirée of prince Lichnowski, in the presence of most of the artists and amateurs of Vienna, among whom was father HAYDN, who said much in praise, but counselled him against publishing the last one, that in C minor, in which any one may recognize a deeper spirit than Haydn's; Beethoven thought him influenced by envy. Though we might have had a greater Trio, therefore, it was still interesting to contemplate the master in his first important work; particularly so at this time, when we are to listen to that grand production of his last years, the Ninth Symphony, in which his genius and his strivings are completely summed up. In this light the Trio in G was a good choice. It is beautiful, graceful, strong and clear from beginning to end; with the spring-like joy of genial activity in it; with deep tenderness in the slow movements; but on the whole light and Haydnish compared with most impressions of Beethoven. Yet there is a promise of more than Haydn felt in it. It was played with true artistic grace and feeling by Mr. PARKER, who was ably seconded by the brothers FRIES.

Our ears are partial to the rich reed tones of the clarinet,—particularly when WEBER writes for it, and we may add when Mr. RYAN plays it. Both the Adagio and the Rondo in that Quintet were in the true romantic vein of him who wrote the Freyschütz. The piano Variations by Mendelssohn were extremely beautiful and beautifully played. GOUNOD's "Meditation," too, on BACH's first little piano prelude was a thing pleasant to hear again. The prelude proper was neatly played by Mr. Parker, and the modern elegiac sort of melody, which the Frenchman has set afloat upon it (swelling the sails with string quartet accompaniment), was feelingly discoursed by Mr. Fries's violin.

But the great treat of the evening was reserved to the last. Mendelssohn's Quintet in B flat has always impressed us as one of the deepest and noblest of his works; the solemn grandeur of that sad Adagio speaks to the deep experiences.—What a fire, too, in the Allegro, and what a fresh Volkstied flavor and piquancy in the Allegretto Scherzando!

While we regret that we have come to the end of this admirable series of concerts, we have still one more feast to look forward to, which we may now know how to appreciate. The Annual Benefit Concert of the Quintette Club will take place on Tuesday evening, March 12.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

MR. EDITOR,—The very original and charming letter of Mozart to Baron V., published in the Journal (Feb. 16, 1856,) so far from being "hitherto an unknown letter," as the Musical Review supposed, has been in print since 1825, and has been the rounds of the Magazines and Reviews. It is given in Holmes' life of Mozart, a book which one should suppose would be in the hands certainly of every one who undertakes to edit a musical periodical. It is clearly a mistake to put the date of the letter as far back as 1783. (there was no date on the original letter.) Any one who will compare it with his other letters will recognize it as the production of the latter period. Besides, the journey to Dresden in 1789 is the only one we can suppose alluded to in the letter.

There are considerable differences in the rendering of some passages in the two translations given by Holmes and the Musical Review. Thus in Holmes: "Whence and how they (musical ideas) come, I know not, nor can I FORCE them." In the Review: "Why and how, I do not know, nor can I PREVENT them." We would wager ten to one that the latter is the true rendering, without seeing the original. The general stiffness of the Review's translation and its many Germanisms mark it as a literal and probably conscientious version. There are differences enough between them throughout to make us wish for a new translation from the original, which (says Holmes) is in the hands of Mr. Moscheles."

This may seem of small importance; but so little have our great musicians written upon the origin of musical ideas, that every scrap that tends to open to us the operations of their wonderful genius ought to be carefully treasured up. c.

Musical Chat-Chat.

The Italian Opera closed here last week with a capital performance of Il Barbiere, and a not particularly good one of Ernani, on the 22d, followed by the "national anthem." (Heaven save the mark!) The troupe are now in Philadelphia.... Mrs. ROSA GARCIA DE RIBAS gives her annual concert a fortnight from this evening, at the Tremont Temple, assisted by good artists, and an orchestra under the leadership of Mr. Zerrahn.... An event of no small importance in the musical culture of this country is the publication by Oliver Ditson of the "Four-Part Songs" of MENDELSSOHN, complete, over forty of them in all, with German words and good English version made by J. C. D. PARKER. Nothing can we commend more earnestly to clubs and choirs who sing in public or in private. Part of them are for men's voices. We shall have more to say of them.

....In New York, the German Männerchor societies have been having concerts and masked balls. The "Arion" produced a bran-new operetta, with the title "Ephraim Levin" or Der Gang nach dem Eisenhammer, the text by Herr COHNHEIM, the music by CARL BERGMANN.

ROBERT FRANZ.

BY FRANZ LISZT.

If we consider FRANZ in his relation to the poets from whom he principally chose his texts, we see him in regard to HEINE emphasizing only the better side of that divided nature. We see his songs accepted in full faith. "To the pure all things are pure." That is capitally proved here in regard to Heine. Other composers have for the most part seized upon his lyric-epic poems; Franz adheres to the lyric or wins a lyric matter from the epic (as in Durch den Wald in Mondenscheine, Op. 8.) He is most felicitous in rendering the pantheistic religious moments of Heine's view of the world, the soul in its movement toward the universe, reaching forth beyond itself, or if you will, dissolving into the infinite, (for instance, Aus den Himmelsaugen droben, Op. 5, — Wie des Mondes Abbild zittert. — An dir blaue Himmelsdecke, Op. 6), &c. For the rest he is less successful in Heine's toyings with the Spring, than in the pieces which represent more earnest conflicts. Here the conflict is not, as with others, roughly reproduced in its single moments, in its contradictions, nor drawn into the dramatic present, but only mirrored in its result, to a concluding and therefore reconciling mood; it is not boldly announced, but only hinted in the music; this covers it with full, warm sensibility, and so smooths out the rough places of the poet. Only seldom does the result, rudely drawn and as it were corporeally defined by the poet, obtrude into the encompassing world of feeling, (e. g. Verfehlte Liebe, verfehltes Leben, Op. 20). The coquetry and tragical refinement of many of Heine's songs go unrepresented.

To those points of his, which ironically raise a question where you look for a conclusion, Franz has only resorted in those cases which admitted of a graceful treatment (as, Im Rheia, im heiligen Strome, Op. 18).

With EICHENDORFF, who is always overdoing the Romantic in his lovely forms, who revels more in pictures than in feeling, who courts luxury with his little outfit of romance, Franz's conception seeks for itself a firm basis in the medium of music. SCHUMANN is wont to reproduce you the evanescent element of this poet, the part that melts away in air. Franz on the contrary inclines more to a realistic manner of conceiving him. By fresh rhythms, clearly determined forms, he holds the poet, who continually tends to soar in air, fast to the earth, (as in Am Himmelsgrund schiessen so lustig die Stern', Op. 8). Where the latter is content to serve mere feeling, the composer follows him quite unconditionally, (as in Gute Nacht, Op. 6), without ever sacrificing his own independence to the phrase.—The contradictions in which LENAÜ moves, do not admit of the same covering up as Heine's. These are more reflective, those are of native growth, given with the poet's own individuality, who is always followed by a dark and spectral shadow. You feel this in the poems, and are pained by the formlessness; in the music this mysterious element gains firm and lovely forms. Franz finds a reconciling expression in a greater melodic independence of the accompaniment, in the pregnant motives of the same; his music looks that spectre in the eye more firmly than the poet could, and dissolves the disturbing spell, which weighed upon the author, in artistic form, (as in Schilflieder, Op. 2). Even where the poet moves more freely, where he takes a deeper breath (as in Stille Sicherheit, Op. 10, Frühlingsgedränge, Op. 7), the composer does not lose sight of Lenau's constrained style, but rather adheres constantly to its peculiarity.

In ROBERT BURNS's nature Franz is attracted only by the kindred side. His realistic downright-ness is quite inaccessible to him; on the contrary he finds in his verses what the German lyrics, never quite free from reflection, do not furnish so pure and original: naïveté, directness of feeling, rising from the simplest elements to perfect pathos. Burns supplied the place to him, in the commencement of his productive career, of that which he afterwards found in the German Volkslied (for instance, Ihr Auge, Op. 1). The comparison is quite interesting. It shows that Burns, an artist by nature, organizes his material, goes beyond the vague naïve and gets at pointed forms, whereas the Volkslied contents itself with vague hints and ejaculations.

OSTERWALD is a poet of a kindred spirit with Robert Franz, in that he is thoroughly youthful. His Reiselieder (Vom Berge, Op. 9) and his happy sounds of Nature (Umsonst, Op. 10) are most successfully reproduced by Franz. The former are with few exceptions the only ones, in which feminine conception, feminine feeling do not form the kernel of the movement.

Franz is a model in the truly chaste, inwardly cherishing acceptance of the poetic word to the musical heart. Never does his musical reproduction breathe the slightest breath of any misuse of the poetic object to a preconceived musical purpose. Even where some single song of his, particularly when compared with those that are especially pregnant, or felicitous or nearer to our own subjectivity, might seem to us more fully formed than warmly felt, we shall still feel ourselves touched and tranquilized by the spiritual warmth of his relation to the poet. Contrasted with the frequent mistakes of composers in the treatment of poetic texts, from wilful humors full of tact, and therefore almost justified apparently, to actual rude perversions of the poet, the tender conscientiousness, with which Franz goes to work, must be particularly noted, and, in view of the breadth, consistency and unity of his lyrical creation, be held up as a pattern.

This truly feminine reception of the poetic product therefore determines and conditions the artistic means of his mode of writing, his attitude and whole relation to the poet. The musical kernel of each song is altogether simple: a harmonic, thematic or declamatory turn or phrase commonly controls its whole course. It is always of great elasticity, so that he makes it serviceable for the most various shades of feeling. The modulation throughout, far more than the melody, determines the development of the feeling. With all his simplicity of fundamental modulations—they seldom extend beyond the next related keys—his secondary modulations offer a great variety. They diffuse over the whole a continual vitality, they gleam and glisten on all sides, as if they would fain penetrate into the minutest and most secret folds of feeling: they are the true interpreters of the words. While the harmonic web seeks to sketch the situation of the mood, the melody strives to reproduce the mood itself. This is commonly built upon a declamatory basis, and grows to Cantilena only where the feeling should appear more concentrated and intense. The word is steeped in tone, forms in a certain sense the skeleton, about which the sounds cling as flesh.

In unitary development, plastic moulding and rounding off of form Franz follows the poet with the finest accuracy. Seldom, unless the poet begins at once with the full outburst of feeling, does he obtrude upon us at the outset the prepared and pregnant melody, whose too prominent passion might disturb our quiet comprehension of the word; only with the warmth of the poetical expression does that of the musical begin to rise; and the melody, often so modest and almost imperceptible at first, attains at the right time to a significance, which casts a retrospective light upon that shy and splendoreless beginning. In this organic springing of his song-flowers out of the poetic text, it is clear that upon closer acquaintance we shall find the obvious justification of the details, of the indispensable elements of completeness. Choice of key, time, rhythm, the form of accompaniment, the conduct of the voice both in its homophonic and polyphonic aspect, will never appear accidental, arbitrary; we shall see the inward necessity of all these co-working means as conditioned by the end and for the most part corresponding to it. Always an intelligent study of the poet decides the structure of the periods, the question whether self-repeating strophes, or strophe and antistrophe, or the accession of a new phrase is best adapted to the progress and turns of the poem; and the liquid metal of the pre-post-and inter-ludes fills up the depressions and protuberances of the mould so that no gap, no rent, no split may mar the beautiful rounding of the whole. Especially peculiar to Franz are his inexhaustible resources for avoiding the closing cadence in the voice part, and crowding the conclusion into an echoing confirmation of the accompaniment.

The Mission of Mozart.

LEADING CHARACTERISTICS OF HIS GENIUS AND HIS WORKS.

BY A. OULIBICHEFF.

Some one has said very truly, that Mozart would not have made his operas, had he not had in him the material for a great church composer. We may add, that still less would he have made them, had he not been the greatest instrumentist.

The first service which he did to instrumental music was, that he materially strengthened the orchestra. Formerly the Italian Opera possessed hardly any other accompaniment besides the string quartet; the coöperation of the wind instruments reduced itself to almost zero, in the want of competent players. GLUCK, who probably found more and abler symphonists, made greater use of this thus far neglected portion of the orchestra, than was made afterwards, yet always with a certain timidity. But Mozart was not bound by any of those regards, which limited the employment of wind instruments in Italy and France. He was in no way at a loss how to combine fifteen or twenty parts in one score; he knew the strength and the weakness of every one of the orchestral voices, and he lived in a land where symphonists of every kind were no longer rare. We see by the scores of Idomeneo, Don Juan and Tito, what 'blowers' there already were in Munich and Prague. Mozart thus installed forever in his orchestra the flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, horns, trumpets and tympani, which now alternated in the pieces of music and now combined in a grand, complete whole.

The orchestra thus constituted fell into two divisions, each of which had its special function. Generally speaking the tone of the wind instruments which are not made of metal, seems to have something more soothing than that of the string instruments; but it is notorious that in a long piece of music the ear in the long run is more partial to the latter, since they have the advantage of more freedom, compass and flexibility, and of an incomparably more various mechanism. Accordingly the fundamental thoughts of the instrumentation developed themselves in the quartet; the accessory figures were assigned to the wind instruments. As their timely effects depended on their silence at the right time, they did not always speak; Mozart summoned their aid in chosen passages; they enhanced the interest of a repeated sentence; they fell in one after another in the crescendo; they came together in the forte; they held dialogues with one another or with the quartet, singly or in groups; finally in pieces in the fugued style we see them bear the chord in long-held notes, bind the syncopations, extricate the resolutions, lead back the harmonious sequence to its elementary periods, while the violins, great and small, work out the contrapuntal figure.

It would be impossible to enumerate all the functions of these two divisions; but we must note one peculiarity in Mozart's instrumentation, which doubtless has its good grounds. In concerted arias between voices and instruments, the part of the soloist is always entrusted to a member of the wind band and not to the violin. Must not the reason have been that the violin, in the hands of a virtuoso, annihilates every singer? I have heard many Amenaïses, German and Italian, and among them some of great talent. When the fatal aria came, the most splendid voice, the most graceful and flowing roudades were eclipsed by the first strokes of the bow of a LAFONT or a BOEHM. The accompaniment of a flute, a clarinet, a viola, or a violoncello is far less injurious to the voice; it may even be of great advantage to it. In like manner Mozart invariably gave to the wind instruments the solos which he mingled in his symphonies and overtures. That is quite natural. The quartet forms the foundation of the orchestra, and consequently the solo stands out far more prominently, when it is entrusted to an episodic instrument.

Mozart, always on the look-out for all inventions and improvements which might enrich the instrumental coloring with a new shade, (witness the basset-horns in his last two operas and in the Requiem), pursued his discoveries also backwards and rescued a euphonious instrument from its unjust oblivion. Mozart restored the trombones. Is any of his claims to glory to be compared to this? Ye musicians of all nations and of all schools, go and erect a statue with your own hands to the man who has given you the trombone! What should we do to-day without the trombone? But alas! evil came also in its train. The restorer of this mediæval instrument had employed it in some scenes of his operas, in the overture to the Zauberflöte and in the Requiem. The effect was most astonishing, and since twice introducing it produced this effect, men thought they would bring still more to pass than Mozart had done, if they increased the dose. Because the trombones in one scene of Don Giovanni and in the Requiem sounded like the trump of the last judgment, therefore the trombones working through a whole score must at least batter down the walls of Jericho. But the effect did not follow; not a stone moved; on the contrary our composers wearied the ear by a means of effect, which moderately and seasonably used, as Mozart used it, would always have preserved its power. With such auxiliaries Mozart could multiply his accompaniment as much as he pleased and exhaust all possible forms, from the nakedness of the oft-times so powerful unisono to the dazzling luxury of four concerted voices; from the natural chord, struck full or broken into arpeggios, to the literal canon kept upon a quarter pause. And if one examines all these forms, he will always find a select taste and a deep calculation; he will not find one which does not clothe the vocal melody in the most agreeable costume and lend the drama the most faithful commentary that could have been selected, to set off the melody and make the situation real.

At this day, now that the material, and principal arrangements of this orchestra have become the common property of music, Mozart's works have ceased, in many points to which we have referred, to be originals. Some of his imitators stand near him in respect to richness of instrumentation and knowledge of acoustic tone-painting; many have even outbidden him and gone beyond the goal, instead of reaching it. Few of the present masters, only indeed the greatest among them, have studied the negative side of the Mozartean instrumentation; we mean the learned and deeply calculated simplicity which reigns in some pieces of his operas. Why are there so many chords there, in which one or more intervals are wanting; so many parts at leisure; so many empty lines and others that are so little filled? Ask the Italians, those umpires in the matter of melodic taste and euphony. Their school taught that the most difficult thing in the accompaniment was to know, not what all to bring in, but what to leave out in the orchestra. Mozart, the boldest among fuguists, the most complete and brilliant instrumentist, was so penetrated by this truth, that he often limited the orchestra to a mere guitar accompaniment. One might have fancied he accompanied by ear, like one who had not learned music. Here and there a little stroke of two notes; a tone prolonged in the wind instruments, pauses as good as nothing, and the enchantment has reached its highest pitch and the effect thrills through the marrow of your bones. Not to multiply examples needlessly, I will refer to the fragment before cited from the "Catalogue Song."

Honor to whom honor is due! The man among contemporary masters, who in his accompaniments has best brought out this admirable grace and wonderful simplicity, is GIACOMO ROSSINI. How he has always, like his prototype, respected the limits which in the musical drama separate poetic from picturesque or interpretative imitation, the vocal melody from the orchestra! The voice must not sing like an instrument. Parts, which are wholly occupied with little figures in sixteenths and thirty-seconds, with slurred or pointed arpeggios, staccatos, &c., may have their value and their signification in the orchestra; but if you exact them of the singer, these things change the purity of the vocal melody and disturb the dramatic expression; they become repulsive and sink into what we call formalism.

In the fact that Mozart's music has lost some of the marks which made it wholly new in the 18th century, it still seems to have lost nothing. His masterpieces maintain themselves victorious against imitation in the whole and plagiarism in particulars. One may imitate the external form or outline; but one can imitate no universal spirit and no science of a universal style. That is the reason why Don Juan, the Requiem, the overtures, symphonies, quintets and quartets of Mozart still, as in their first days, stand out in contrast with all the productions of old and modern music.

But we must respect the truth and say, that the dramatic works of Mozart are not free from faults. With the exception of a single work, we find in them weak pieces, melodies that are trivial, or that even do not harmonize with the words. But who was to blame for that? He was obliged to live, and in order that he might live a sacrifice had to be made to the taste of the age. No one paid less obedience to this necessity than Mozart; no one complained more of it. He complained of it upon his death-bed; the honor of having been accidentally a musician a la mode tormented his conscience like a deadly sin,—and yet so little had he taken this guilt on himself!

In his instrumental music Mozart freed himself entirely from a yoke, which was to him so intolerable. In that you find no admixture, no trace of any transitory taste, no note that is obsolete; in all you find that soaring aspiration, which is never weary, thoughts upon which the unalterable seal of an imperishable distinction and elegance is set forever; wonderful works. I mean the works which were composed from 1784 to 1791.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

An Analysis of the First Movement of the Ninth Symphony.

MR. DWIGHT: Dear Sir,—Permit me to send you below an analysis of the first movement of the glorious Ninth Symphony, which we heard with great delight on Saturday evening. One regret, however, mingled with this pleasure, viz. that we were not permitted to enjoy the whole of the Symphony. I think I am justified in asserting that all who know this gigantic work of genius, felt the want of a solution, of something that would satisfy the pent-up expectation created by the preceding three movements. Would it not be possible to have another concert, where we could hear the symphony entire?

Permit me to ask your excuse and that of your readers for the imperfections of the following sketch. I had not time to follow the advice of old Horace, when he says:

....." Si quid tamen olim
Scripseris.....nonnumque prematur in annum,
Membranis intus positus."

The history of the Ninth Symphony is an interesting one, though it does not speak well for one class of critics. Great was the consternation among the musical public when it appeared, and loud was the clamor and intelligent the phrases which the Snarls and Soapers of that day used when they gave "the benefit of their practised judgment." The most benevolent among them helped themselves out of the difficulty by declaring: "The old deaf man was certainly out of his wits when he wrote it." We think differently now. But even the earnest admirers of him, the hero of our tone-world, still find difficulties in understanding the first and last movements of the Ninth Symphony. Now in so stupendous a work of Art as this is, which appeals at once to the feelings and to the judgment of the hearer, the general impression derived from hearing it can only become clear and settled by reflecting it through the understanding. And this can only be done by finding out the details, which in their connection form the whole. These details are the musical motives. By singling out these motives and becoming thoroughly acquainted with their form and character, we can then almost with certainty follow the composer through all the changes of his emotions. And only this ensures a full understanding of any musical work of Art; for the form (material substratum) and the spirit of anything are one and inseparable. The necessity of avoiding technicalities and the wish not to trespass on the valuable space in your paper, forbade the dwelling on the very great changes of character which different harmonies (and rhythms) produce with one and the same motive.

Though more numerous in this movement than in any other symphony of the master, there are only eight motives, which, by their repetition and working up, form the whole first movement: Allegro ma non troppo, un poco maestoso.

The first motive appears immediately after the introductory fifths, in a unison of all the string and most of the wind instruments in the sixteenth measure, thus:

This determined, grand and energetic motive is followed by the plaintive second motive (24th measure):

and this is succeeded in the 27th measure by a figure which appears very frequently afterwards with its sturdy, war-like rhythm.

From the 36th measure to the 55th, the first motive with its preceding fifths is repeated.

The measures from 55 to 63 are filled by a figure comprising the last three notes of the 3rd measure in the 1st motive (a) and the first note of the 4th measure of the same motive. This figure is remarkable, being used quite a number of times either independently by all the instruments or as an accompaniment to another melody.

The measures from 63 to 71 contain a variation of motive No. 2.

The measures 75 to 80 bring as an answer to the preceding plaintive motive a new motive full of kindly assurance, which is so strong an allusion to the beginning of the Hymn to Joy, that I set them both here. Our present motive says:

No. 4. Flauti. Corni bassi.
Fagotti. Obol an 8va lower. loco.

Theme of the Hymn to Joy:

With the 81st measure begins a motive which in lofty steps carrying us upward is accompanied by that restless third measure of motive No. 1:

No. 5.

and extending to measure 93d, slightly varied, is followed by a variation of motive No. 2, which twice repeated is interrupted in its grief by that war-like motive No. 3, in measure 103d, introducing this sweet and soothing motive:

No. 6.

This motive, here in B flat, is by a sudden modulation with most surprising and winning effect repeated in B natural, and, after a short repetition of motive 2, (varied), comes, in measure 121, after an introduction of quickly changing harmonies, that motive full of longing, derived from (a), motive 1:

No. 7. Fagotti. Clarinetti.
Viol. I. mo. Viol. 2do. Simili.

This, repeated to measure 133d, gives way to impatient runs in the strings, and they in turn are answered by this soothing motive, which is repeatedly brought forward in measures 139th to 147th:

Cheerily call out the horns their motive No. 3 between the repetitions; and measures 147 to 150 close with a cadence followed in 150 to 158 by the tonic chord in B flat, in the determined rhythm of No. 3, (first three notes), and thus closes the first part of this movement.

And these eight motives form the material for the two succeeding parts of this first movement.

The second part (from measure 158) of this movement presents the restless motion of every second part of pieces written in Sonata form. It contains in its larger portion only the first motive in an enlarged treatment. Thus opening in measure 158, like the first part, with those vague, ill-boding fifths, it constantly repeats with increasing motion and strength, wilder and wilder, the two first measures of motive No. 1. Only interrupted by the third measure (a) of the same No. 1, in fourfold repetition, this time with a soft plaintive character (measures 192 to 195), the same two first measures of theme No. 1 are with still increasing strength treated again in measures 197 to 209, when the measures 192 to 197 are also repeated.

After two introductory measures follows now in measure 218th the second part of the motive No. 1: viz. its 3rd and 4th measures, the latter one only being treated largely and constantly repeated in all the subsequent measures from 218 to 252.

The measures from 253 to 274 are occupied with that fruitful third measure of motive No. 1, which in 259 to 267 assumes a more distinct melodic form in the sad:

No. 9. Cantabile. Viol. I. mo.

full of tender grief.

The motive No. 5 appears again in measures 275 to 286 from where the last measures of motive No. 1 are brought forward, one set of instruments playing the 3rd and simultaneously another set of instruments playing the 4th measure, to measure 297.

From here the same motive (a) leads in constant repetition, swelling to enormous power, to the gigantic beginning of the Third part of this movement. Opening in measure 302d with the same notes as the first part, the fortissimo of the instruments produces an overpowering effect. The first and second motives are introduced exactly as in the first part, only that motive No. 2 is repeated six times to measure 339. But soothing (in measure 340) comes in the kindly motive No. 4, followed as in the first part closely by that lofty motive No. 5 (346 to 359.) Immediately, however, comes in (measure 360 to 369) motive 2 again, soft at the outset, but with a mighty crescendo growing wild and storming in a triple repetition as in the first part.

Full of high energy motive No. 3 interrupts, succeeded by motive No. 6, as it was in the first part.

From here (measures 369 to 427) follows a close repetition of the corresponding measures (103 to 158) of the first part, only the keys being changed, up to the very close of the first part; in the same rhythm as at the end of the first part comes in the tonic chord, but here in D minor. So that the measures 302 to 427 may be called a strict repetition of the first part to its end (measure 158). From measure 428 begins a resumé, as it were, of the second part of this movement. Introducing at once motive No. 1 (its character, however, being changed by substituting the 3rd measure of the Cantabile No. 9 for the last one of No. 1) it introduces, in the measures 454 to 464, motive No. 2 in much the same way as in measures 93 to 103.

Measures 464 to 469 bring in (as in the first part, 94 to 102) motive No. 3, this time not followed by that soothing 6th motive, but by the 3rd and 4th measures of motive No. 1, in measures 470 to 495, treated exactly as it was in measures 218 to 240, change of keys excepted. Once more (measures 496 to 505) follows the 2nd motive treated as in 93 to 103, and then for a last time the 3rd measure (of motive 1) exactly as treated in 192 to 197 in that soft, plaintive way.

And from here, measure 513 to 546 (the end of the movement) begins the coda. It introduces (pianissimo with all the bass wind instruments and all the strings in unison) this chromatic sequence (the other wind instruments meanwhile beginning the cadence:) No. 10.

which after some changes, and increasing gradually to a fortissimo, leads in 538 into the first motive, which in the measures 538 to 546 is played almost in unison with some intervening runs.

Thus ends this movement, its contrasts not reconciled, the first motive with its stern, unyielding, energetic character ruling supreme, as Fate in the tragedies of Sophocles and Aeschylus.

THE LOST CHURCH.

FROM THE GERMAN OF UHLAND.

A muffled tolling in the air
Is heard far down the wood's recesses;
None knows when first it sounded there,
Its cause the legend dimly guesses.
Of the Lost Church the tones, 'tis said,
Swell on the wind through these lone places;
Here once a crowded pathway led,
But no one now can find its traces.

As, late, the forest depths I trod,
Where now no beaten track extended,
And from this world of sin to God
My yearning soul in prayer ascended,
When all the wilderness was stilled,
I heard again that airy tolling;
The higher my devotion swelled,
More near and clear the waves came rolling.

My senses were so snatched away,
Inward so far the sound upbore me,
That, to this hour, I cannot say
What strange, unearthly power came o'er me.
More than a hundred years had fled,
Methought, while I had thus been dreaming,
When, through the clouds above my head,
Broke a free space, like noontide gleaming.

The sky was such a deep dark-blue,
The sunlight was so rich and gushing,
And a proud minster, full in view,
Stood in the golden splendor flushing.
Methought, bright clouds, like wings, upbore
The stately pile, while ever higher
Seemed through the blessed heavens to soar,
Till lost to sight, the sparkling spire.

I heard the bell, with blissful clang,
Resound through all the trembling tower,
Swayed by no rope or hand it rang,
But by a holy tempest's power.
Methought my beating heart it swept
On with it like a billowy ocean,
Till, 'neath that lofty dome I slept
With trembling tread and glad emotion.

How, in those halls, to me it seemed,
Can never more in words be painted;
How darkly-clear the windows gleamed
With forms of all the martyrs sainted!
Then saw I, filled with wondrous light,
Glow into life those pictured splendors;
A world was opened to my sight
Of holy women—God's-defenders.

As, thrilled all through with love and awe,
I fell before the altar, kneeling,
Behold, high over me, I saw
Heaven's glory painted on the ceiling.
But when I raised my eyes once more,
The arch had burst with silent thunder,
Wide open flung was Heaven's high door,
And every veil was rent asunder.

What majesty I now beheld,
In still, adoring wonder bending;
Upon my ear what music swelled,
Trumpet and organ far transcending,
No word of man hath power to tell;
Who yearns to know and vainly guesses,
Give heed to the mysterious bell
That tolls far down the wood's recesses.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, MARCH 3d.—The third Philharmonic Concert, which took place on Saturday night, was so crowded, in spite of the very disagreeable weather, that it was only fortunate this same bad weather kept many more away. I subjoin the programme:

PART I.
Julien Symphony, No. 2, in D minor, Op. 24... G. F. Bristow.
1. Allegro appassionato—2. Allegretto—3. Andante—
4. Allegro agitato.
Capriccio Brillante, in B minor, Op. 22, (Piano-Forte and Orchestra)... Mendelssohn.
Mr. Richard Hoffman.

PART II.
Overture to "Anacreon," in D... Cherubini.
Concerto, for the Violin, Op. 64, in E... Mendelssohn.
1. Allegro molto appassionato—2. Andante—3. Allegro molto vivace.
Mr. Joseph Burke.
(Intermission of five minutes.)
Overture: "Die Waldnymph," Op. 20, in F... W. S. Bennett.

Much might be said about the expediency of giving an American work the largest place in the concert of a Society whose chief object purports to be the elevation of the public taste by means of the standard musical works of the old world. But this subject has already been widely discussed in your columns, and I will not now expatiate upon it. I am very happy to acknowledge all the good points in Mr. Bristow's Symphony; its richness of instrumentation, its wealth of pleasing melodies, and numerous other merits—but its chief fault is a pretty serious one: a decided want of originality. It is full of reminiscences of other composers, Weber, Mendelssohn, Spohr, Haydn, Mozart, and I know not what others, seem to be playing ball with snatches of their melodies, and tossing them to and fro in merry confusion. In listening to it, I found myself constantly thinking: "What is that? where have I heard this? I surely know this melody," etc.; and the same experience has been related to me by many friends.—Of all the movements, I like the Allegretto best; true, it savored of Mozart and Haydn, but had nevertheless more freshness and originality than any other part of the composition. The Symphony, as well as, in fact, all the other orchestral pieces, was very well played; I have hardly ever listened to a more satisfactory performance by this Society. The Overture by CHERUBINI made but little impression upon me, except that it struck me as far inferior to Les deux Journées, or other overtures of the same composer; while, on the other hand, that of BENNETT seemed to transport me into the midst of the woods, with all their fragrance and shade, their million voices of brooks, trees, winds, birds and insects, and the world of nymphs and dryads and satyrs, with which the olden story has peopled them. The gem of the evening, to me, was MENDELSSOHN's violin concerto, one of the most beautiful of his compositions, which was very well rendered by Mr. BURKE. It brings out all the best points of the composer; his purity and chasteness of style, his loveliest melodies, without any of the coldness and over-polish which often characterizes his works.—These are much more apparent in the Capriccio, in which even Mr. HOFFMAN's generally so spirited playing seemed cold and unsympathetic, although it was faultless in execution. He appeared to much better advantage when, in answer to an encore, he gave us a little fantasie of the like, of his own, entitled La Gazelle, a pretty salon-piece, on a quite original theme.

You will notice on the programme a mysterious clause inserted between the last two pieces: "Intermission of five minutes." The explanation, which followed on another page of the full programme, showed that somebody had had a bright idea, and made our hearts rejoice. It ran thus:

N. B.—In order that those who desire to listen to the last piece on the Programme may not be disturbed by those who prefer to leave at that time, an intermission of five minutes will be made previous to the last Overture, after which those present are politely requested to remain in their seats until the end of the performance.

And it worked so well that I can only hope that the plan will be generally adopted in future.

From another notice in the programme, we learn that no more extra tickets to the rehearsals can be sold, as the number of subscribers has more than doubled this season. This is very encouraging, and holds out a prospect that the Society will be obliged to take a larger hall next year. I hope they will build one; they can well afford it; or else have the concerts at the Academy, and the rehearsals at a smaller theatre or the City Assembly Rooms.

NEW YORK, FEB. 29th.—At one of the agreeable Musical Matinees given in this city by Messrs. MASON and BERGMANN, Bach's Concerto in D minor for three piano-fortes, with stringed accompaniment, was performed. The following remarks upon the performance, extracted from a New York newspaper, which certainly exhibit a remarkable knowledge of the resources of the English language, may impart some new ideas to the admirers of the old German master:

The Concerto by Bach was the feature of the occasion. The music of this composer is so liable to be unfortunate in its interpretation, that his name in a programme is usually more a drawback than an attraction. In connection with the piano his iterating fugues, in monotonous gymnastic poundings, suggest themselves and phalanxes of conceited musical tyros, like ranges of pandean pipes, rise up before the shrinking imagination. * * *

The striking simplicity, yet strength and effectiveness of its subject; and intricate yet clear and noble modulations of its complications; the decisive harmony and dissolving connectedness of its melodic reverberations in the most difficult phrases, parts and instruments; the breadth and unity of its toning, yet its varied and detailed richness,—all seemed to be fairly embodied and fully rendered by the accomplished performance on this occasion. The tyrannical exaction which this author makes of the performer, in sacrificing every collateral idiosyncrasy of ornament, to the absolute and accurate rendering and attainment of the proposed effect in his theme, was carefully met by the different artists. The result was, of course, an entire removal from the monotonous and checkered effect of the ordinary flat Bach task; and the realization of the broad and massive designs of the composer. The level and blurred blockwork of the tyro instrumentalists was forgotten, whilst the splendid artistic rendering of the occasion showed forth the truly sculptural effects designed by the incomparable author.

It is in view of such rendering that we can indeed realize the grandeur of Bach. The crowded comprehensiveness of his works, their force and realness, their masterly vigor and their dignified elevation of aim, impress us with the full and relative value in music of what the great Rubens is in historical painting.

The editor of the "Bunkum Flag-Staff" could not have done it better. I am gratified to learn that the intellectual labor expended in the composition of the above has not overtasked the author's brain, and that he is as well as could be expected. w.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAR. 8, 1856.

The Beethoven Festival.

Our festival has passed, and passed successfully. Saturday, March 1, 1846, was an evening long to be remembered in the Art annals of our city. Then Music, Sculpture, Poetry, chaste Architecture, floral decoration, all contributed, if not ambitiously, not on the grandest scale, yet tastefully, sincerely and harmoniously, in honor of so significant an event as the inauguration of a statue of BEETHOVEN in our noble Music Hall, there to stand henceforth as the tutelary genius of the place. No presence could be embodied there so fitly. The music of this mighty master, from the time that he first thrilled us with his grand Fifth Symphony, now nearly thirty years ago, has mingled itself more deeply and more intimately with the artistic aspirations, with the æsthetic and we may say the spiritual culture of those who have grown up lovers of Art and Beauty here, than any other music, or the works of any other Art. From that day to this his Symphonies, the whole nine of them, have been repeatedly demanded of each orchestra that has had power to play or even only sketch them to us. No winter passes that we do not hear more works of Beethoven than that of any other master. No composer is so deeply known and felt. No one has so stirred the souls even of unmusical persons, those who for the most part listen to the deep symphony of life through other channels than the ear. School-taught musicians almost sneered at us for thus commencing, as they called it, at the top of the ladder, with Beethoven, the last word of instrumental art, and jumping the preparatory steps of Haydn and Mozart. But the grander genius asks no ceremony of introduction to us; he has the sure key to our souls; Shakspeare does not require to be prepared by reading lesser poets. Beethoven took possession at once by pure force of genius and profound humanity. In his music somehow, though we might poorly apprehend it technically, we hailed prophetic utterances in strange harmony with the best spirit of this age. We felt he was the man for us; the deeper, holier yearnings of this nineteenth century, its baffled loves and lofty hopes, its tremendous conflicts and sublime ideals, found a voice in him. It was fit that his statue should be placed in our chief Hall of Music. The generous Art-enthusiasm of our townsman, CHARLES C. PERKINS, already the most liberal subscriber to the building of the Hall, saw the fitness and resolved out of his own private means to place it there. The sculptor CRAWFORD, of whom America is justly proud, too glad to pay the homage of genius in one Art to a greater genius in another, and to add his offering to the cause of Art among us, would take no money from his friend for his part of the work, that is for the design, the soul, the model of what should stand out realized, colossal and sublime, in rich and solid Munich bronze; and thus our debt and privilege of gratitude are doubled; we must thank two without thanking one the less.

We need not enter upon any new description of the statue, having expressed our admiring recognition of its grandeur as a work of Art and of its essential truth to Beethoven, as looked at from the point of view of our deep feeling of his music, at the time of its first arrival, when it was placed for the summer in the Athenæum (Journal of June 23, 1855). The more we look at it the more our feeling is confirmed. If there be literal variations from the physical original, it is at least true ideally, true in the way in which it is most important that it should be true; whatever it is in us that has communed with Beethoven, accepts it as the master. It is true that he is modelled of good height, though he was short and thickly built in life. But for a monumental statue in a grand hall, to be looked at through the magnifying atmosphere of his own swelling symphonies, it was fit that he should loom. The same cause too may make the head seem smaller in proportion to the body, than it was; yet is it not a great head and brain, indicative of mighty intellect, as is the face below of all the mighty toils and martyrdoms thereof? Does it look too young, too calm, say you? Genius in its highest hour is supernaturally young; he that has finished a Ninth Symphony, as there represented, is entitled to full ten years off from his literal, every day, care-worn look; and what so characteristic of sublime action as repose? Poorly had the sculptor read the record of that face, if he had not read that. But look at it from all points of view, in all lights, through all occasions, musical or other, shut yourself up with it alone, look at it cornerwise, and you still find that the deep lines of thought and suffering are not wanting; that that first and total aspect of repose and serene joy is but the summed-up truth of the whole man, seen as a man is seldom literally seen, in his true hour, in the great moment when he is himself. But we must cut short speculation, or we shall have no room to describe the Festival. First then:

THE SCENE AND AUDIENCE.

It was a brilliant and an eager crowd that poured into the Music Hall that evening and filled up nearly every seat. You read enthusiasm in all eyes; if there were any skeptical outsiders, who only came to criticize, they could not break the spell. Most of the ladies were in opera dresses, and looked in keeping with the floral honors of the hour. It looked a festival;—a festival in which Art and taste and ideality were paramount. The stage end of the hall, whose architecture lends itself so finely to such uses, was adorned with admirable taste. In the arch of the lattice-work screen before the organ the name of "BEETHOVEN" was set in letters of white flowers with green upon a rich red ground; the sides too of the arch were panelled with red with evergreen borders; in the centre was a lyre of green with strings of gold relieved upon red. The mere introduction of so much concentrated color was a vast improvement to the faintly tinted hall. Festoons of evergreen were suspended from cornice to balconies. From the junctions of the twin pilasters each side of the arch, and in the middle of each panel, were hung bunches of artificial flowers and green sprays, pond lilies, &c., the most life-like that could be imagined, and all composed with such a grace and freedom, and such a look of freshness, that they were the theme of general admiration, and many confounded them with the real flowers, that hung in wreaths below the statue, or were set in bouquets of surpassing size and beauty in bronze tripods on the stage front. One of these, in which a mass of Calla lilies figured, was the most superb bouquet which we remember to have seen. In the centre of the stage, upon a plain temporary pedestal of six feet in height, covered with green, and seen against a background of green velvet, rose what should be the statue, a green star-spangled drapery enveloping the whole figure, larger than life-size; somehow that starry veil seemed a true prelude to the Choral Symphony; a beautiful wreath of immortelles and festoon of fresh flowers adorned the pedestal. Each of the musicians' desks too wore its twin bouquets. These adornments were the beautiful result of the devoted labors of some of our most cultivated music-loving ladies, and considering that they had scarcely a couple of days for the work, it seemed an inspiration. It was a true love of Beethoven in them that twined those wreaths, and we must say with Schiller:

Ehret die Frauen! Sie flechten und weben, &c.

THE STATUE AND THE POEM.

At the appointed hour, the poet of the evening, WILLIAM W. STORY, advanced to the front of the stage, and pronounced the words: "Lift the veil!" when slowly, fold after fold, like an instinctive thing of life, the starry veil fell off, and BEETHOVEN, in his calm grandeur, stood disclosed, high in the midst of his disciples, the orchestra around him and the chorus in the background, and enthusiastic cheers and murmurs of delight ran through the great assembly. That was the grand moment of the evening. In a voice whose richness was a little veiled by hoarseness, yet so well heard by the larger portion of the audience that he was continually interrupted by applause, Mr. Story then proceeded to recite the following

PROLOGUE.

Lift the veil;—the work is finished;—fresh created from the hands
Of the artist,—grand and simple, there our great Beethoven stands.
Clay no longer—he has risen from the buried mould of earth,
To a golden form transfigured by a new and glorious birth.
Art hath bid the evanescent pause and know no more decay;
Made the mortal shape immortal, that to dust has passed away.
There's the brow by thought o'erladen, with its tempest of wild hair;
There the mouth so sternly silent and the square cheeks seamed with care;
There the eyes so visionary, straining out, yet seeing naught
But the inward world of genius and the ideal forms of thought;
There the hand that gave its magic to the cold, dead, ivory keys,
And from out them tore the struggling chords of mighty symphonies.
There the figure, calm concentrated, on its breast the great head bent;—
Stand forever thus, great master! thou thy fittest monument!
Poor in life, by friends deserted, through disease and pain and care,
Bravely, stoutly hast thou striven, never yielding to despair;
High the claims of Art upholding; firm to Freedom; in a crowd
Where the highest bent as courtiers, speaking manfully and loud.
In thy silent world of deafness, broken by no human word,
Music sang with voice ideal, while thy listening spirit heard,
Tones consoling and prophetic, tones to raise, refine and cheer,
Deathless tones, that thou hast garnered to refresh and charm us here.
And for all these riches priceless, all these wondrous gifts of thine,
We have only Fame's dry laurel on thy careworn brow to twine.
We can only say, Great Master, take the homage of our heart;
Be the High Priest in our temple, dedicate to thee and Art.
Stand before us, and enlarge us with thy presence and thy power,
And o'er all Art's depths and shallows light us like a beacon-tower.
In the mighty realm of Music there is but a single speech,
Universal as the world is, that to every heart can reach.
Thou within that realm art monarch, but the humblest vassal there Knows the accents of that language when it calls to war or prayer.
Underneath its world-wide Banyan, friends the gathering nations sit;
Red Sioux and dreamy German dance and feast and fight to it.
When the storm of battle rages, and the brazen trumpet blows,
Cheering on the seeried tumult, in the van its meteor flares.
Sings the laurelled song of conquest, o'er the buried comrade walls,
Plays the peaceful pipes of shepherds in the lone Etrurian vales;
Whispers love beneath the lattice, where the honey-suckle clings;
Crowns the bowl and cheers the dancers, and its peace to sorrow brings;—
Nature knows its wondrous magic, always speaks in tune and rhyme;
Doubles in the sea the heaven, echoes on the rocks the chime.
All her forests sway harmonious, all her torrents leap in song;
And the starry spheres make music, gladly journeying along.
Thou hast touched its mighty mystery, with a finger as of fire;
Thrilled the heart with rapturous longing, bade the struggling soul aspire;
Through thy daring modulations, mounting up o'er dimy stairs
Of harmonic change and progress, into high Elysian airs,
Where the wings of angels graze us, and the voices of the spheres
Seem not far, and glad emotions fill the silent eyes with tears.
What a vast, majestic structure thou hast bulidied out of sound,
With its high peak piercing Heaven, and its deep base underground.
Vague as air, yet firm and real to the spiritual eye,
Seamed with fire its cloudy bastions far away uplifted lie,—
Like those sullen shapes of thunder we behold at close of day,
Piled upon the far horizon, where the jagged lightnings play.
Awful voices, as from Hades, thrill us, growing from its heart;
Sudden splendors blaze from out it, cleaving its black walls apart.
White winged birds dart forth and vanish, singing, as they pass from sight,
Till at last it lifts, and 'neath it lies a blaze of amber light

Where some single star is shining, throbbing like a new born thing,
And the earth, all drenched in splendor, hears its happy voices sing.

Topmost crown of Ancient Athens towered the Phidian Parthenon;

Upon Freedom's noble forehead, Art, the starry jewel, shone,
Here as yet in our Republic, in the furrows of our soil,
Slowly grows Art's timid blossom 'neath the heavy foot of toil.
Spurn it not—but spare it, nurse it, till it gladden all the land;
Hail today this seed of promise, planted by a generous hand—
Our first statue to an artist—nobly given, nobly planned.

Never is a nation finished while it wants the grace of Art—
Use must borrow robes from Beauty, life must rise above the mart.

Faith and love are all ideal, speaking with a music tone—
And without their touch of magic, labor is the Devil's own.
Therefore are we glad to greet thee, master artist, to thy place,
For we need in all our living Beauty and ideal grace.

Mostly here to lift our nation, move its heart and calm its nerves,

And to round life's angled duties to imaginative curves.
Mid the jarring din of traffic, let the Orphic tone of Art
Lull the barking Cerberus in us, soothe the cares that gnaw the heart.

With thy universal language, that our feeble speech transcends,
Wing our thoughts that creep and grovel, come to us when speaking ends,—

Bear us into realms ideal, where the cant of common sense
Dins no more its heartless maxims to the jingling of its peace,
Thence down dropped into the Actual, we shall on our garments bear,

Perfume of an unknown region, beauty of celestial air;
Life shall wear a nobler aspect, joy shall greet us in the street;
Earthly dust of low ambition shall be shaken from our feet.
Evil spirits that torment us, into air shall vanish all,
And the magic-harp of David soothe the haunted heart of Saul.

As of yore the swart Egyptians rent the air with choral song,
When Osiris' golden statue triumphing they bore along;
As along the streets of Florence, borne in glad procession went,
Cimabue's famed Madonna, praised by voice and instrument,
Let our voices sing thy praises, let our instruments combine,
Till the hall with triumph echo, for the hour and place are thine.

Nothing could have been more appropriate than these noble verses. All felt them to be worthy of the subject and the hour; they did much to lift the minds of all, those who were to take part and those who were to listen, to the level of the occasion. There stood the sublime impersonation of the poet's thought before us, and each helped the other; the sculptor's and the poet's art blended to one result, like voice-part and accompaniment in a true song. A certain Schiller-like pure fire of ideality glows through the whole; while the expression is more clear, direct and sculpturesque than Schiller; each melodious couplet (to those who caught the syllables) conveyed its freight of thought with a rhythmical, symmetrical completeness, which is just what one asks of poetry in public. If the prologue was effective as we heard it, it is no less satisfying when read; and our readers, though they have seen it in all the newspapers, will agree with us that it deserves to be placed upon musical record, as it were, here.

THE MUSIC.

The statue and the poem certainly inspired the orchestra; if they could ever play well, they could then; they felt their own vocation honored; and did not the fragrance also of those floral tokens, the delicate compliment by fair hands assigned to them, do something to twine then and thenceforward the himmlische Rosen into their irdische Leben (to continue Schiller's lines)! Mr. ZERBAHN raised his bâton and those strange rustling Fifths (Quintegenflüster, the Germans call it) of the NINTH SYMPHONY began, and the bold relentless Fate theme, (which our friend Schmitt has marked No. 1 in his thematic analysis in another column) was pronounced with startling energy; and the sweet human reed instruments poured out their pleading strain (a little melodic figure that seems to be the tune of the "Joy" chorus in embryo); and sunbeams and shadows mingle and chase each other, ideal hopes and shadows of despair; and yet the soul's enthusiasm burns unquenchable in spite of Fate; and the inspired motive No. 5 comes, with its light tip-toe tread of double-basses,—a passage very Beethovenish, which gives you the idea of one treading upon air as if drunk with the possession of some glorious secret; and the great storm and struggle comes of light and darkness, Joy and Fate, stirring up all the depths of harmony in tumultuous billows, the double-basses stepping wide in intervals of octaves or more, and giving breadth and grandeur to the picture; and the human pleadings and the sweet ideals come again, and all seems to tend to light and serene harmony; but for the present, for the actual conclusion, the inexorable voice, that first rang through the void, prevails and the first movement closes with the first theme again sounded by the whole with terrible three-fold emphasis. And is this the conclusion? The conclusion of the actual, but not of the ideal. It is in this first movement that one feels the pledge and prophecy of something grand, extraordinary, that is yet to come. We know no music which seems so pregnant with a future as this, so teeming with more than it has means to utter, and forshadowing a solution, such as came to Beethoven in that fourth or Choral movement. It is this first movement which requires and justifies the last and finds its explanation there. It was our fate that night to have the prophecy, the problem, but not the solution, the fulfilment. Yet in itself alone how wonderfully impressive, beautiful, sublime and full of meaning that first movement! It has been thought too full for the appreciation of a general audience. But the conditions for good hearing were invaluable that night; the statue and the occasion enforced such an attention as no symphony can get in any other circumstances; the movement was listened to with profound interest and followed by an outbreak of genuine enthusiasm. The orchestra did their part uncommonly well, and made all as clear and effective perhaps as an orchestra of only fifty could make it. The great composer seemed to nod his head in approbation, and it required no exertion of fancy to see the expression of the bronze features change with every changing modulation of the music.

The Scherzo movement, with its strong joyous pulse of ceaseless three-four measure, so light and tripping, yet with such breadth of crowded harmony, as if one wild, reckless impulse tingled in every nerve and fibre of a whole world alike possessed and demonized, was also brought out very clearly; although more delicacy of gradations from pianissimo to forte were an object well worth further study. The quaint pastoral episode in 4-4 time, where the bassoon toys merrily with the horn, was keenly relished, and did credit to both instruments. Then came the Adagio Cantabile, serene and heavenly, the very opposite to that wild mood of sensual joy. How like holy bells in a still night the notes of the first chord fall in one by one upon the ear, leading in that sweet, slow, solemn psalm, with echoed cadence to each line; and how the strings palpitate with blissful agitation, as the time changes and the soul is rapt in deeper bliss by the new theme in D that enters,—most lovely, warm and comforting of melodies! What music ever written is more full of deepest feeling! Then with what exquisite delicacy and subtlety of fine mellifluous divisions, winding and throbbing in and out, the theme is varied by the violins, and by the warmer instruments! And what is there comparable to that pure height of ecstasy, of reverie in which the soul is more than ever conscious, lost to time but waking in eternity, where, while the theme, modulated into a strange key, as it were refracted through a visionary light, is pursued by the wind instruments, the strings now here now there, in all parts of the orchestra, emit as it were little electric sparks of happiness, in those pizzicati which only seem so promiscuously timed! Then the slow horn, as if inspired with an involuntary eloquence, indulges in a florid passage quite beyond its ordinary powers! (We congratulate our hornist on his safe and felicitous deliverance there.) Then the wonderfully expressive drooping back, as with a sigh of too much bliss, into the old key and the old theme; and still more exquisite refinement on the melody by the violins! And when the conclusion must come, the heroic trumpet strain, which seems to answer to the call from on high; a brief relapse into the celestial melody, and the dream gently fades away.

This was the best ending if we could not have the whole; but how one longed for the solution of the problem of that first movement! True, the celestial Adagio hints it; but it would have been so much better to have gone on, and let the double-basses in their recitativo tread out a path for human voices and the great chorus of the "Hymn to Joy," the Brotherhood of all Mankind! Surely at that moment, there was not one instrumentist, or one of the 160 chorus-singers, reserved there for other tasks, who would not have been too glad to go on and complete the Choral Symphony. Could we but have had that inspiration in the earlier stages of the preparation! But the three movements, that we did hear, sank deeply into the souls of many listeners; their echoes and the statue are a pledge that we shall hear it all before another year shall pass.

We must speak briefly of the rest. The grand soprano Recitative and Aria from Fidelio, one of the grandest in all dramatic music, and of the most extreme difficulty,—a piece analogous in structure to the Scena from the Freyshütz, but greater even than that,—was sung much more effectively by Mrs. J. H. LONG than we could have expected from any but an accomplished prima donna. Her rendering was pure and conscientious, and her voice quite inspiring in the high notes; it was no light task to come out successfully amid that extremely rich and active instrumentation, in which again our hornists were severely tasked.

Part II. commenced with perhaps the least effective of the selections, as given without orchestral accompaniment: the first Quartet from Fidelio, which however was quite nicely sung by Mrs. WENTWORTH, Mrs. HARWOOD, Mr. LOW and Mr. WETHERBEE, and is a beautiful Quartet. Mr. AUGUST FRIES surpassed himself in the difficult and most beautiful first movement of Beethoven's Violin Concerto; he played with remarkable purity, truth of intonation, finish and expression, and received the heartiest plaudits. We could only have wished that on BEETHOVEN's night there had been nothing said upon the programme of the cadence added by Herr DAVID, brilliant and skilful as it was, and not without high precedent.

The 'Hallelujah' from the 'Mount of Olives,' brought the great choir for the first time into action. It was not so numerous as that of our Oratorio societies, but select and more effective, all being telling, musical and sympathetic voices; it was composed first of a nucleus of those who commonly appear as solo-singers, with a few amateurs, and then of delegations, forty strong, of the best singers from each of our three Choral Societies. We have never had so musical an ensemble of voices in any of our choruses. This "Hallelujah" is not one of Beethoven's greatest works, but it is strong and inspiring, and was made in the main quite effective, saving a little unsteadiness in the fugue portion.

Mr. PERKINS, as he came forward to play the piano part in the Choral Fantasia, was greeted with a perfect tumult of applause. We think we have never heard him play so well; and with the advantage of an uncommonly fine instrument from Chickering's, a well-trained orchestra, sextet of solo-singers and that chorus, the genial beauties and progress of the piece, from piano-forte improvisation, as it were, through orchestral concerto, to chorus in the "Praise of Harmony," were made well appreciable to the audience. It is truly a fascinating, richly suggestive composition—certainly, as we have before said, a slight foreshadowing of the Choral Symphony, and deserves more remark than we have room for here. There is one chord, which occurs twice in the full chorus part, which quite electrifies the hearer.

More loud and long applause, more callings out of "Perkins," then reluctant breakings up, lingerings to congratulate, to look at flowers, to take another and another last look of Beethoven in his alterations as the lights were one by one extinguished, and our Festival was over! It would be easy to criticize the programme; easy to say what more or greater might have been presented; easy to judge it by some preconceived idea of a great three days' festival or "Congress of Musicians," some grand thing which it never undertook to be, and, measured by such standard, say it was a failure. But we envy not the person who could not enter and enjoy all there was, for thinking too much of what there was not; who found himself too critical to pass that night with Beethoven, and derive a lasting inspiration from the hour; who could keep coldly on the outside, muttering of "Hamlet with the part of Hamlet left out," and own no glow, no ecstasy within the charmed circle of the first three movements of that Symphony! The mass of that great audience, we are sure, including the most musical among them, will ever cherish the memory of that Festival among the most inspiring experiences of their lives; and that it gave a real impulse to the cause of Art in this community, and this whole country, we feel no less sure. It was in no sense a failure, save as the lily is a failure in not being an oak, or a Notturmo in not being a grand Symphony.

DEATH OF GEORGE W. PRATT.—This sad event could not but cast its shadow over the musical sunshine even of our Beethoven week. Mr. Pratt was a young man of superior character and a musician of good promise. He was the son of Col. Jabez Pratt, coroner, of this city. As a boy, in the public schools and musical conventions, he was distinguished by his voice. He became a graduate of Middlebury College, and brought the spirit of a more general culture into his profession of a music-teacher, which he chose for life. After doing a good work as teacher of singing in the Normal schools, he repaired to Germany, where he remained nearly three years, most of the time in Leipsic, an earnest student of the art of singing and of teaching. His taste was formed upon the best classical models of German vocal and instrumental music, and he came back last autumn with a high sense of the dignity and duty of the artistic life. He has since taught successfully and has sung in our various oratorios and chamber concerts with very general acceptance. He was esteemed by all who knew him, and his most unexpected death, after a fortnight's illness, has left many mourners. He was 28 years old. The funeral services were held in Park Street church, where he had been at one time chorister, members of the various musical societies, with which he had been connected, uniting in the solemn hymns.

Musical Chat-Chat.

We learn with much pleasure that an effort is being made to place in the Music Hall a Grand Organ, similar in magnitude and excellence to the superb instruments which have so long been the wonder of travellers in the old world. We wish the enterprise God speed! It comes with peculiar fitness just now, when the minds of the community are stirred with the enthusiasm of the past week. It is a noble project, and is in such hands that we can scarcely fear for its success.

The last of the six concerts of the 'German Trio,' (Messrs. GARTNER, HAUSE and JUNGNIKKEL) takes place at Chickering's to-night. Mrs. J. M. MOZART (late Miss BOTHAMLY) will sing for them.... OTTO DRESEL's third Soirée in the same place on Monday evening. The programme includes the same exquisite Trio by Beethoven which was played last time; Mr. Dresel's own Trio, so admired a few years since; a wonderful Adagio from one of Beethoven's later piano Sonatas, op. 106; a fugue of Bach; Selections from Chopin; and half a dozen songs of Robert Franz, to be sung by Mr. KREISSMANN.... Do not forget, too, the Annual Benefit Concert of the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, on Tuesday evening. Messrs. TREMKLE, PARKER & PERKINS will assist, and play the famous triple Concerto of Bach; Mrs. LONG also will sing Schubert's "Hark the Lark," and Franz's Ave Maria. There will also be a Quartet by Mozart, a Quintet by Beethoven, and part of a Quintet by Mendelssohn. Verily a rich week in chamber music!... Mrs. ROSA GARCIA DE RIBAS, long a favorite singer in our oratorios and concerts, and privately enjoying the esteem of the musical community, offers good attractions for her concert of next Saturday evening. We trust the Tremont Temple will be filled.... A curious performance is to come off at Tremont Temple on Thursday evening, called an "Old Folks' Concert," to be given in the costume of '76, by the "Reading Opera Chorus Class," a body of 50 singers, whom we have heard praised by competent authority.

NEW COURSE OF HARMONY,
BY L. H. SOUTHARD.

The Publishers call the attention of the musical profession to this work, as one eminently calculated to lighten the labors of the teacher, and rapidly advance the pupil. It is emphatically a PRACTICAL work, serving both as a Manual of instruction on the one hand, and a Text-book on the other; and it is believed that the peculiar arrangement of the work, together with the very large number of exercises and examples, presents great advantages to both scholar and teacher, over any similar work of the kind. Teachers highly commend the work. Mr. WILLIAM MASON says it is a work unsurpassed in the language. Mr. GEORGE J. WEAVER says that it is a work perspicuous in diction, methodical in arrangement, and sufficiently copious to embrace all the essentials of the general doctrine of accord. It can be ordered through any respectable Music-seller, and will be sent through the mail on the receipt of the price, ($1.75,) postage pre-paid.

ROBERT FRANZ.

BY FRANZ LISZT.

There are unquestionably certain characteristic traits, through which all artists look alike, but there is no universal type for artists and poets. Poetry and Art can be innate and sympathetic in all characters, and if the Middle Age classed all the temperaments in four main categories (sanguine, choleric, melancholy and phlegmatic), so ALBRECHT DÜRER in those wonderful pictures, in which he represents the meeting of four saints, each of whom belongs to one of the said categories, gives us one of those shining proofs, reserved for genius to discover, namely that all four have the capacity to radiate that sacred fire of inspiration, which makes poets, whether they devote their lives to song, or spend them upon deeds which furnish the material for songs. One might almost believe that no subject seemed to that great master worthier to be glorified by the splendor of his genius; for there is perhaps no second painting by him, in which we can admire the calm sublimity of his thought, the depth of his composition, his penetrating intuition of the mysterious sense of lines and of the inexplicable, unlearnable significance of drawing, the power of contour, the majesty of pose, the nobleness of folds, the as it were symphonic effect of the virtuoso-like treatment of his coloring, so intimately suited to the subject, more than here, where he reaches the Ideal, without resembling the sunny tints which RAPHAEL often strove for, or the glowing atmosphere of the Venetians, or the magical sheen of a RUBENS, and without bordering either on conventional splendor or on a too bald realism. In the four heads of this group the leading types are admirably discernible, which, more feebly or more strongly prominent, compose the fundamental traits of the so various organizations of the artists, to whom the different Art-forms owe their origin. Here we find the enthusiastic trait which generates the lyric Art, the burning lust for action, which fires heroes or those who sing of heroes; the sinking back into oneself, which tends to grief, to satire, to misanthropy, or to reflection; we see the nervous irritability, which keeps the passions on the strain and leads to tragical developments or the describing of them.

FRANZ belongs to the dreamy, deep natures, which have few expansive moments. His tender sensibility, his fine, penetrating spirit, hating every noise or crowd, keep him shut up in himself, as if afraid of every interchange of opinion, which might degenerate into bitterness; as if he shrank from every conflict, in which the chords of his lyre too hastily struck might utter tones less pure, less euphonious and tender. One might compare him in more than one respect with CHOPIN; nevertheless there are important differences between these artists. Chopin, like Franz, withdrew himself from the centre of the arena swarming with combatants under various banners; he also had maturely weighed the ground of the dissensions which he witnessed, and had given in the adhesion of his convictions to the one party, whose cause he helped as it were only by the works he executed according to the principles of the combatants; he too had not drawn upon himself the enmity of those from whom he diverged in idea, and his productions found a kind reception everywhere. He also crowded his works within narrow borders, concentrated his invention in existing forms, to which he lent new intensity, new worth, new vital faculties, new turns. He too despised all frivolities that bordered on his sphere, scorned to procure applause at the expense of his artistic conscience, and elaborated every smallest product of his pen in the most careful manner, and with such success that his compositions are marked by a rare uniformity of their peculiar excellencies. He too has confided much and of many kinds to his muse; has mysteriously infused unspoken grief, unconscious yearnings, deep mournings, glimmering consolations into his short but expressive works. But Chopin was an extremely nervous nature, full of suppressed passion; he moderated, but he could not tame himself; and every morning he began anew the hard task of imposing silence on his boiling scorn, his glowing hate, his infinite love, his quivering agony, his feverish excitement, striving to keep them off by enveloping himself in a sort of spiritual intoxication, and by his dreams to conjure up a magic fairy world, wherein he might live and find a melancholy bliss, confined within the limits of his Art. As thoroughly subjective as Franz in his creations, he succeeded still less than he in separating himself for a moment from himself, so as to view things objectively, and by the choice and treatment of his material indicate his feeling mediately rather than directly. For the very reason that he was so pre-occupied in battling with passions as violent as they were violently suppressed, it was almost impossible for him to win the leisure for a long continued work. The best part of his works was included within small dimensions and could not be otherwise, since every single one of these was but the fruit of one short moment of reflection, which sufficed to reproduce the tears and dreams of one day. Nearly all composers begin with seeking the more or less direct expression of their individuality in Art, whether it be in the lyrical, the dramatic or the epic form. Those who are gifted with invention of a decidedly objective character, have soon exhausted this first tendency, soon satisfied this first necessity, often so quickly that they have never given to the world the songs that bloomed in this period. In others this vein is of longer duration; they find full satisfaction in it and bring forth in it a whole series of excellent and admirable compositions. Artists, in whom feeling predominates, remain a long time or forever in this manner of creating. Chopin was one of those who never emancipate themselves from it, or who at least would never have acquired importance in other forms, supposing some mistaken effort to have turned them that way.

We know not whether Franz, who already occupies so predominant a position as a lyric poet, will feel it in his mission to extend the circle of his intellectual creation further. His thus far published efforts in the church style warrant the conjecture that the time will come for him, when, if he does not purposely restrain the free course of his native genius, he will feel within him both the impulse and the power for more extensive undertakings. We cherish the conviction too, that to whatever of the existing forms he may finally attach himself, whether to the liturgy, to the sacred or the so-called secular Oratorio, or what not, and however he may mould these to his own peculiar genius, he will achieve not less distinction than he has within the narrow limits of the song; for he belongs to those profoundly reflective minds, who never leave a work, to which they have entrusted the purest and noblest portion of themselves, until they have succeeded with the utmost care and pains in attaining to the fair proportion between form and substance.

The Mission of Mozart.

LEADING CHARACTERISTICS OF HIS GENIUS AND HIS WORKS.

BY A. OULIBICHEFF.

..... Mozart never was the favorite of any public and he never will be. Publics are German, French, Italian; Mozart is universal. It is clear, after the character which we have recognized in his masterworks, that they must formerly have wanted all the conditions of popularity even more than they do now; yet in the estimation of musicians he has grown continually greater to this day. He commonly figures in the second line upon the musical repertoire of Europe; but that place he maintains in spite of all the revolutions of modern taste, so that, although continually eclipsed in the eyes of the multitude by reigning fashions, he always seems more choice and graceful than the passing fashion.

This crescendo of fame, which has already outlasted a century, presupposes that Mozart's reputation commenced with piano. And in fact, the many composers who stood much higher in the estimation of contemporaries than he did, the cold reception of his operas in Vienna, which rejected his Don Juan, (nor did Europe know it, since for years it was kept back within the limits of Germany and Bohemia, like confiscated goods in a custom house); moreover the sad expedients to which our hero had to have recourse to earn a livelihood; all prove how ill he was appreciated in spite of the celebrity which he already enjoyed, and which he owed quite as much to his calumniators as to his admirers. In regard to this point my readers will observe with some surprise, in which a little pride may mingle, the great difference between the publics of that day and of this. All the great masterpieces of the lyric stage, which our own century has produced, have been received at once in Europe with unanimous applause; the justice which the public owes to authors, has never let itself be waited for beyond the first few representations. From this prompt and general recognition of the beautiful one may imagine the feebleness, the uncertainty and frequently the ludicrousness of the judgments passed by the dilettanti of the eighteenth century; and also the æsthetic deafness, with which they seem to have been visited, when things, which ought to have transported them into the seventh heavens, could pass by them with leaving any traces. Mozart was right perhaps in calling them long ears. But I say no; Mozart was wrong, like those who judge in this way now. The music-lovers of the last century had no longer ears than we and judged precisely as we should have done in their place. Between us lies only the difference of standpoint. Ours proceeds from Mozart's works themselves; these form our point of departure in music, and these will still appear the goal which no one until now has gone beyond. Hence it is easy for us to see and judge correctly all that approaches this height without reaching it; we look down from above, whereas the music-lovers before us looked up from below, through the mist which I have sought to define by analyzing the impression of the contrapuntal music upon an uncultivated ear.

From 1780 to 1791 the musical standpoint for works for the theatre proceeded from the works of a PICCINI, SACCHINI, MARTINI, PAISIELLO, and at the best a GLUCK and SALIERI. If we would be just, then, to the amateurs of the last century, we should have to take some one of those scores and compare it even in the smallest details and through all relations with the score of the Don Juan. From such a study, as interesting as it were easy in this day, would the justification of Mozart's contemporaries make itself apparent, and our astonishment would turn to another subject and become nothing more than a profound respect for the appreciative Prague public. We should find that Mozart in his day confounded all the habits and the boldest expectations of the ear; that he infused into his hearers a multitude of marvellous and complex feelings, to which they had not been accustomed from the stage; that his melody must have sounded strange and his harmony extremely hard. Instead of presenting a single leading melody, he flung his hearers into an extended combination of variously designed and measured voices, rivalling each other in melodic importance and complicating the harmony as in a fugue with several subjects. All this involved his first hearers in a bewildering Egyptian darkness, in a labyrinth without any clue, where the attention got lost, because it had not learned to divide itself. Such multifarious forms must have sounded unconnected, anti-euphonious, unendurable, since they only penetrated to the material organ and not to the soul, which would have placed them in their mutual relations and through the infinite variety of particulars would have seized the sublime unity of the ensemble. They could not see the forest for the multitude of trees.

But not alone for the great mass of the public must Mozart have been unintelligible in many of his compositions; many men who understood the art of composition, held themselves justified, upon the authority of their books, as well as of their ears, in condemning him. In this connection I am reminded of a well-known anecdote.—HAYDN found himself one day in a company of fellow artists, where they were talking of an opera that had been given in Vienna. All voices united in finding fault with it; they said it was too much overlaid with learned harmony; called it a heavy, unequally finished, too chaotic music. Too chaotic, observe: "What do you think, father Haydn?" "I cannot decide the matter; all that I know is, that Mozart is the greatest composer in the world." This condemned opera was called: Don Giovanni, ossia il Dis-soluto punito.

Among all the princes in music, from JOSQUIN to PALESTRINA, MOZART alone had the misfortune to be in constant conflict with his epoch and his judges. This misfortune was his destiny, and this destiny, while it crushed the man down to earth, led the artist on to execute point for point the instructions of Providence, the purport of which we have expounded in the beginning of this chapter.

One circumstance, which must not be left out of sight, and which is very easily explained, is this: that no composer could have acted with less freedom in the choice of his own labors, than Mozart. We know his partiality for works of the stage, and therein his taste harmonized completely with his interests. The existence of a dramatic composer in the fashion in the eighteenth century was fortunate and brilliant, although his income approached less nearly than it would to-day the salary of the singers, and the tyranny of a prima donna or a primo uomo weighed more heavily upon him. On the other hand operas grew obsolete more rapidly, were manufactured in a greater number and with less expense; celebrity was much more cheaply earned. Had a maestro in Naples, Rome, Milan or Venice reaped a success, orders flowed in on him from all sides; he was invited abroad; he could choose according to his humor and could work just so much as his strength permitted. Was he disposed to settle down somewhere, accept a lucrative and honorable post; why, he might choose among the music-loving courts of Germany, which were bidding for him with offers of the direction of their theatres and chapels. A hundred or more operas might easily mark the traces of such a career, without counting the church music and the concert and chamber music written in the operatic style. Mozart exerted himself a long time to get such a place, he, who was able to compose operas as fast as his brother artists in Italy, and to make them as good too as many a masterwork in our day, which has cost its author several years work. But Mozart as a dramatic composer lacked employment. During the twelve years that he lived in Vienna, only three pieces were ordered of him for the imperial theatre: viz. the Entführung aus dem Seraglio, the Nozze di Figaro, and Così fan tutte. As for the first of these, none but a German could have been commissioned to write it, because the object was to found a national opera; as to the two other librettos, it may easily be believed that few Italian masters would have wished them. Foreign countries showed him the same indifference. Italy, which had adopted the child, denied the man; no impresario saw fit to negotiate with the composer of Idomeneo. France had forgotten the very name of Mozart. In Germany to be sure this name had some ring; but the managers of the native companies seem quite as little to have thought that it would be of any use to employ the composer of Belmonte e Constanza. Not one made him an offer until the year 1791. With the exception of Vienna, where he lived, only one provincial capital ordered two operas of him for its Italian theatre.

There can be no doubt that, if Mozart had been better understood by his public, he would have devoted himself exclusively to a class of works, the most brilliant and most lucrative of all, for which he detected in himself as great a calling as a passion. He would have made only operas and would have found no time to produce anything else. But by composing a libretto every two years he would have scarcely earned his daily bread. We know what compensation he received for his best dramatic works. Don Juan brought him in a hundred ducats, and the Zauberflöte nothing, if we may trust Herr von Nissen. Having no position and no income besides the imperial alms of 800 gulden, Mozart had to accommodate himself to circumstances, to serve the public individually, since it was denied him to serve it in the mass; he had to seek commissions of all sorts and furnish himself for all occasions in which people resort to a man of his trade. His relations to the public made him like the artists of the Middle Ages, who worked at painting, sculpture, music, like guilds of masons or joiners. Like them he had his shop, in which composition, playing and instruction were to be had cheap. Nothing was wanting but the street sign: All kinds of musical wares made and sold here of the best quality and for a fixed price. It would have drawn crowds to him. Master! I want some German songs for my daughter; the words I have with me.—I should like an Italian aria, with contrabasso obbligato, for my wife.—And I should like some trumpet pieces and signals for my squadron.—But I should like a pretty little piece in F minor, I am very fond of that key, for a musical clock; but the price must be most reasonable.—Ho, master Wolfgang! half a dozen minuets, and as many contradances and landler waltzes; but you must make haste, for they are for the next ball to be given by prince X.—My case is still more urgent; I give a musical party to-morrow evening, it is my name day. Bring along your best, nothing shall be wanting on my part: you shall have five ducats and your supper!—Well, my dear, how about that flute trio, which I ordered of you last year and paid for it beforehand? (A lie, as we shall see).—And that Cantata, brother, which we want to sing at our Masonic festival; have you thought about it? It takes place day after to-morrow.—One last messenger appears on the threshold carefully wrapt up in his mantle. I am in no hurry, I can wait. I need a mass for the dead; for whom you will soon learn, without my telling you.—And to all those people Mozart replies, to one: My lord or my lady, I am at your service; to another: I will do my best to serve you; to this one: your order lies ready; to that one: please have patience yet a little while.

The reader will remember that, besides the orders which brought in money, Mozart made a multitude of things for his friends and comrades, for which he would take nothing; these should certainly have made it a matter of conscience to reward him with more than a mere "thank you." His scholars, as well as his customers, were divided into two classes, the paying and the not paying, according as music was a matter of love or of speculation with them. To the one class he went; the others came to him. For the scholars in composition he required examples; for those on the piano pieces of progressive difficulty. That made further occupation. With all these resources Mozart combined still another, his more worthy source of income; namely, public concerts, musical evenings in the companies of the higher nobility and subscription academies, as they used to be called. We know not how much these sources of income amounted to, but so much is clear, that Mozart undertook an enormous quantity of labor in them all. He was not one of the artists who spend six months in the year in studying a piece and the other six in playing it. In these concerts every thing had to be by him and new; an excellent means of convincing the public to satiety of an artist's talent.

Death of Mr. John Braham.

On Sunday (Feb. 16) a musician, who may be said to have formed a connecting link between the men of the present generation and their grandfathers, breathed his last. Seldom has there been so remarkable a case of professional longevity as that of Mr. John Braham. There is scarcely a person living too old or too young to have heard him sing.

Born at London in 1774, of parents of the Hebrew persuasion, he is one of the many instances of that aptitude of the Jewish race for music which can scarcely have escaped the notice of any observer of the present age. At a very early age he was confided, already an orphan, to the care of Lerni, an Italian singer of celebrity, and made his début as a public singer before he had attained his 11th year, when, from the quality and compass of his voice, he was enabled to sing several bravura songs that had been written for Madame Mara. When he lost his boyish voice his future prospects appeared doubtful, but he found a generous patron in Mr. Abraham Goldsmith, and became a professor of the piano. On his voice regaining its power he went to Bath, and there, in the year 1784, made his first appearance at some concerts that took place under the direction of M. Rauzzini, who, appreciating his talent, gave him musical instruction for three years.

In 1796 young Braham was engaged by the still-remembered composer, Signor Storace, for Drury-lane Theatre, and his début (which was in an opera called Mahmoud) was so successful that in the year following he was engaged for the Italian Opera-house. Hoping, however, to achieve a reputation more permanent than could be obtained by any other course, he resolved to visit Italy and there to complete his musical education. Florence was the first city at which he appeared in public; thence he went to Milan and afterwards to Genoa, at which latter place he studied composition under Isola.

Leaving Italy in consequence of numerous solicitations from his own country, where the intelligence of his Italian successes had awakened a lively curiosity, he made his début at Covent-garden in 1801. This is the point from which may be dated that triumphant career during which he created a constant furor, the effect of which has lasted in some degree even to the present day. A vocalist who was also an accomplished musician was a rare spectacle at the commencement of the present century, and for many years he was without a competitor. Long after his voice had lost its original power he was successively engaged at several theatres on the strength of a reputation which seemed undying, and his proficiency in singing Handel's music was universally acknowledged when his career as a dramatic vocalist had reached its termination. The facts may be deemed interesting that the opera in which he made his first appearance after his return from Italy was a work by Messrs. Mazzinghi and Reeve, entitled the Chains of the Heart, that for a series of years (terminating in 1816) he sang at the King's Theatre, in concert with Mesdames Billington, Fodor, and Grassini; and that when Weber composed his opera Oberon for the English stage he was the original Sir Huon.

While his success as a vocalist was without precedent, Mr. Braham was also renowned as a composer. Not only did he write several of the most popular songs, but he composed a tolerably long list of entire operas, as they were called in their time, though, according to present notions, they were merely dramas, interspersed with occasional songs. Of these the most celebrated were perhaps the Cabinet and the Devil's Bridge, relics of which will be found in every old-fashioned book. The only vocation which Mr. Braham tried without success was that of the manager. The St. James's Theatre, which he built as an opera-house, and which was first opened in 1836, never satisfactorily answered the purpose for which it was originally intended.

In private life Mr. Braham was generally respected. He moved in good society, and among his acquaintance his fame as a man of extensive information and as a humorous retailer of anecdote was scarcely inferior to his reputation as a vocalist among the general public.

VIVIER AND HIS FRENCH HORN.—Lent brings the vast flock of musicians to Paris. Vivier comes among them this year, and as much of a mountebank as ever. Every day brings some new story about him. The following is the best one I have heard recently. This fellow "has too much dignity" (God save the mark,) to put himself into a good humor and become diverting, when formally asked to do so; and whenever such a request is made, he becomes at once stiff and formal. At an evening party last week this appeal was made with the usual result, and as the hostess and the guests insisted upon it very indelicately, he feigned compliance, and asked for a violin. It was given him amid the loud cries of the company—now we are going to have fun! Vivier declared that with that kind of instruments he could express everything, imitate all sounds, depict all scenes. Now I am going to exhibit a limping gentleman going to a railway station and pressed for time; he arrives too late; the train goes off as he enters the station. Imitative music could not have been more perfect, and everybody roared except the brother of the hostess, who was lame. Vivier next gave notice that he was going to represent a lady who stammers a great deal, and who is exceedingly stingy, disputing with a hack-driver because she will give him no pourboire. It was admirable, and everybody, except the mistress of the house, who stutters and passes for a too economical lady, laughed heartily. Then he gave a blond German making love to the French brunette, who talks gently and languidly, which everybody found very comical, except a lady and a gentleman present. For nearly an hour Vivier continued to ridicule some of the guests, without mercy and without delicacy, and broke all the laws of good-breeding and trampled on every sentiment of gentlemanly bosoms, because his hostess forgot one of the precepts of politeness, which he gives but too much cause to believe is numbered among none of those which he reckons as canons of social commerce.—Corr. N. O. Picayune.

The Mozart Festival.

The Mozart Festival has swept by.—On the occasion of the hundredth return of Mozart's birth-day, a musico-philanthropical association has been called into life, and adorned with his name—may it thrive and prosper! We have been reminded at Frankfort how much good has been already effected by the Mozart-Stiftung there—may it be as lasting in its result as Mozart's works! In Vienna, an attempt has been made to discover the grove of our dear Wolfgang Amadeus—perhaps it has been successful—but, in reality, it does not much matter, after all. There is one thing that has not been thought of on this occasion, namely, that Mozart's manuscripts are not preserved in their greatest possible completeness for posterity. If nothing is done in the matter, people will talk, in a hundred years, of the unartistic sentiments of our generation, as we now talk, perhaps with some exaggeration, of the generation which neglected to mark Mozart's grave with a stone.

It is well-known that nearly all Mozart's compositions, in his original hand-writing, are in the possession of the Messrs. André, of Frankfort-on-the-Maine. His earliest and his latest works—printed and unprinted—an incalculable treasure—are all there. Messrs. André, who have a real love for Art, are not alone proud of possessing these musical relics, but have, in the interest of Art, made the best use of them, partly by publishing many works hitherto unknown and partly by the politeness with which they allow them to be viewed, as well as for the free use of them which they granted Professor Jahn for his excellent work on Mozart. But it is manifest that the completeness and security of such a collection, with the changes to which the circumstances of private individuals are exposed, are not assured, as long as the collection is in the hands of such persons, however honorable. The question is, therefore, to place Mozart's manuscripts in some place where they may be safely preserved and easily accessible to posterity—only a public library unites both these advantages, and, therefore, within the walls of such an institution must these relics be deposited.—But in which one?

Prussians will propose Berlin; Saxons, Dresden; and Bavarians, Munich—but for Mozart's manuscripts, after all, there is "only one imperial city, only one Vienna."* However much the Viennese may have sinned against the great man, the influence which their manners and customs, their love of music, and the place they inhabit, together with its neighborhood, exercised upon him cannot be denied, although it cannot be the object of these lines to prove it. Mozart belongs especially to Vienna, that is, to the Vienna of his time, just as Correggio belongs to the city of Parma—for there it was that he lived and loved, that he suffered and created—and although the outward covering of his mind can no longer be found there, at least the outward covering of the works of his mind, if I may so express myself, may be contemplated with respect and love.

But now comes the question at which good nature stops. Who is to pay the expense necessary for the acquisition of the treasures in question?

Who other than the descendant of Joseph II., that noble Emperor, who loved Mozart, and urged him to many of his most beautiful creations, even though he gave him but little money? Joseph did not think of money, any more than Mozart—they were two geniuses; but the best proof how highly the partiality of his Emperor was prized by the musician is afforded by the fact that the latter refused the most brilliant offers from other places in order to remain near him.

We cannot, however, expect that a young monarch, in whose hands a part of the history of Europe rests, should think of original manuscripts, even though they are those of Mozart. The importance of their acquisition must be brought home to him; their preservation must be represented to him as the wish of the most educated and most eminent persons in the nation—and he will then, without doubt, expend, both readily and willingly, the two or three guilders, or even thousands if necessary for the object in view.

Let musicians, and the lovers of music, bestir themselves in this business, from Hamburg to Salzburg, from Berlin to Vienna, from Königsberg to Cologne. If in every city and in every little town, in which the strains of Mozart have produced their happy effect, addresses are drawn up, expressing their wish, and if these addresses bear the signatures of all those who love and exercise the art, such a chorus of thousands of voices will reach the ears of the mighty monarch, Herr Veague von Püttling (Hoven) in Vienna, and assuredly not find them shut to the appeal. who is at the same time a high official and an excellent musician, will, no doubt, willingly allow the addresses to be forwarded to him, in order, when they are all collected, to send them on in the right course, and a successful result cannot and will not be wanting.

May musical and non-musical papers interest themselves in this business, whether they look upon my project as good or bad. One thing is certain: we must profit by the present moment, if the question, like so many others having nought to do with material interests, is not to be carried away by the stream of time. In London, the manuscripts of Handel, that German musician whom England in so many respects made her own, are shown with pride in the Royal Library. Beethoven's manuscripts are scattered about all over the world, and only the very smallest portion of those of Haydn are to be found—a lucky star has yet preserved those of Mozart. May they remain, for the most distant times, with the people whom the great man with pride named his own!

Minor Music.

Minor music is most peculiarly the music of passion. It is not always plaintive; now and then it bursts out in the grandest strains. But

* "Es gibt nur eine Kaiserstadt, nur ein Wien," is a proverbial expression in Germany.

it always addresses the emotional part of our nature. Its softness is always tinged with melancholy; its grandeur is always dark and mysterious: but whether soft or strong, hurried or slow, we feel that the deepest, holiest recesses of our being are penetrated and passions awakened there of which we were before almost unconscious.

The effect of major music is commonly light and cheerful. It may indeed be full of tenderness, or sparkle with brilliant tones, or come up with a flourish of trumpets. Still, it is always reasonable, always human. There is nothing mysterious or incomprehensible in it.

Both modes are differently affected by change of power or movement. In major passages a slow movement gives the air of solemnity: in minor, the strain becomes a dirge. In the major mode, loudness leads from cheerful to sublime: in the minor mode, it changes the effect from plaintive or penitential to a glowing grandeur.

Perhaps these two modes of music may not improperly be regarded as representing two styles of literary composition. The major represents the prose of music, and the minor its poetry. The musical imagination is as distinct from the musical understanding, as these powers or faculties are from each other with respect to other subjects than music. If major strains affect the understanding, the minor mode touches the imagination, warming the heart of sympathy, or kindling the fires of intense emotion.

When the mind is in harmony with music in the minor key, whether plaintive or grand, it is not in its normal condition. It is either in a state of lassitude, like physical exhaustion, or else is subject to unusual tension. Laughing, or at least smiling, is the ordinary, natural act of man, even when he is hardly conscious of any cause. Not so with tears or stupefaction. Now, who that feels music at all, can laugh, or even smile when minor strains are played? And who cannot, when the harmony breaks off into the major key?

There is probably a physical cause for this difference in our impressions. This part of our nature remains to be studied by philosophers. Some considerations may however be stated, which may furnish a hint for the solution of the problem.

In lassitude, which may arise from bodily weakness, from sympathy, or from sorrow, the natural inflections of the voice in speaking will be slight,—only semitones or other minor intervals. Thus a sick man asks a question with an interval of a minor third, which, when well, he would qualify with a fifth, perhaps an octave. Hence arises what we call the whining, Peter-grievous tone. Dread, too, reduces the voice to nearly a monotone. Here is an imaginary weakness in apprehension of some mysterious phantasy, clothed with unknown powers. Let a person read the passage in the fourth chapter of the book of Job, where Eliphaz describes the apparition he saw, and he will find he cannot use major intervals: or if he reads Eve's lament for the loss of Paradise, the same necessity of using minor inflections will be perceived.

When the body is weary or feeble, the vocal chords are relaxed and the will declines to put forth more effort than is absolutely necessary for utterance. So it is when the mind is under the control of awe. The system then becomes 'weak as water.' Eliphaz says, 'Fear came upon me, and trembling, which made all my bones to shake.' Sorrow and sympathy lead to a similar relaxation. This unwillingness, or perhaps inability to vary the tension of the vocal chords, which is never felt when the spirits are cheerful and the springs elastic, appears to be the natural cause of minor intervals.

The relation of sound and its combinations to the mind is a subject that has been quite neglected, but one that would afford much interest to a philosophic mind, gifted with a proper musical sense. Its investigation would certainly bring to light much that is now hidden from us, though relating to our commonest processes. In this direction we do not know ourselves. There is a mystery attending the major and minor scales that professed musicians hold in dispute. That mystery is a mystery of our being: it is the work of the Creator in planning our organization.

IL TROVATORE.

There was an old woman who somewhere did dwell,
Who was burnt for a witch as the opera doth tell,
A daughter she had too, a gipsy so bold,
Who went to a house where an infant she stole.

[Chorus in the Italian language, relative to the way she hooked it.]

Singing tooral, toledo and in dormero:
Allegro andanty and sempre amo.
O giorno d'orrore! mia madre you know,
With fata crudele funeste & Co.

Now after they'd burnt up the old gipsy mother,
The daughter came by with her own child and tother;
When she saw her marm burning, it woke up her ire,
And she slung the stole baby smack into the fire.

[Sizzling chorus descriptive of the burning.]

Singing tooral, toledo and io dormiro, &c.

Now when the poor baby was all of a bake,
She found out she'd burnt up her own by mistake:
And as she felt bad at the deed she had done,
She brought up the other and called him her son.

[Chorus in the burrow-tone style.]

Singing tooral, toledo, &c.

Now when the young man got to years of discretion,
He took up with music all for a profession.
Likewise a young woman for sweetheart he got,
And all her affections upon him she set.

[Basso-relief chorus in which I set forth the young woman's sentiment as expressed in a furrin language.]

Tooral, toledo, &c. &c.

There's a chap now, a Count who comes into the song,
Who likewise loved this lady uncommonly strong.
And meeting Manrico—her lover—one night,
They pulled out their weapons intending to fight.

[Spirited chorus expressing a fearful combat which come very nigh coming off.]

Tooral, toledo, &c.

The next scene discovers Manrico, a gipsy,
With fellows who drink a great deal and get tipsy,
And who hammer on suvils, like jolly good fellows,
While their wives mind the fire and their sons blow the bellows.

[Hardware chorus a la horse-shoe.]

Singing tooral, toledo, &c.

But alas! after all this fine singing and fighting
Which gave the occasion for all this fine writing;
The Count got Manrico locked up in the jug,
And held him as tight as a bug in a rug.

[Doleful chorus, sparging the lagrime.]

Tooral, toledo, &c.

Then the lady came weeping and wailing around,
Where Manrico was lying all on the cold ground.

With the old gipsy woman while ballads he sung,
Resolved to die game though he'd got to be hung.

[Game chorus with back up and straps buckled down.]

Tooral, toledo, &c.

The Count came along—says the lady says she,
"If you'll let my love go, why then you may take me!"
So the count he consented to open the door,
And wipe off the chalks 'gainst the bold trovatore.

[Trovatore—a cove vot sings. Frinstance, I'm a trovatore, as you hear by the following:]

Tooral, toledo, &c.

But the lady she thought "I'll ne'er be his wife.
And I'll swindle the Count if it costs me his life."
So ven he come in, there she lay on her side;
And they found sure enough 'twas by pison she'd died.
[Chorus expressive of pison.]

Tooral, toledo, &c. &c.

Then the folks made a fire 'cause the Count was so sore,
And in it they burnt up the gay trovatore;
Then the gipsy says she, "Count—I wasn't his mother,
And I'm sorry to say that you've burned up your brother."

[Chorus expressing a grand family fry.]

Tooral, toledo, &c. &c.

A NEW OPERA BY A SPIRIT!—The Spiritual Telegraph contains the following statement. Who the "competent judges of musical composition" were, it does not inform us.

A few weeks since a young lady, sixteen years of age, daughter of an intelligent gentleman who resides a few miles from Boston (and who was developed some time since as a musical medium), was informed by her musical instructor (purporting to be Beethoven), that he had prepared an original opera which he desired to perform through her on the piano-forte. The young lady immediately commenced practising the same under the influence of the spirit, and soon after, on an evening designated by him, certain individuals—competent to judge of a musical composition and performance—assembled to hear the first complete rehearsal of this complicated and (as it proved) most wonderful production. A programme was prepared by the invisible author of the opera, the entire composition being divided into eighteen parts, including the overture and grand finale. The young lady performed the entire composition in one hour and twenty minutes, without leaving the instrument. If we may respect the testimony of good judges, the original performance was extremely brilliant and effective throughout.

A few days since, the writer met several of the parties who witnessed this singular operatic performance, including the young lady herself. The spirit was also present, and the medium was inspired with some of the grandest strains that mortals ever listened to or may hope to hear on earth. On Saturday evening, the 3d ult., the writer was one of a select company assembled at the residence of a distinguished gentleman who resides near Franklin square, Boston. On that occasion the spirit improvised on a grand piano, for an hour or more, with such masterly skill and power, as left us no room to deny the presence or to question the claims of the immortal musician. Two pieces were played—the first purported to be from Beethoven, and the second from Mozart, each occupying half an hour in the performance, and the brilliant style and extraordinary execution of the compositions thrilled the sense and the soul with more than electric power.

It is worthy of remark that the young lady to whom we have referred, has never taken a single lesson on the piano, yet she performs when under spiritual influence with all the skill of a master! In her rapid fingering, tone, volume, and in all that is comprehended in the most accomplished art, or displayed in the varied difficult range of intricate harmonies, she seems to be endowed with preternatural powers. All who have chanced to witness the results of her musical inspiration, have regarded her performances as truly startling and wonderful.

The Manuscript of Don Giovanni.

A pleasant piece of musical reading has just been contributed to L' Illustration, by M. Viardot, containing some notices of the original score of Don Giovanni, which, as the Athenæum announced some months since, has fallen, by purchase, into the hands of Madame Viardot. The manuscript is entirely complete, those bars excepted which should contain the dialogue in the cemetery betwixt Don Juan and Leporello; introducing the duet, O Statua gentilissima. The missing leaf in some degree authenticates the manuscript; since not only, as M. Viardot reminds us, was the short scene in question an after-thought—sketched at a moment's warning to give additional effect to the duet—but it was completed under corrections which may account for its being loose, and therefore lost from the MS. "In directing the first rehearsal of his opera," says Mr. Holmes in his "Life of Mozart," "he was obliged to stop the orchestra at the scene in the cemetery, Di rider finirai, * * as one of the trombone players did not execute his part correctly. The scene was originally accompanied by three trombones only. As the passage, after repeated attempts had no better success, Mozart went to the desk of the player and explained to him how he would have it done. The man, who was a crusty fellow, answered with some rudeness, "It is impossible to play it; and if I can't play it I am sure you can't teach me." "Heaven forbid," returned the composer, smiling, "that I should attempt to teach you the trombone; here, give me your part, and I will soon alter it." He did so on the spot, and added two oboes, two clarionets, and two bassoons." This addition may have caused the detaching of the leaf. By the way, while glancing at this anecdote, with reference to the MS. in Madame Viardot's possession, we cannot help pointing out how Mr. Holmes contradicts it in the very paragraph which immediately precedes it, in which the biographer declares that Mozart "never" made sketches nor "retouched" compositions, though we now and then find him improving a thought in the act of writing." More than one interesting example of the retouching or improving process are to be found in this MS.

The phrase which opens the agitato, Or sai chi l'onore, was thus reconsidered, great vigor being gained by the alteration. The accompaniments to the statue commandant's awful entry at the libertine's supper were also changed for the better. What will the purists say on hearing that the employment of a chorus in the tretta to the first grand finale is an effect not provided for in Mozart's score, who limited the passion and power of the climax to the seven solo singers? Will they not admit that the freedom taken is justified by the result? There are stage directions, too, in Mozart's score worth noticing. In the triple ball room music the composer directed that the second and the third orchestra should begin their parts by imitating players tuning—thus forestalling the grotesque piece of musical farce with which M. Meyerbeer opens his finale to L'Etoile. In the supper scene, when Donna Elvira (the devotee side of whose character has never in our experience been indicated by its representative) kneels to Don Juan in the earnestness of her last hopeless appeal to his conscience, Mozart enjoins Don Juan to kneel to her—in mockery. In closing his pleasant notice, M. Viardot, after recalling the well known reply of Signor Rossini, who, being asked which of his own operas he preferred, said "Don Giovanni," proceeds to repeat a saying spoken the other day by the great Italian composer when this MS. score was shown to him. "My friend," said the composer of Guillaume Tell, laying his hand on Mozart's pages, "he is the greatest, he is the master of all; he is the only one who had as much genius as science—as much science as genius!"

A ROSSINI-ISM.—After hearing Lablache hold forth at St. Peter's, he went up to him, and said, "he was decidedly a musical canon of the church; the thunders of the Vatican were as penny-trumpets compared to the thunders of his voice!"—Punch.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAR. 15, 1856.

NEW VOLUME.—Subscriptions are now in order for a new year of the Journal of Music. With the number for Saturday, April 5, it will enter upon its fifth year, and ninth volume. With that number we shall commence the publication of a translation, made expressly for this journal, of a beautiful Art novel by Mme. GEORGE SAND, in which the characters are musical, and which has never yet appeared in English. It will make pleasant reading for the summer months.

Our readers generally, as well as our agents, are earnestly requested, as they wish this Journal not only to continue its existence, but to improve in character and variety of matter, to exert themselves a little now to send us in the names of new subscribers. Our subscription list is still far short of what it should be to verify all the good things that are said of us, and in Boston especially, is by no means worthy of so musical a city. If each subscriber will but send us one new name besides his own, it would give us the means and time for making a much better paper.

TERMS, as heretofore, by mail, $2 per annum; by carrier, $2.50, payable in advance. This condition of prepayment will hereafter, especially in the case of out-of-town subscribers, be more strictly enforced. The really serious losses which have been the reward of our indulgence hitherto, compel us to this measure.

A GRAVE COMPLAINT.

TO OUR DELINQUENT SUBSCRIBERS AND ADVERTISERS.

We are sorry to address a numerous company. A large proportion of the just earnings of our Journal for the past two years or more is still withheld from us. Hundreds of dollars are due to us for unpaid advertisements and subscriptions. This, where our profits do not count by thousands, is a serious inconvenience. Not only is it actual loss of money, but a grievous loss of time spent in repeated fruitless efforts to collect—time which we owe to editorial, rather than to such clerical functions. We have a long list of doubtful names, to whom the paper has been sent for months and years, yet who answer no bills; these names we must cut off, unless they prove themselves good names at once.

BACK NUMBER WANTED.—We repeat the notice which we have given several times before, that any of our subscribers who may have copies of No. 4, Vol. V, (April 29, 1854,) which they do not care to preserve, will do us a great favor by sending them to this office. That No. is needed to complete sets for binding.

CONCERTS.

OTTO DRESSEL gave the third of this his third season of classical piano Soirées on Monday evening. The Chickering saloon was nearly filled with the best kind of audience, who listened with deep attention (despite a few whispering Vandals somewhere in the back part of the room) and with evident delight to nearly every item of the following programme:

- PART I.
1. Trio for Piano, Violin and Violoncello.....Otto Dresel.
 1. Allegro appassionato ed energico—2. Adagio affettuoso.
3. Scherzo, Animato assai—Finale, con fuoco.
 2. Songs.....Robert Franz.
"Mother, O sing me to rest," (Op. 10.)
"Das macht das dunkelgrüne Laub," (Op. 20.)
"Verlass mich nicht," (Op. 21.)
 3. Adagio from the Sonata for Piano, Op. 108.....Beethoven.
- PART II.
4. Trio in E flat, Op. 70, No. 2.....Beethoven.
 1. Poco sostenuto, Allegretto non troppo—2. Allegretto—
3. Allegretto non troppo—4. Finale.
 5. Prelude and Fugue from the "Wohl temperierte Klavier".....J. S. Bach.
And Selections from.....Chopin.
 6. Songs.....Robert Franz.
"So weit von hier," (Op. 23.)
Spring Song, (Op. 7.)
Summer Song, (Op. 1.)

In the two Trios Mr. Dresel had, as before, the valuable aid of Mr. SCHULTZ's violin and

Mr. JUNGNIKKEL's violoncello. It was a satisfaction to be able to verify again the impression twice produced on us in former seasons by Mr. Dresel's own Trio. We can say more strongly than we said two years ago: "It is a work that wears well; full of imagination, full of delicate touches, full of fire. Both in the ideas, which are original and interesting, and in the working up, which is skilful, complex and yet clear, preserving the most satisfying unity amid great wealth of contrast, it rewards attention and excites the desire for a more intimate acquaintance, scarcely less than the immortal works in this form, (not, it is true, very numerous) by the grander masters." This time, more than before, the whole work took possession of us. More than ever we felt its genuine musical inspiration, its power and depth of feeling, its elevation above all that is merely mechanical, sentimental or common-place, its artist-like maturity of style and abstemious thoughtfulness of treatment. It is neither coldly classical, externally and tamely true to approved models, nor spasmodic, extravagant and formless, like the ambitious efforts of many alleged young geniuses who stand forth as representatives of "progress." While it is new—newer than some things that are called "of the future"—it seems to have no quarrel with the old. We have listened during the past winter to a Trio by BRAHMS and a Quartet by RUBINSTEIN, those famous lions of 'Young Germany,' and we have yet to see an indication of any power in either of them at all comparable to that evinced in Mr. Dresel's Trio. Why will not our friend work out more of his inspirations in such forms? Why will he rely on quality alone, and not increase the quantity as others do, who do not always ask the Muse or wait for the soul's genial season before they rush before the world with new productions? This time the Trio did not seem to suffer in the rendering.

The FRANZ Lieder were sung, as before, by Mr. KREISSMANN, and with great acceptance. Certainly they are the freshest and selectest gifts of melody which could be introduced to add piquancy to a feast of instrumental music. The singer was particularly happy in the two last pieces: the "Spring Song," which expresses the wild impulses and yearnings of the Spring, with all their mingled gaiety and sadness, and the exquisitely dreamy "Slumber Song," to words from TZOGK. In both, the accompaniment is marvelously beautiful and full of meaning, in playing which Mr. Dresel shows how intimately he has made the Franz songs his own.

The Adagio by BEETHOVEN, from the famous Sonata of his later days, in B flat, op. 106 (the Adagio itself is in F sharp minor), was evidently a puzzle to most listeners. It was heard, however, with the profound respect which any thing from Beethoven, however strange, however far from brilliant or effective in the ordinary sense, is sure to command in a community which could erect a statue to the great composer. To many it was a mystery; some shook their heads and thought he surely was deaf when he wrote that, and even experienced artists have queried whether he was quite clear in his own mind about it; it is so sombre, so dreamily groping in harmonious twilight as it were; so repeatedly after each wondrous lift of modulation sinking back into the same brooding and most melancholy mood; and above all, so long. No wonder that they wondered more than they were charmed.* We must own, however, to having never been so deeply moved by any one of Beethoven's remarkable piano-forte Adagios. Has not reverie its place among the best experiences of life, and is it nothing to stand a while with such a soul as Beethoven upon the dim shores of the infinite and feel the thrill of that great mystery in which our being is encompassed? Depend upon it, that strange music is the embodiment of a deep mood in which it is good to linger quite as long as Beethoven will let us.—But with the Trio in E flat all found themselves at home again with the loved master, and thanked the concert-giver for this repetition of it. All found it as entrancing as they did before, and it was exquisitely played. This was the sweet sunshiny side of Beethoven, by exposure to which the most harmonious instincts in our nature seem to ripen.

Mr. Dresel's smaller piano pieces were as usual felicitous both in the selection and the rendering. That light and airy little arabesque out of old BACH's quaint and cunning art, the Prelude and Fugue (in F minor), sounded as fresh and modern in its feeling, as it is learned in its structure; as truly an inspiration, a gift of real fancy, as if it had come from the modern "romantic" and not from the "classical" side of the house; and worth comparing with the "fairy vein" of MENDELSSOHN. It was executed with the utmost delicacy and clearness, the performer losing himself completely in the spirit of the piece, as he did also in three beautiful selections from CHOPIN: namely, an Etude, a Prelude, and a Nocturno, the latter of which was not unfamiliar.

There remains but one more concert of this delightful series, and that is all that we have yet before us of all the Chamber Concerts that have helped to smooth the frown of this inclement winter.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—The regular series having been completed, the Annual Benefit Concert of the Club took place on Tuesday evening. The very large attendance at Chickering's showed how warmly and how widely their efforts (for now seven years) to initiate us into the delightful mysteries of Quartet and Quintet are appreciated. The Concert was a very fine one and the programme very rich, as follows:

- PART I.
1. Quartette No. 2, in B flat, (first time), Mozart.
Allegro assai—Minuet—o—Adagio—Finale, Allegro.
 2. Scene and Air from "L'Elisir d'Amor," Donizetti.
Mrs. J. H. Long.
 3. Concerto for Three Pianos, in D minor, Bach.
Allegro Moderato—Siciliana—Finale, Allegro.
Messrs. Trenkle, Parker and Perkins.
- PART II.
4. Adagio from the 2d Quintette in B flat, (by request) Mendelssohn.
 5. Songs:—1. Ave Maria, R. Franz.
2. Hark, the Lark, F. Schubert.
Mrs. J. H. Long.
 6. Quintette in C, No. 2, Op. 29, Beethoven.
Moderato—Adagio—Scherzo—Finale, Presto.

* M. LESZ informs us that this Sonata was composed in 1816-17, "the most unhappy period of Beethoven's existence, during the law-suit about the guardianship of his nephew." He also states that the Adagio has been arranged for voice and piano, upon the text: Das Grab ist tief und still (The grave is deep and still). He says this Adagio "has something of the biblical wailings of Zion. It is an immense lamentation reared on the ruins of all earthly goods. It has a grand motif with variations still more grand. Style in variations could not be carried further. There is a curious fact related of this piece. Ries had been charged by Beethoven with the sale of the manuscript of the Sonata in London, when he received a letter in which Beethoven begged him to add (prefix) to the Adagio two notes, a and c sharp. Ries was much surprised that he should have to add two notes to a composition of his stamp, which had been entirely finished more than two months and which

The Quartet and the Quintets were remarkably well played. The former proved a delightful accession to our stock of MOZART memories. In the Allegro and Finale it is one of the most happy, sunshiny and spontaneous inspirations of his ever child-like nature. The Minuetto is after the regular pattern of the stately old dance, quaintly beautiful. The Adagio is perfectly lovely, full of the purest, tenderest feeling. The whole work is in a right popular and appreciable vein, yet a fine specimen of the inimitable art of Mozart.

The Concerto by BACH awoke memories of Otto Dresel's earlier concerts, when the three pianos were played by SCHARFENBERG, JAEHL and DRESEL. This time our unfortunately one-sided position with regard to the pianos, being so near to one that we could not hear the others equally well, interfered with our receiving so clear an impression as we could have wished. We doubt not that the effect would have been better, had the instruments been placed upon a platform, instead of being ranged across the floor, beneath the quartet of strings accompanying. As it was, however, it was pleasant to renew acquaintance with so fine a work. We cannot see how any one can find it dull; there is such a wholesome breadth and fulness of life in it; you are buoyed up as upon the broad, generous, sparkling surface of the sea. Messrs. TRENKLE, PARKER and PERKINS co-operated to good purpose, and this was certainly a graceful and artistic service for them to render to their friends.

We would thank whomever it was that requested the repetition of the Adagio from that Quintet of MENDELSSOHN played at the previous concert. It is one of his grandest and most deeply pathetic works, and was played admirably. So was the wonderful Quintet of Beethoven, which is the last of the only two he wrote, and perhaps the noblest composition of the kind.

Mrs. LONG displayed highly finished and effective execution in the piece by DONIZETTI. The FRANZ Ave Maria and the Serenade by SCHUBERT were sung quite acceptably, in beautiful voice, and in better style than we could expect from one whose chief experience has been in very different kinds of song. A little more fervor, a more perfect entering into the spirit of the music was the chief thing wanting.

The members of the Quintette Club have done an excellent work this winter—for their public, if not for themselves. We trust that they will feel encouraged to minister, as they have done, to our growing appetite for sweet sounds for many winters yet to come.

THE GERMAN TRIO (Messrs. GARTNER, HAUSER and JUNGNIKKEL) gave the sixth and last of their second season of Concerts in the Chickering saloon, last Saturday evening. The programme as usual was of a mixed character.

- PART I.
1. Grand Sonata, Hummel.
For Piano and Violoncello, (by request.)
 2. Variations in A, for Violin, Prode.
- PART II.
3. Cavatina, Ma la sola, from "Beatrice de Senda," Bellini.
 4. Duo Concertant, for Piano and Violoncello, on theme from Norma, Gregoir and Servais.
 5. German Song, "The Bright Eyes," Stiegl.
 6. Fantasia Brillante, for Violin, on themes "Der Freyschütz," Meiser.

seemed to exclude the slightest alteration. Nevertheless the effect was marvellous, the two notes now forming the first measure of the Adagio. Two steps conducting to the gate of the sepulchre!"

The vocal numbers were sung by Mrs. J. M. MOZART. We were only able to hear the last two pieces. Mr. GARTNER played the Frey-schütz fantasy very brilliantly; the themes themselves are refreshing compared with those more frequently selected for such show pieces. It was truly a treat to hear again that Trio of Beethoven, with its mystical Adagio, which plays upon the supernatural chords within us, and which has given to the work in Germany the name of the Geister-Trio, (The Ghost Trio.) It was in many respects very well played, only with too level and uniform a degree of force, too little light and shade.

MORE ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.—We are happy to state that the fine orchestra, which has given us so much good music during the winter, is not to be allowed to fall to pieces now that the evening series is completed. Measures are to be taken forthwith to secure the ground that has been gained, and to organize, upon the basis of that orchestra, a permanent association for the provision of the higher class of instrumental concerts in our city for, we trust, many seasons yet to come.

Meanwhile the orchestra will be kept in play and the musical spirit not allowed to go to sleep, by a series of six Wednesday AFTERNOON CONCERTS, to be given in the Music Hall. Beethoven's statue is not to stand there presiding over nothing all the time until next winter. There have been many anxious inquiries for afternoon concerts. The music-lovers of many neighboring towns were wholly cut off from the Orchestral Concerts by the want of rail-road accommodations. Ladies can go unattended in the afternoon, and the lengthening Spring days will tempt many out.

The selections of course will be less exclusively classical than those of the evening concerts. The object is to suit all tastes. But we are assured that every concert will include a Symphony and one good Overture, besides lighter varieties, as set forth in the announcement in another column. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony will probably be given at the first.

Musical Chat-Chat.

Mrs. ROSA GARCIA DE RIBAS gives a Concert this evening—the first time for three years—in the Tremont Temple. She has many claims upon the music-lovers of Boston, and with such attractions as she and her husband, our excellent oböist, with distinguished aid, can offer, there should be a full house. The orchestra, under CARL ZERRAHN, will play the popular overtures to Semiramide and Fra Diavolo, and wind up with the "Wedding March." Mr. SATTER, the brilliant pianist, will play a fantasia of his own, and a duo by Herz and Lafonte with the veteran violinist, Mr. KEYZER. Mr. DE RIBAS will play Ernst's Elegie upon his oböe, and a solo on the English horn, that bigger brother of the family.—Mrs. DE RIBAS is to sing two Italian pieces solo, and in two duets with Mr. ARTHURSON, who will also sing one serious solo, and one of the funny extravaganzas of John Parry "by particular request."

The concert of the children of the Warren Street Chapel drew a large audience to the Music Hall last week on Monday, and was truly a pleasant affair. The decorations of Saturday remained; there were some three hundred happy faces on the stage; some of the youngest sat on steps built up around the base of the great statue, and Beethoven looked down with quite a benign Sunday school-teacher aspect. The choruses were sung very sweetly, and for the most part in tune, in soprano and alto; we never heard a mass of children sing so well; they did great credit to the institution and to their teacher Mr. CLAUDE H. CLARKE. . . . ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS has succeeded DIDIER in the Italian Opera troupe and has already appeared in Philadelphia as Arsace. The Evening Bulletin says of her: "Although of a most heroic figure and face, she made herself completely at home in the part of the 'commander of the forces.' Greater self-possession, grace of movement, intelligence in acting, and readiness for the business of the stage, we have never seen in any opera singer. Her voice is a contralto of good quality and moderate power. Her method is excellent and she sang all the difficult music of her part with great correctness, if we except occasional slight faults of intonation which were most perceptible in the cadenzas of the duo: Giorno d'orrore. Her first long and arduous scene in the opera was remarkably well done, and indeed, from beginning to end, she was prompt, energetic and fully absorbed in her part and the business assigned to her. She fully shared with Madame Lagrange the honors of the evening."

This week, on Wednesday evening, the Opera reopened in New York: illness prevented Miss Phillipps taking the part of the gypsy Azucena in Il Trovatore. Meyerbeer's L'Etoile du Nord is understood to be in preparation. . . . BRAHAM, the great English tenor, who reigned so many years without a rival, and who first gave to us Americans an idea of what a great tenor was, although we got it only from the superb ruins of his voice, the ripe perfection of his art remaining, has at last left this mortal stage. We give a notice of his life in another column from the London Times. It says nothing of his visit to this country, which was made in 1841, when he was sixty-five years old. What crowds here in Boston thronged to the old Melodeon to hear him, and with what wonderful power he thrilled us by his grand renderings of the recitatives in Handel's "Israel in Egypt," or Luther's "Judgment Hymn"! With what exquisite tenderness he sang "Thy rebuke"! and how gracefully those English songs and ballads!

. . . . To pass from music to a sister art,—which we may well do by taking the hand of one who has ministered to us so well in both,—we have rejoiced to hear such excellent accounts from Florence of our townsman THOMAS BALL, the sculptor, whose rich bass did long and excellent service in our oratorios, the while that he was earning no mean reputation as a painter, but who, finding that his truest genius "lay in the form and design, rather than in color" surprised us one day by a statuette bust of Jenny Lind,—the best representation ever made of her; then by an admirable bust and statuette of Webster; then by that life-like head of Jonas Chickering, which stands in marble in the beautiful saloon. The Florence correspondent of the Newark Advertiser writes (Jan. 24):

Mr. T. Ball, of Boston, has been working here over a year with earnestness and evident advantage. Having been a portrait painter, he had studied form before he turned his attention to sculpture, and his first modeled works are consequently more perfect in their proportions than first efforts usually are, and what is better, have the expression which indicates true feeling in the artist. He has recently made a sitting-statuettes of Washington Allston, which is quite a gem of its kind, besides being a faithful likeness of that lamented artist. The size and character of this work, adapting it to the library or study, render it an available, as well as valuable contribution to Art, and the admirers of Mr. Allston will especially appreciate it as such. Mr. Ball has already in marble a reclining bust called "Truth," which beautifully illustrates the pure idea. He has also in plaster a statue of Pandora, and is now modeling "A ship-wrecked boy." He intends returning to Boston next summer with these rich fruits of his Italian sojourn.

A correspondent of the London Musical World communicates the following about the state of music in Italy:

Our Italian contemporaries seem to be coming round to our way of thinking. We find in the Gazzetta Musicale of Naples, a few reflections on the present state of musical execution in Italy, which tend to the conclusion that musical taste is either entirely lost in Italy, or fast approaching its dissolution. The article to which we allude is signed F. Tagliani, and is suggested by the reprise of Donizetti's Roberto Devereux. It begins by citing the current opinion of the present race of Italian dilettanti, that "Musical science has progressed rapidly in our times, and that dramatic expression has attained, if not perfection, at least something very near it." Now on hearing Roberto, which had been laid aside since 1887, when the principal parts were written for Mme. Rouzi de Begnis, Sig. Daddonna, and M. Barroillet, we were led to reflect, that if art had really progressed so rapidly, it is to be feared that the more it progresses, the more it will recede from the sublime simplicity of the great composers of the past. Roberto Devereux may be set down as a failure simply because the singers could not execute the music, or rather because their voices, accustomed to compete with the brass lungs of the orchestra, are overstrained for the softer and more delicate expositions of sentiments. With the exception of that of the heroine by Mme. Medori, the other parts were very indifferently filled by artists who are struggling for notoriety before they are qualified by study, and fancy that a good voice is enough without cultivation.

Sig. Pacini is now in Naples superintending the rehearsals of his new opera, Margherita Pastora, which will be produced at the San Carlos as soon as Sig. Colletti returns from Rome. Mercadante is also busy rehearsing his new Miserere, which will be executed in the church of San Pietro. In place of Zingarelli. Report speaks highly of it, and great expectations are entertained.

At Florence, Signor Carlo Romani's opera, Le Gemme della Corona, was produced at the Pergola, on the 11th instant, with very questionable success. It underwent two further additions, but as it did not gain in public favor, it has been withdrawn. At the Teatro Pagliano, Maria di Rohan has been successful. A new opera by Sig. Ciani, entitled Il Sultano, is in course of preparation. At Milan Il Profeta continues to draw good houses, as also Lucrèce Borgia, which is well sustained by Mme. Barbieri-Nini, Mme. Lucioni, Sign. Graziani, and Giov. Corsi.

M. BERLIOZ is contributing a series of articles to the Gazette Musicale, on the duties and requirements of a Chef-d'Orchestre, or orchestral conductor. They are to form a supplementary chapter to the new edition of his treatise upon Instrumentation. On the 25th ult., Berlioz gave a concert in the Salle Hers. The first part included an air from Gretry's Asacron, and a fantasia on Il Trovatore for the piano-melodium; the second part, his L'Enfance du Christ, in three parts, and choruses and dances from Gluck's Armide.—M. JULES FORTANA lately gave a concert entirely devoted to compositions, vocal and instrumental, of CHOPIN. Six Polish melodies, as yet unpublished, were sung.

Beethoven's posthumous quartets are still zealously studied and produced in Paris by the four devoted artists, MM. Maurin, Mas, Sabatier, and Chevillard. They recently won great applause by their performance of the C sharp minor Quartet, op. 131.—Bottesini's "Siege of Florence" is in rehearsal.

A new Symphony by THEODORE GOUVY is announced in the Gazette Musicale as forthcoming at the last concert of the Société des Jeunes Artistes in Paris.

NEW COURSE OF HARMONY, BY L. H. SOUTHARD.

The Publishers call the attention of the musical profession to this work, as one eminently calculated to lighten the labors of the teacher, and rapidly advance the pupil. It is emphatically a PRACTICAL work, serving both as a Manual of instruction on the one hand, and a Text-book on the other; and it is believed that the peculiar arrangement of the work, together with the very large number of exercises and examples, presents great advantages, to both scholar and teacher, over any similar work of the kind. Teachers highly commend the work. Mr. WILLIAM MASON says it is a work unsurpassed in the language. Mr. GEORGE J. WEAVER says that it is a work perspicuous in diction, methodical in arrangement, and sufficiently copious to embrace all the essentials of the general doctrine of accord. It can be ordered through any respectable Music-seller, and will be sent through the mail on the receipt of the price, ($1.75,) postage prepaid.

The Mission of Mozart.

LEADING CHARACTERISTICS OF HIS GENIUS AND HIS WORKS.

BY A. OULIBICHEFF.

The fact that the greatest composer for the church, the theatre and the chamber was obliged to give lessons by the hour, to teach children the scale, to work for parties or for country balls, to gather his daily bread crumb by crumb, is certainly the most extraordinary thing in his biography. Yet who does not at a glance see how much these conditions favored the development of his universal genius, and led straight to the goal of his mission?

This, by comparison with other biographical details, explains to us the catalogue of MOZART, that extraordinary document, in which quantity seems as miraculous as quality. Here is a condensed schedule of its contents :

1. CHURCH MUSIC. Masses, Litanies, Offer-tories, Motets, Psalms, sacred Cantatas, and a Requiem; in all. 36 works.

2. ORATORIOS. Gerber counts three of them, but only names Davidde Penitente.

3. THEATRE MUSIC. Fifteen or sixteen Operas, serious, comic and romantic; two Serenades and one Dramatic Pastoral; several Ballets, Pantomimes, Entr'Actes, Intermezzi, and single Choruses. Under this rubric belong also 43 Arias, single Italian duets and terzets with orchestral accompaniment.

4. INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC WITH GRAND ORCHESTRA. 33 Symphonies and 15 Opera Overtures.

5. CONCERT MUSIC. 29 Concertos for the Piano-forte; 5 Violin Concertos; 6 Concertos for the French Horn; 1 Concerto for the Bassoon and 1 for Clarinet; 41 Divertissements (concerti grassi) for orchestra and band music. Some of these have as many as 16 parts. Moreover, a multitude of Solos and Variations for the Piano with and without orchestra; Concertantes for two pianos; Solos for violin, violoncello, viola da gamba, flute, &c.

6. CHAMBER MUSIC. 10 Violin Trios, only one of which is known to us; 28 Quartets and 8 Quintets for violins; 23 Trios, 5 Quartets, and a multitude of Sonatas and other pieces for two and four hands for the piano; two Quintets for half string and half wind instruments; a Quintet for the Harmonica with accompaniment of flute, obœ, viola and 'cello.

7. NOT DRAMATIC VOCAL MUSIC. 16 three and four part Canons, several Cantatas and a collection of Italian and German Songs, 80 in number, published by Breitkopf & Härtel in Leipzig.

8 DANCE MUSIC. Minuets, Waltzes, Ländlers, Contra-dances and Allemandes.

pieces, and other pieces for trumpet and kettle drums for cavalry.

10. SERENADE MUSIC. A Notturmo, arranged as violin quintet, and a musical joke in which Mozart amused himself by imitating the street musicians. This piece is for two violins, one viola, two horns and a bass.

11. MUSIC FOR INSTRUCTION. Solfeggios, easy Sonatas and Sonatinas; Canons and single Fugues; Studies and Exercises in Counterpoint; a Concise Thorough Bass School, which Mozart wrote for a niece of the Abbé Stadler.

12. ARRANGED MUSIC. Handel's "Messiah," "Acis and Galatea," "St. Cecilia," and "Alexander's Feast."

A very large number of these compositions are not yet published. Those of which the composer himself made a chronological catalogue, extend from Feb. 9, 1784, to Nov. 15, 1791. This catalogue contains 145 numbers. The remainder embraces all that has so far been published, and all that it has been possible to collect of manuscripts of Mozart's earlier works, from the year 1764. But there is every reason to suppose that this collection is by no means complete.

Besides the completed works, there have been found among the papers left by Mozart various plans and fragments of works of all kinds, 90 in number. . . Including these, the total sum of Mozart's compositions, according to Von Nissen, will exceed 800. If we would count only the finished works, we must consider, in the first place, that Mozart never entered in his own catalogue the pieces which he made gratuitously to oblige his friends; secondly, that he never lacked friends, nor the disposition to oblige in that way; and thirdly, that many of these pieces never have been published, but have remained unknown in the hands of their possessors. . . . Among the works contained in neither catalogue, I may name the Concertante which Mozart composed in 1784 for Signora STEINABACCHI; the beautiful duos for violin and viola, which he made for the sick MICHAEL HAYDN, and presented to the Archbishop of Salzburg in his name; also that learned Quartet, called "The Fugue," which has long since been published. I also find nowhere the choruses and inter-acts composed for the drama, "King Thamos in Egypt," which date from the year 1788, and which are said to equal the sublimest creations of HANDEL and of GLUCK. Von Nissen tells us that this music has been adapted to church texts, and that it is still sung in Prague in solemn services as graduals and offertories. Finally, the Requiem itself is not found in the autograph catalogue. New discoveries are made continually of works heretofore unknown. The Leipzig Zeitung has spoken, among others, of an opera by MOZART, called La Villanella rapita (The kidnapped peasant girl.)

Such is the catalogue of the works of Mozart, and it still waits its completion. Measure the life of the musician with this gigantic document. Eight hundred compositions, some of which are volumes of 600 pages and count only as single numbers! Deduct from this total sum the first attempts of childhood, the labors of early youth, the mediocre products thrown aside, and there still remains to fill out the twelve rubrics of the catalogue a multitude of masterworks in every kind of music; the arranged music shows a learned, conscientious labor, while in the subordinate kinds there is at least the merit of a perfect harmony with their respective ends; for even down to lullabies and ländlers, we find compositions which are models in their kind. Eight hundred works in a life of five and thirty years, of which the first eight do not count, of which two thirds were spent in travelling about, while of the rest a large share was divided between the business of instruction and amusements;—a life in which there seems to have been left scarcely more room than the most indefatigable man finds for rest! But instead of this rest we find a whole musical library, a universal cyclopædia!

How are we to reconcile the material possibility of this marvellous fecundity with Mozart's mode of life, which was anything but a home life, and with his many multifarious engagements? The mornings belonged to pupils; the evenings to invitations, to the theatre, to concerts and the company of friends. For composition, therefore, there remained only the early hours of morning and the nights. Mozart was a very early riser, and yet he worked from habit and from preference in the night; at least, he was most often seen then at his writing desk or his piano. Our hero found, like SCHILLER, that the external quiet, the solitude, the withdrawal of the visible world, and the state of nervous excitement which accompany the privation of sleep, were mighty vehicles for inspiration. Like the poet, too, he made use of other stimuli not less injurious to health. One might with equal right apply to both the verses of GOETHE upon the early death of his illustrious friend:

"And many a work, profound and nobly planned,
The Art and Artist more illustrious made,
While thus the flower of life's best efforts giving,
Yea, life itself, to this, the shade of living."

The enormous number of 800 works, produced in these few years, would remain none the less inexplicable, even if Mozart had worked always at his piano, or with pen in hand, and free from all other business. But the solution of the riddle lies in the fact, that by day and by night, morning and evening, at the table or in the carriage, alone or in company, over the social glass or during the pain of teaching the scale, he still composed and composed all the time. The reader will remember that the greater half of the Clemenza di Tito was completed on his way to Prague; that several pieces in Don Juan had their origin at tenpins; and that a Quintet in the Zauberflöte first inspired the composer's fancy to the accompaniment of billiards. In further confirmation of these facts, let us listen to a narrative in which the most precious details are set forth with a naturalness which admits of no doubt about the credibility of the witness. SCHUBERT WEBER writes:

"I always saw my brother-in-law in good humor, but even in the best of humors very much absorbed in thought; he would look you straight in the eye, answer every thing considerately, whether he was gay or sad, and yet all the time he would seem to be deeply thinking and working upon something wholly different. Even while he washed his hands in the morning he would walk up and down the chamber, never stood a moment quiet, but struck one heel against the other, and was all the time reflecting. At the table he often took a corner of his napkin, rolled it up tightly, and led himself round by the nose with it, so buried in thought that he seemed not to know what he was doing, and often at the same time made a grimace with his mouth. His hands and feet were constantly in motion; he always played with something, for example, with his hat, in his pocket, with his watch ribbon, with tables and stools as if they were pianos, &c."

This narrative requires no comment. Other witnesses add: "When Mozart was alone, or with his wife, or even with other persons whose presence imposed no restraint on him, he was in the habit of humming and even singing with a loud voice, without even knowing it. At such times his face was covered with a burning red, and he would suffer no one to disturb him." These facts, as well as the story of the tenpins and billiards, prove that the noisiest distractions could not always interrupt the thread of his ideas. Nor must we believe that on occasions of this sort Mozart limited himself to seeking the motives or leading thoughts of the projected work, or that he spared himself the labor of the development and instrumentation of the same until a more convenient time. No, he never in composing separated the details from the whole. He worked all out in large, as I believe all great contrapuntists have done. As soon as a thought dawned in him, he seized it at once in all its consequences and in all its accompanying harmony. The melody, the bass, the middle parts, all sounded in his head, at first confused, then with increasing precision, as soul gradually became ear. All arose at once, combined and developed itself without confusion, arranged itself according to the rules of modulation and of counterpoint, and distributed itself between the vocal and the instrumental parts, as if by an aesthetic necessity, an extraordinary instinct, which, however, never was deceived about the beautiful.

I shall not doubt be asked how I have contrived to penetrate in this way into the secrets of the mental operations which resulted in the music of Mozart. He has himself enlightened us about this secret in a letter long since published. (See No. 20 of the present volume of this Journal for a translation of the letter.) Unquestionable as this letter is, we do not need its testimony to convince us that Mozart worked out his compositions whole; their very structure demonstrates this to the eye and ear of every musician; and that he finished them completely in his head, is shown by the fac-similes of his sketches, which are written with such neatness and executed with such exactness that one would take them for the most careful copies. I remark, in passing, the difference in this respect between Mozart and Beethoven, whose manuscripts are illegible.

A quite peculiar law of Mozart's nature teaches us the cause of this continued and involuntary mental labor. He had received by nature the most loving heart and the most excitable senses; at the same time, his whole being was so constituted that he could exercise no one of his faculties without the more or less direct participation of his musical organ. Every event that moved him, every at all lively impression from without, awoke sympathetic chords in that mine of harmony within him, out of which there at once shaped themselves the themes which the impulse of the moment had awakened. If, for example, a fine landscape, lit up by a lovely Spring sun, came upon Mozart in his travels, he contemplated it at first with speechless admiration; his serious and thoughtful features brightened; his inner orchestra began to play; the echo thereof came upon his lips, and he exclaimed at length, with sparkling eyes, "Ah, if I only had this theme on paper!" As soon as the relation of the object to the individual had begun to clothe itself with the form which it was definitively to wear—that is to say, when the impressions produced by the outside reality had resolved themselves into musical images—Mozart forgot the object and thought only of the image. Thus we can fully comprehend why he, in spite of his inflammable temperament and his uncommon sensibility, yet had no real passion besides music. On the other hand, he had many fondnesses, which all together served to nourish and to counterbalance this one passion. He loved the female sex, a good table, good wine, billiards, canary birds, riding, dancing, and what not. As a pupil of the elder VESTRIS he prided himself somewhat on his dancing and a fine leg. It is said, too, that he distinguished himself as Harlequin and Pierrot, which were his favorite masquerade characters. All these enjoyments, to which he gladly gave himself up, served, as we have said, for nutriment and counterpoise to his peculiar passion: for nutriment, in so far as his musical organ exercised a power of assimilation upon his other faculties, concentrating all the others in itself, so that in this way the joys and sorrows, the whole emotional and intellectual life of the artist conspired to the benefit of the art. On the other hand, this very passion had to be checked by some means, lest its excess should prove quickly fatal. Possessed day and night by the demon of inspiration, and incapable of opposing thereto a strong will, which he lacked entirely, Mozart sought to escape it for the moment, without always succeeding, whether on foot or on horseback.

The pursuit of amusement, therefore, was so much a physical necessity with him, that he had to satisfy it at any price, unless he would give up the ghost or become insane. So true was this, that the more the passion or the rage for labor increased in him, and they always did increase, the greater grew his need of recreation. In his early youth Mozart appears to have been more rational, more orderly and economical, than during the last seven or eight years of his life; at a time, that is, when masterpieces flowed one upon another from his classic pen, and when such continued lofty inspirations finally caused him frequent faintings.

Alternating from the exalted and almost feverish state which follows the creation of master-works, to the intoxication of sensual enjoyment, and recovering as it were from one excess by plunging into the opposite excess, Mozart knew no such thing as mental sleepiness or corporeal sluggishness, the far e sentir niente (doing and feeling nothing,) no such thing as ennui—things of which we all accuse ourselves so much, and which serve so admirably to give our machine repose. Mozart in this way gradually used up all the spring of his frail organization in the pursuit of the beautiful, now soaring to it on the fiery wings of ecstasy, now seeking it in the most learned depths of calculation. When he was tired out, he would quench his thirst at the fountain of pleasure, and from the same fountain he drank death. Exhaustion announced itself already with his thirtieth year. He gradually sank into a sort of gloomy hypochondria, which tormented him now more, now less, but which left his humor unimpaired the moment that the fit was past. This, wonderful to relate, appeared to stimulate his already exceeding activity still more, and no doubt became the moral cause of his most sublime creations.

Who does not know Schiller's "Division of the Earth?" Jove says to men: I give you the world; come and share it brother-like among you. All came, the farmer, the merchant, the nobleman, the priest, the king. Each one took his part. After the whole world had been distributed, along came the poet. Why do you come so late, when I have nothing left to give you?

"Mine eyes hung on thy countenance so bright,
Mine ears drank in thy Heaven's harmony;
Forgive the soul, which, drunken with thy light,
Forgot that Earth had aught for me."

That was a poet's excuse at all events. Jove, delighted to hear the true language of the gods spoken by a mortal, replied: Well, then, since the earth is given away, wing yourself up as often as you please to me here in my Heaven.

No one ever made more frequent use of the privilege granted by Jupiter to the sons of Apollo. He was not satisfied with occasionally mounting to the court of the celestials, but he made there his permanent abode. Can we wonder after this that he neglected all below here in this world which looked like a paying occupation? Every one of my readers has, I fancy, been admitted once at least during his life into Olympus; every one has had his moments in which, in his enthusiasm about some thing, some person, some idea, he has forgotten the earthly. Then he too found himself in Olympus, face to face with Jove. Between us and Mozart, however, there is this one small distinction—that we have seen the king of the gods very seldom, whereas Mozart lived with him always. For us the favors of Jove have for the most part had mere illusion and mockery for their sequel. The more prudent ones soon mark this and withdraw themselves into their shell, like the snail which has thrust out its horns at the wrong time. But for Mozart it was a succession of glorious, celestial gifts, which compensated the poet a hundred-fold for his exclusion from the division of the earth.

(Conclusion next week.)

Louis Lablache.

The king of the bassi was born at Naples in the year 1794; his father was a Frenchman, and his mother a native of the Emerald Isle; the son of such parents was certain to inherit some of the sprightly characteristics of the lands that gave them birth. The terrors of the French revolution drove the parents of our hero from Marseilles to Naples, where Joseph Napoleon granted his protection to the family, and placed young Louis in the Conservatorio della Pietà de Turchini, now known by the title, San Sebastiano, where Lablache studied vocal and instrumental music at the same time. A contrabassist happened to be wanting one day in the orchestra of Santa Onofrio; Marcello Perrino, his master, said to him, "You understand the violoncello perfectly, you will be easily able to play the double bass." Lablache had a sort of repugnance to this instrument, notwithstanding which, he procured the bass gamut on Tuesday, and, on the Friday following played his part with perfect exactness.

Lablache appears to have been stage-struck at an early age; five times did he desert the Conservatorio to make his essay on the boards. At length he obtained an engagement at Salerno for fifteen ducats a month (1s. 8d. per diem). He received a month's pay in advance, remained two days at Naples, and emptied his purse. Not, however, wishing to present himself at Salerno, without moveable effects, or the appearance of such, he took with him a trunk crammed full of sand. Two days after, the vice-rector of the Conservatorio arrived at Naples in quest of him, discovered, and gave him into custody of some of the officers in attendance. The impresario seized upon the trunk of the fugitive as an indemnity for money advanced,—officers were summoned to take an inventory of the effects, when lo, the contents—sand! were disclosed to the gaping crowd.

The freaks of Lablache were eventually profitable to his comrades and the art in general, for a theatre was shortly afterwards constructed in the Conservatorio, and thenceforward he was enabled to gratify his passion for the stage. Lablache thought no more of flight, but continued his studies, which he brought to a close at the age of seventeen. It is not our intention to follow him to the different theatres in which he appeared previous to his reaching the Italian Opera in Paris. Suffice it to say, that wherever he played his talents excited admiration; the actor was continually fêted, the singer applauded, and the individual loaded with testimonies of affection. It was in the November of the year 1830 that our fat, facetious, and funny friend made his debut in the French capital, in the part of Geronimo, in the opera Matrimonio Segreto. His entrée was a perfect triumph; he enacted his part with an overwhelming talent, and was at once recognized as the first basso cantante and primo buffo of our era.

To form an idea of the power which this actor possesses over the select and intelligent auditory, he should be seen on the Italian stage in a part of some importance. Figure to yourself an assembly of cold, silent, and abstracted spectators; in an instant every head is raised, every countenance animated, every mouth smiling—Lablache is before them. Survey those fine and noble features, those eyes beaming with genius and frank expression, that stature so colossal, yet so dignified! Physically, as well as vocally, Lablache is the perfect type of the true basso cantante. He is at home in every character, serious or comic, tragic or sentimental; he seduces and captivates your imagination, and holds you in breathless suspense. He is an absolute Proteus; as Marino Faliero, or Dulcamara; as the father of Desdemona; as Harry the Eighth; as Il Podesta, Don Magnifico, or Figaro, he makes you weep, laugh, or shudder at pleasure.

The compass of Lablache's voice is from G in the bass to E natural, embracing but thirteen notes; but the timbre, power, and vibration of his tones are prodigious, taken, as they are, with unerring precision. Hear him in grand concerted pieces, with all the surrounding voices in full development, and the orchestra putting forth its powers—Lablache surmounts the whole, overpowers both chorus and instruments; and the éclat of his bass phrases, streaking the general mass of sound, is never confounded with unisonous accompaniment. It is impossible to describe the effect of his magnificent organ in morceaux d'ensemble; it is as a cannon amid a rolling fire of musketry—as thunder amid the tempest. Nevertheless, he has a perfect control over this immense volume of tone, subduing it at pleasure, and endowing it with grace, delicacy and occasionally, even a space of coquetry. Such are the triumphs of art! Cultivation has perfected nature, without trespassing on her primitive beauty.

In lighter pieces he has been known to perform wonderful feats of execution. One evening during a representation of La Prova, Madame Malibran took a fancy to discontent her colleague, by introducing ornaments and caprices of extreme difficulty, which it was the business of Lablache to imitate. But the trap laid for this vocal Hercules availed only to cause a display of his agility: note after note, trait after trait, shade after shade, did Lablache reproduce in falsetto the floriture which Malibran had taken such pains to mature. On meeting behind the scene, Malibran could not help expressing to Lablache her astonishment at the ease with which he had surmounted such difficult passages; and the latter, with his usual bonhomie, replied that he had not been aware of the difficulty.

Lablache is not a singer in the ordinary sense of the word. Look not to him on every occasion for rapid execution, a profusion of graces, chromatic ascents and descents. He aims not at effect by such trivialities; he attains it by dramatic truth—by accents of real melody—by the intensity of his feelings. Ever awake to a sense of the beautiful, he is as capable of interpreting the chefs d'œuvre of older masters, as the most finished productions of contemporary art.

These fine qualities are the result of studies which few of our musicians undertake, but which they would do well, one and all to imitate.

Lablache never appears in public without much patient and extensive inquiry as to the traditional costume and appearance of the individual to be represented. It may be remembered that, on his first appearance in London as Henry VIII., in Anna Bolena, his resemblance to the historical personage struck the spectators with as much amazement as though the tyrant himself was before them.

Lablache's great triumph is the opera buffa.

No actor has ever been so natural in his by-play, or more comic and diverting in his text illustrations. Few things are more amusing than to see this Rhodian Colossus caper and flit about the stage with the elasticity of a sylph; we expect every moment to see him prostrate; but, at the instant that a lapse seems inevitable, he is off again like a butterfly—Mi vedrai far fallone amoroso.

Thus, great alike in tragedy and comedy, unrivalled in the most opposite characters, a theorist of unexampled intelligence, Lablache combines the qualities of a perfect artist. To these we must add extensive literary knowledge, a keen wit, and an elevation of character that ensures the esteem and love of all who know him.

Mendelssohn's "Christus."

BY G. A. MACFARREN.

* * * * What is published of this Oratorio, we may suppose all that is written, consists of two somewhat extensive fragments—the first intended to form a portion of the first part, which was to embody the Birth of Christ, the second, which was to have been comprised in the second part, detailing the Sorrows of Christ. As in his other Oratorios, the text is selected from different parts of the Bible, with the exception of two corales or hymns, the words of which as well as the tunes are, I believe, attributed to Luther.

The first fragment opens with a Recitative for soprano, "When Jesus our Lord was born in Bethlehem." This calls for little remark. It is simple, and thus impressive, relating that the wise men came from the East to worship the new-born infant.

The Recitative introduces a Trio of the Wise Men, "Say, where is he?" for tenor and two basses. This is a most charming piece of vocal harmony, simply accompanied by viola and two violoncellos, with a constantly moving part for double bass pizzicato. The earnest, calm, and purely devotional character of this concise and most melodious movement is beautifully conceived and perfectly carried out. The stilly tone of the instrumentation is admirably in keeping with the feeling of the situation, and the point at the conclusion for the voices alone, stands out with charming prominence.

Next follows a Chorus of considerable length and importance, "There shall a star from Jacob come forth." This is chiefly characterized by the undulating accompaniment in triplets of quavers, the continuance of which throughout the various modifications of expression which the Chorus embodies, gives a reposeful feeling to the whole that is eminently in keeping with the divine message that the passages from the Old Testament comprised in the text are supposed to convey. The lovely melodic phrase, first given by the female voices, with which the prophetic announcement of the star from Jacob, the sceptre from Israel, is delivered, is most beautifully developed in the successive entry of the several parts, and admirably prolonged until the first full close in the fifth of the original key. Thus far is the divine message fraught with peaceful tidings; but a tone of terrible denunciation is assumed at the words, "that will dash in pieces princes and nations," which are declaimed with great power in a passage that includes some most vigorous modulations; the opening melody with the same words as before, but assuming now a new expression by means of its different treatment, being interspersed between the phrases of this episodical subject, while the original figure of accompaniment, being still unbroken, gives unity to the whole. The return to the key of E flat major, and the resumption of the first feeling of the chorus, is brought about with most exquisite effect, to which the previous prolonged harmonies, the anticipation of the opening phrase by the low notes of the tenor voices, the sustained notes of the accompanying voice, and more than all, the gentle brightness of the introduction of the major key upon a first inversion of the tonic harmony, chiefly tend. The beautiful development that now takes place of the principal subject, evinces the congeniality of the skill with the imagination of the composer, and the lengthened notes of the first full close in the original key of the movement, are like the appropriate rounding of a powerful period in language, and have an earnestness of expression that is eminently solemn and impressive. Here is introduced with singularly good effect a Corale, "As bright the star of morning gleams." What is preëminently admirable in the present example of our composer's very favorite practice of appropriating the ancient Lutheran tunes is, first, the particular beauty arising from the unusual variety in the Corale itself, and the admirable coloring given to it by the most felicitous harmony of Mendelssohn, as prominent points of which may be cited the unexpected close upon the dominant harmony instead of a modulation into the key of B flat major, at the end of the second strain, the long notes to the line, "Thy word, Jesus," and the powerful breadth of the concluding strain; and second, the exquisite manner in which it is made to grow out of the cadence of the Chorus, and in which it is united with the entire movement, by being interspersed with fragments of the figure of accompaniment that has been till now unbrokeably sustained, through which it bursts like sunbeams through a silver mist that has been filled, while yet undispersed, with their radiance. As in all cases of the employment of these Lutheran tunes incidentally in extensive compositions, in the present instance a very great part of the designed effect must be lost upon an English audience, who are unacquainted with the tunes; but let us suppose a public accustomed to hear, nay, accustomed to sing, these Corales as a portion of divine service at least once a week, to whom they have thus become from infancy familiar as the Lord's prayer or their parent's benediction, and we may imagine what impression must be made upon them by the pertinent introduction of a tune that has been their lifelong subject of household reverence. * * *

Thus ends the first fragment, the character of which throughout is of gentleness, and peace, and love. * * *

The other fragment, from the second part of the Oratorio, opens with a most powerfully dramatic scene, comprising several alternations of Recitative for a tenor solo with continuous movement for the chorus. It presents the trial and condemnation of Christ, and the text is taken from the gospels of St. Luke and St. John. To the solo voice is assigned the narration, including the words of Pilate; to the chorus, the vociferations of the turbulent and exasperated multitude. First, we have the accusation: he perverts the people, forbids the payment of the tribute to Cæsar, declares he is Christ, the King. This is declaimed with a wild tone of savage derision; the responses of the chorus of female and of male voices, with the ironical emphasis of the first word in the passages, "He is Christ!" and the contemptuous scorn conveyed in the subsequent rendering of the same words by all the voices in unison, concluding with the piercing cry of execration on the last words, "ein König!" indeed fulfil this description. The narrative is continued in the Recitative, how Pilate said he found no fault with Him. Another still short, though somewhat more extensive, movement for the chorus embodies the cry of the people. He stirreth up the Jews by teaching them in every place. The employment to a very small extent of the fugal form of subject and answer has here a most tumultuous and very dramatic effect, and the few bars of unison at the close are rendered immensely impressive by the previous dispersion of the voices. There is an exquisitely beautiful transition at the opening of the following brief Recitative, in which Pilate again declares that he finds no fault in Him, and that he will therefore chastise Him, and let Him go. Then follows a spirited Allegro, in which the people furiously vociferate: "Away with Him, and give us Barabbas!" repeating again and again the name of him whose franchisement they demand, in a manner that most vividly presents the vehemence of a popular excitement. The narrative continues to relate how Pilate expostulated with the multitude, for he was willing to release Him. Then follows a short movement, in which they exclaim, "Crucify Him!"

which is eminently interesting from its similitude in character to the scene of the stoning of Stephen in St. Paul, and to that of Jezebel exciting the people in Elijah, seeming to indicate that Mendelssohn had some particular image in his mind of the thirst for vengeance in a bigoted people against the representative of purity, the true agent of Heaven, and, as he repeats the very notes of the chorus in St. Paul later in the Oratorio when he describes another uprising against Paul and Barnabas, so he repeats the same idea in Elijah, and again in Christ, when the mob and the Divine Personage of his story are placed in the same relationship with each other. The present short Chorus might, I cannot but surmise, have been different, perhaps better, if that in St. Paul had not existed, for there appears to be a somewhat forced, and not quite natural accentuation of the word "crucify," which suggests the idea that in this place he wished to avoid identity, though he could not forego similitude with the other. This Chorus of "Crucify Him!" is the most important portion of the scene in which it stands, important as regards length and construction, and it is certainly the most prominent as regards effect.

The Recitative goes on to relate how Pilate said to the people, "Take ye Him, then, and crucify Him, for I can find no fault in Him." Then follows another choral movement of a somewhat more grave and less vehement character than either of the preceding, "We have a sacred law; according to that law he shall perish!" wherein the words must come out with great clearness if properly enunciated, for the voices, which enter successively after the fugal form, are accompanied with the sustained harmony of the string instruments only, which leaves them free for the articulation of the syllables as a solo voice in recitative. The chief subject is briefly but finely worked, and the whole has a broad and energetic effect. This very grand scene, in which the skill of the all-accomplished artist most nobly develops the imaginings of the highest genius, concludes with a Recitative that relates how Pilate delivered their victim to the people, who bore Him away, followed by a multitude of men and women bewailing and lamenting for Him. There exist few examples of the appropriation of the artifices of counterpoint to what may be called dramatic purposes, that are so free from the effect of pedantry, and therefore so natural, so entirely true to the action of the scene, as those to which allusion has been made in the above description; one feels not that the scholastic contrivances of the fugue are brought into play, but that the assembled, violently-excited multitude echo from side to side, wholly without order, their mutual feelings of hatred and vengeance; and thus it is that in hiding the means of art the end is only fully accomplished. The instrumentation throughout is most powerful; the forcible treatment of the brass instruments, with the frequent employment of the whole of the string instruments in unison, has prodigious vigor, and the almost constant use of the oboes and clarionets, all upon the same notes, produces that quality of tone which only can compete with such a distribution of the rest of the orchestra.

The next piece is a Chorus of most touching pathos and exquisite loveliness: "Daughters of Zion, weep for yourselves and for your children." Language would fail in the attempt to describe the refined beauty of this, the most captivating, if not positively the most admirable portion of the publication. It needs, however, no description in words, for it must become very generally known, and then its merits will manifest themselves to all classes of hearers. There are so many examples of Mendelssohn's pre-eminent success in the truthfulness of plaintive expression, that one may easily suggest to the reader an idea of the feeling of the present exquisite movement by reference to any of these, such as the introduction of the Symphony in A minor, the Chorus in G minor, interspersed with the speeches of the heroine, in Antigone, the contralto air in E minor in Elijah; but while it is so much like these as to identify it with the style of the author, it is unlike them all as each of them is unlike the others, and, containing all that can be of beauty, it is indeed an epitome of the style it embodies. For special points of interest may be cited, first and chief, the opening melody; the very striking transition, and indeed the whole of the episodic matter at the words: "For surely the days are coming when ye shall exclaim unto the mountains, fall down on us!" the declamation of these last words being specially striking; continuous of this is the diminuendo leading back to the original key of G minor, on the words, "Hide us! hide us!" Then, the re-entry of the principal melody, assigned now to the male voices with a response for the sopranos built upon it; then, an inexpressibly beautiful phrase for the soprano voices only, with the limited accompaniment of the two violins pizzicato; then, the assignment of the same phrase to the basses, with successive imitations of the other vocal parts; and, not the least, the repetition of the last vocal phrase, by wind instruments, for the concluding Symphony, presenting the echo of one's own thought, or that sense subtler than thought, which clothes not itself in words, and, filling our own being, is incommunicable to others save by sympathy alone. The pizzicato accompaniment of quavers in arpeggio that is continued, excepting during the episode, in which as the lament of the weeping daughters of Zion is presented in their own words, a more personal, and therefore more impassioned character is assumed in the music than elsewhere throughout the movement. This pizzicato accompaniment has a particularly picturesque effect, and its gradual resumption after the break just named as the only exception to its continuance, leads back most charmingly to the feeling of the principal subject. The recurrence to this is brought about with a felicity peculiar to Mendelssohn by the anticipation of the accent of the opening phrase by the female voices in thirds, with the accompaniment in the unison and octave of oboes and flute only. The combination of oboes and clarionets in unison, which is most forcible in conjunction with the brass instruments, as in the previous piece, is employed also a great deal in the present Chorus, and, I should think, too freely; for without the counterbalance of trombones and trumpets, the tone produced by this combination is nasal, and little in keeping with the gentle plaintiveness that for the most part prevails throughout the movement.

The last piece brought before us is a Corale, "He leaves his heavenly portals," of which I cannot have the pleasure to speak with the enthusiasm that, up to this point, has gone hand-in-hand with my judgement. The tune itself, is more or less like most of the others of its class, moving up and down almost unexceptionably in crotchets, and depending, beyond the associations that those who are familiar with it in divine service must connect with it, wholly upon its treatment by the musician for its effect upon an audience, and the treatment Mendelssohn has given to it is open to considerable question. His harmony is such a mixture of the diatonic and chromatic schools as produces a most unsatisfactory effect, and it involves so many changes of key within so few bars as to leave at the end but a vague impression of what is the real tonic of the movement. Mendelssohn might, or he might not, have retained this piece as it at present stands, had he completed the Oratorio. As we see it, it affords the negative encouragement to aspiring minds that wrestle with theory, and, emulating the highest, fail to attain that beauty which they feel but cannot express—namely, that even Mendelssohn was not immaculate.

Thus much of the intended masterwork of the author of Elijah is all that the world can know of Mendelssohn's great design in the oratorio of Christ. Most highly interesting it is, and, in many places, preëminently beautiful; but, I am disposed to think, from the evidence of the other works of our composer, and from the knowledge we have of his course of thought and habit of composition, that the greatest parts, those upon which were to rest the importance as a work of art, and as an illustration of the grandest subject, of the unfinished Oratorio were uncommenced when death closed the already brilliant and still more brightly promising career of Mendelssohn.

St. Cecilia.

The Tribune has very pleasant letters from Rome, signed "Au Revoir," describing the ceremonies of Carnival and Lent. From one of them, dated Feb. 14, 1856, we take the following interesting account of the patron saint of Music, and the devotion still paid to her shrine.

Rome still fosters a long train of devotees for whom fate or faith reserves the sacrifice of a worldly life. Her convents are counted by hundreds, and the stars of the calendar are their patrons, among whom St. Cecilia is most illustrious. She was a Roman lady of high rank and great culture, who, in the early days of the new religion, espoused Christianity and Valerian. She crowned her husband's conversion, and they bore together their martyr palms to heaven. Her beauty, accomplishments and triumphant faith have won her the worship of women, and the noblest inspirations of men owe their origin to this sainted patron of music and painting. Raphael represented her listening to angelic choirs, her own harp and lyre forgotten at her feet. She is among saints on the earth, but the others hear not the heavenly melody. Domenichino, who paints the seen better than the unseen, leaves the martyr in her palace, lying on the steps of her rich bath-room, where she suffered her first tortures. There is no murderer seen in this picture, as in the same master's martyrdom of St. Agnes, but blood flows from a wound, and a woman, kneeling, admiring, adoring, more than deploring, gathers it up with a napkin and puts it in a vase. Another, astonished, pitying, shuddering, stands back, and beside her a man, more manly, but moved, shows a boy blanched with fear how one should die for the faith. On the other side a girl kneels and watches, and a mother forgets her infant, who strains away from her grasp, startled, for he, with the saint, looks up, and they only see the angel in the air with the palm and crown. This sympathy of babes with saints and angels, and faith in the prevailing power of youth and innocence, are often illustrated by these two artists; as in the Burning of the Borgo, where Raphael makes a mother bid her child kneel to invoke a cessation of the flames. One master is second only to the other in power, and both excel all others in their just, delicate and varied renderings of the subtle poetry of the passions, and seem in particular to have excelled themselves in their ideas of the beautiful singing saint and sufferer. From them we foster acquaintance and familiarity with the woman, the Christian, the virgin-wife and martyr. And so with double interest we approached the spot where she lived and died. The Roman palace is become a church, and its bell-tower rises over the room of the death scene. Its bells announce the present solemnity. The mantle of the martyr is falling on one of her followers. Friends are gathering, music is preparing, nuns are praying, a mother weeps, a father rather rages, a brother trembles, a daughter and sister is sighing and resolving and adorning herself for the sacrifice. A new disciple of the patron saint is coming to consummate her vows, in consecrating her virgin life to the cloister.

We entered a court to approach the Church of St. Cecilia. Cardinal carriages, caparisoned with crimson and gold, attended by three footmen, each in rich liveries, and coachmen in costumes of suitable magnificence, stood on the side next to the convent. Other noble equipages encircled the court, and the Swiss and Papal Guards stood about the doors. The interior of the church is simple, in white and gold, with a painted ceiling. The altar gleamed with light and gilded ornaments, and is made of the richest marbles, inlaid with precious stones. A space before it was carpeted and reserved open for the ceremony. On each side of this aisle rows of chairs were placed, the first for friends, the others for strangers and spectators. Priests, in short black breeches, and long black stockings, and floating black gowns of silk, seated the ladies, while striped guards of the Pope, with long-handled, lanced toman-hawks, stood in reserve to prevent indiscreet seizures of seats. All the Catholics knelt a long time after entering the church, or turned to the side chapel where mass was performing. At length their prayers were ended, and white-gloved elegance on the front seats seemed impatient for the commencement of the ceremony. Then a Cardinal appeared in canonicals, followed by numerous attendants and servants, and proceeded up the reserved aisle. His face was meek, his eyes fixed, and palm was placed to palm as children are taught to pray, till he waved the right hand slowly in signs of the cross and blessed the people. All bowed or knelt and crossed themselves as he passed. After kneeling and praying, the Cardinal seated himself on a gilded stool before the altar; then divers men completed his toilet as maids would do for a queen—he rapt in devotion, while they wrapped him in scarfs and capes and stoles. Presently a command of order and silence darkened his face; then an illumination succeeded, which announced the entrance of the bride of the spiritual spouse. She was dressed as brides of men are wont to be, and attended by a princess to give her away, whom some called Barberini, and some by another name as illustrious. Behind them followed small winged things, supporting the long white satin train of the novice. They were two tiny girls with crowns of roses around their heads, below which light sunny curls fell over their shoulders. They wore frocks of tulle—one pink and one blue—with starry spangles on their short, frilled skirts. Plumed wings of rainbow hues hung in repose on their little backs.

With the precision of pages, and the naïveté of angels and babies, they bore their silken burdens up the nave. On approaching the Cardinal the maiden knelt and kissed his hand, and then with the angels and princess she was seated. A sermon followed, during which time some stared, some wondered, some wept. The girl was young, just eighteen, with proportions widely at variance with those of the graces. She wore a coronet of brilliants, with marabouts and flowers attaching her veil of white lace. Her neck and arms were properly covered, though the rest of her toilette, with the exception of its shabby gentility, was similar to that prescribed at foreign courts. Broad lace partly mounted her skirt, and its train aped likewise magnificence ineffectually. The accompanying princess wore a lavender silk with a high lace bertha; her head sparkled too with diamonds. When the sermon was finished, the princess accompanied her charge to the Cardinal. She knelt, received the crucifix, and then rising, took hold of a part of his mantle, and so, followed by the train-bearing angels, left the church to enter the convent. A few lady friends followed them. Then in a chapel at the right of the high altar of the church, and behind a close grating, the rest of the ceremony was performed. The nuns in their white cashmere robes, some with and others without black veils, came down to receive the new sister who had just espoused the Lamb. The Cardinal in his mitre stood without the grating, and an intoned service began.

Then the novice was dismantled of her bridal attire; her crown, and feathers, and flowers, gloves, bracelets, and jewels, one by one were laid off. The draping folds of eternal chastity closed around her; vows were consummating; her long black hair hung over the white mantle, then disappeared; one by one, cap and cape of the chaste costume covered her; then the Cardinal saluted her by her new name. "Maria Sforza" was become "Maria Colomba of the precious blood of Jesus." Her brother stood by me at the moment; he had been relating to a companion the history of his sister's determination to take the veil. I had melted with his emotions. When the new name was pronounced, he grew suddenly pale, as if petrified in despair. It was finished. Never again could he behold his sister, but separated from her by the bars of the convent. It was like standing on the brink of the sepulchre of a beloved friend, with the agony of a moment prolonged to years. The father, it appears, had opposed the consecration and withheld his presence from the ceremony. The mother was near by, overflowing with tears. The girl from infancy had declared her desire to be a nun; recent oppositions to her will had induced illness, till its restraint was abandoned.

Music followed the consecration. The nuns behind the grating held long tapers, which lighted strangely their calm faces and white robes. A heavy, brilliant diadem was placed on the head of the newly initiated. The choir was of men, who stood by the high altar of the church. One voice, sweet as St. Cecilia's, long-toned, pure and melodious, at first concealed its origin from my ears. There was no woman in the choir and no boys to be seen; but at length I found the rare tones came from a tall, priestly-clad person; was the boy overgrown, or the man a woman? I could not tell. But the chants were noble, the occasion eloquent. The patron was propitious—inspiration hung over the altar—the image of the saint lay beneath it. It is a beautiful reclining marble statue, modeled in the sixteenth century from a drawing taken from the body of the Saint as found miraculously preserved in the bier brought from the catacombs. The Saint is represented lying on the right side, the head turned backward, and the face, hidden, resting toward the earth. The arms are distended together, and the lower limbs lie gracefully bent. She is wonderfully well poised, whether by miracle of the martyr or artist. A large diamond, gift of some devotee, gleams on her marble finger. Back of the statue is an alabaster sarcophagus, containing the remains of St. Cecilia, in a silver box of great weight. The front of the altar is decorated with agates, lapis lazuli, and other precious stones. Immense wealth is lavished on these shrines of Saints. There is the same idolatry in this as in us for the love we bear the relics of departed friends, except ours is the more selfish, as it comes from memory rather than tradition.

At the left, on leaving the Church, are still shown the baths of St. Cecilia. There the young Christian was first arrested and plunged in boiling water, after which she received the wounds of her persecutors. The ancient heating apparatus of the baths is still seen through an opening of the present pavement. All the walls are now encrusted with marbles, except at the pipes which conveyed water or steam to the room. A door at the right of the court opens into a part of the Convent, where friends and invited guests entered to bid adieu to the new nun, who, I suppose, with the other sisters, stood behind an unveiled grating. Here refreshments of coffee, cakes and creams were profusely dispensed, of which the Cardinal and his attendant ecclesiastics partook with the others. The company seemed merry as on a festive occasion. One had died to the world, but they believed her born to glory. Sonnets were distributed, exalting the beatitude of the new "Maria of the precious blood of Jesus." Finally, the feasting finished, people and equipages departed, the Convent closed, the Church grew still. We returned to the high altar; men were arranging it, and the sisters occasionally raised the curtain of the grating to give them directions. Over the side naves are closed galleries with windows closely crossed by gilded bars. There the nuns come to hear public service in the Church, and during the ceremonies of the day we had distinguished their white forms moving and resting behind them. Opposite the high altar and over the grand entrance is another gallery entirely grated for the organ and singers, and I am told that here the music of the nuns is sometimes extremely fine.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAR. 22, 1856.

NEW VOLUME.—Subscriptions are now in order for a new year of the Journal of Music. With the number for Saturday, April 5, it will enter upon its fifth year, and ninth volume. With that number we shall commence the publication of a translation, made expressly for this journal, of a beautiful Art novel by Mme. GEORGE SAND, in which the characters are musical, and which has never yet appeared in English. It will make pleasant reading for the summer months.

Our readers generally, as well as our agents, are earnestly requested, as they wish this Journal not only to continue its existence, but to improve in character and variety of matter, to exert themselves a little now to send us in the names of new subscribers.

TERMS, as heretofore, by mail, $2 per annum; by carrier, $2.50, payable in advance. This condition of prepayment will hereafter, especially in the case of out-of-town subscribers, be more strictly enforced. The really serious losses which have been the reward of our indulgence hitherto, compel us to this measure.

All who do not expressly notify us of their wish to stop the Journal at the expiration of their term, will still continue to receive it, and be counted as subscribers for another year.

NO SUBSCRIPTION RECEIVED FOR A SHORTER PERIOD THAN SIX MONTHS; AND NONE FOR LESS THAN A YEAR, UNLESS PAID IN ADVANCE.

TO DELINQUENT SUBSCRIBERS AND ADVERTISERS.

We are sorry to address a numerous company. A large proportion of the just earnings of our Journal for the past two years or more is still withheld from us. Hundreds of dollars are due to us for unpaid advertisements and subscriptions. We have a long list of doubtful names, to whom the paper has been sent for months and years, yet who answer no bills; these names we must cut off, unless they prove themselves good names at once.

We have enclosed bills to a large number of subscribers who have not yet paid for the year now closing, and beg that they will promptly remit by mail or otherwise.

Mendelssohn's Four-Part Songs.

The publication of an American edition of these admirable works, complete in one volume, deserves more than a passing notice. It does honor to our young townsman, Mr. J. C. D. PARKER, who has taken the pains to accompany the German words with a careful English version, which is singable and true to the sense and spirit of the original wherever that is possible under the conditions of strict preservation of form and rhythm. It does honor to the enterprising publisher, Mr. DITSON; and it will be an honor to the music-loving sons and daughters of America if they will give it a tithe of the attention which they have paid to "Negro Minstrelsy," "Old Folks' Concerts," and the endless "native" multiplication of sentimental or burlesque trash which floods the land in the shape of "original" songs and glees.

The Four-part Song, which is so common among the Germans, especially as sung by men's voices in the musical festivals and unions of the Männerchöre, Liederkränze, &c., is something essentially different from the Quartet, although it may be sung by one voice only on each part. In the Quartet, each of the four parts represents a distinct dramatic individual; it is strictly a concerted piece. The Four-part Song is simply the harmonized utterance of an individual subjective feeling; it is literally a song in four parts. It is commonly sung in clubs or circles or large choirs with many voices on a part; and yet it differs from a Chorus; for a chorus is the collective utterance of a common sentiment animating a mass; in the chorus the mass, the people, as such, become actors in the history. Here on the contrary we have but a song, an individual experience or feeling, but with the musical expression completing itself in the harmony of other voices, instead of projecting itself upon the background of an instrumental accompaniment. The four-part song has more points in common with the English Glee, perhaps, than with any short form of vocal harmony.

The most perfect types of the class are these forty and more four-part songs of MENDELSSOHN. Fifteen of the number are for male voices only, (first and second tenor, first and second bass); all the others are for the usual quartet of male and female voices. The subjects are mostly found in little poems expressive of the love of nature, the sad or glad experiences and aspirations of the heart; fresh and genuine little lyrics, sometimes by great poets, such as GOETHE, sometimes quaint old snatches of popular minstrelsy, with a flavor of nationality about them. The music is sympathetically true to the spirit of the words in every case; while each song is a product of the most refined and perfect art, it has still the charm, the breezy perfume of any natural wild-flower of melody. They show the point where Art and Nature meet. How truly the emotions awakened by the return of Spring find utterance in the three little pieces marked to be sung in connection, called "Passage of Spring," "The Primrose," and "Festival of Spring"!

O balmy Spring perfume!
Soon will the violets bloom, &c.

Lovely, golden day of Spring!
Souls with rapture filling!

Why to toil in this glad hour
Should a thought be given?
Spring-time is a solemn feast,
Give it then to Heaven.

Indeed there is so much of Spring and the woods and the birds in these little songs, that we wish we could sing them all to our readers as an appropriate Spring greeting; they become the present season as Christmas and New Year's gifts do the last week in December; for, as Shakespeare says:

Why, now comes in the sweet o' the year,
And the red blood reigns in the winter's pale.

Not less characteristic and tenderly true has the composer been to the sadder and graver themes and moods, to Autumn and parting and the thoughts of death. One of the most beautiful is that solemn and tranquil Adagio, entitled "Resting Place", or more literally "Vale of Rest."

When I see at set of sun
Golden cloud-hills rising o'er me,
Fain the thought would come before me,
Tears mine eyelids swelling:
Shall that be my dwelling
When this weary life is done?

In extremest contrast with this, wonderfully wild and stirring, setting the blood tingling in every vein and filling the imagination with a sense of everything in motion and of echoing remoteness, is the "Hunting Song" which follows. It is in B minor, and the strains commence pianissimo and seem rapidly approaching till they reach ff and then recede and die away in the distance:

Ever onward and onward the loud huzza
Thro' forest and woodland is heard from afar!

The songs for male voices only are naturally such as grew out of occasions created by the musical, social and patriotic meetings of the singing clubs, Männerchöre. Some as before are songs of Nature and sentiment, but most of them are convivial songs, students' songs, songs of union, friendship, country, &c. There is one which surely should become popular among us; it is called

THE SONG OF THE BRAVE MAN.

Counsel fair and words they gave me,
Crown'd with honors they fain would have me,
Told me fame was a fickle thing,
Said they would take me under their wing.
Chorus. Told me fame, &c.

But with all their protestation,
Soon I had died from pure starvation,
Had there not come a jolly friend,
Boldly my fortunes to defend.
Chorus. Had there not come, &c.

Jolly friend! from want did he save me,
I'll ne'er forget the help that he gave me;
Shame that I cannot a greeting send,
For I myself am this jolly friend.

For "jolly friend" the German has braver Mann; but the translation is true to the spirit, and in most lines to the letter. Every verse is sung by a single bass voice, and then the last two lines are repeated in chorus.

It would be pleasant to quote all day from this rich Buch der Lieder, to cull out flower after flower to examine it and inhale its sweetness singly, but we should need to quote notes as well as words, and we have not the room. We can only hope that the rare gift will be widely appreciated; that we shall soon hear these four-part songs of Mendelssohn in glee-clubs, in home circles, serenades and concerts, wherever the fresh voices meet to gratify a pure love of excitement and to cultivate the heaven-born sense of beauty through the medium of song. Let them supplant the empty, common-place, inferior manufactured melodies in which what gift of music we as a people now have runs to waste. And let them provoke to severe, conscientious practice, aiming at an artistic perfection in the rendering, which shall be worthy of such true works of Art. These very songs, generally known and sung among us, would do incalculably much to develop a pure and genuine taste for music in our people; just as the multiplication of such busts as the "Clyte" cultivates the popular sense of beauty through the eye.

The book is beautifully printed, in a large octavo form of 150 pages. It would be perfect but for one objection which occurs (only occasionally to be sure) where a song has many verses. To save printing the music over and over, the words are sometimes so piled upon the lines that in singing at sight one may easily get bewildered. So much we sacrifice in these days of ours to cheapness!

Concerts of the Week.

The season is near an end, and we have little to report.

Mrs. ROSA GARCIA DE RIBAS had a successful concert in the Tremont Temple last Saturday evening. If one of the largest audiences of the season was any evidence, the lady and her husband have lost nothing of the esteem in which they have long been held in our musical community. Both were warmly received, and warmly applauded in their several performances. Mrs. De Ribas displayed a great deal of execution in singing the "Ricci Waltz" and the beautiful Rossini duet: Amor possente, with Mr. ARTHURSON. Mr. De Ribas's obœ sang Ernst's Elegie very sweetly and expressively. Mr. ARTHURSON sang with his usual good taste and feeling. Mr. SATTER gave a striking display of "prodigious" pianism in an original fantasia on themes from Ernani and Il Trovatore, not omitting the anvils. Loudly recalled, he gave the march from the Prophète. He used a powerful Hallet & Davis Grand. The orchestra was large and excellent, essentially the same as in the Orchestral Concerts, and under Mr. ZERBAHN's direction played the overture to Semiramide delightfully. All this was in the first part. We were unable to remain through the second, and were sorry to lose some good things, especially the violin-playing of our old friend KEYSER, who, we are told, showed the fire of youth, and played beautifully in the duet by Herz and Lafonte.

THE AMATEUR ORCHESTRA.—For many years there has existed in this city a club of amateurs, who have met for the practice of orchestral music. On Wednesday evening they invited some of their friends to Chickering's to listen to the following nice little programme:

- PART I.
1. Grand Sinfonie, No. 10, in D major,.....Mozart.
Allegro—Andante—Minuetto and Trio—Finale, Presto
2. Overture in F major, Op. 44,.....F. Kalliwoda.
PART II.
3. Overture: "Le Nozze de Figaro,".....Mozart.
4. Cavatina: "La Favorita,".....Donizetti.
5. Piano-Forte Concerto, No. 16, C major,.....Mozart.
Allegro maestoso—Andante—Allegretto.
6. Overture: "Cenerentola,".....Rossini.

We certainly were surprised to hear a Mozart symphony (and a beautiful one it was, seldom if ever given in our concerts,) sound so much like a symphony, when played by merely amateurs. Some of the instruments were really well played. Still better was the melodious and graceful overture by Kalliwoda. There was at least an earnestness and heartiness in the performance which was quite refreshing. The band consisted of some twenty or more members, mostly young men, but with a number of veterans, who worked at double bass, bassoons, &c. We were sorry our engagements would not let us hear the second part, especially the Concerto, which we understand was played by an amateur young lady of Charlestown, who is an accomplished pianist.

We have no right to give names; nor did we go to criticize. But such a thing deserves mention as a good example. It is good to try one's own hand at orchestral performance, if only as teaching one the better to understand the symphonies, &c., when he hears them played by real orchestras. Much true love and knowledge of music must grow out of such experiments; and it is pleasant to see how old men and young men meet thus on a common ground, as it were, of undying youth in Art.

Mr. GUSTAV SATTER, the pianist, commenced on Thursday a series of Piano Concerts, varied with string quartets and vocal pieces, at the piano saloon of Messrs. Hallet & Davis. Further particulars have not reached us.

New Music.

Our three leading Boston music-publishers still rival each other in the multitude and external beauty of their publications; and what is better, each, besides the ever-springing crop of merely popular, ephemeral things, seems anxious also to identify his name with the best list of works that have an enduring value. Our table groans under the heaps of songs, piano pieces, exercises, instruction books, &c., which have come from these several mills within a few weeks. To be sure, the bulk might be reduced a good deal without much loss of weight; yet there is good wheat as well as chaff. A mere list will show how the case stands. To begin with the youngest, but not least enterprising of the three:

NATHAN RICHARDSON still turns out new editions (or thousands) of his very popular "Modern School for the Piano," which seems to have taken its place as a standard work. He has also recently issued a smaller instruction book, intended as preparatory to that, and fingered upon the same principle, called the "First Book for the Piano-Forte," by A. Le Carpentier, Professor of Music in the Conservatoire at Paris. It is expressly for beginners, and is extensively used in Europe. Mr. R. is also the publisher of the excellent little "Manual of Harmony," by J. C. D. PARKER, which we have before noticed. He has lately issued:

"Twelve Sonatas for the Piano," by MUZIO CLEMENTI. The Sonatas of Clementi form an important link in the history of piano music; they belong to the classics of the instrument, and should be in the hands of every accomplished player, while they are excellent lessons for the student. They belong to the old and not the modern virtuoso school of pianists, nor have they the difficulties nor the wealth of thought, the inspiration, of sonatas like Beethoven's. Yet they are elegant in style, and truly interesting and useful, if not wholly up to the demands of our day, or so satisfying as the works of grander genius in the same form. The four already issued are by no means difficult. We welcome them as helping materially to complete our library of sonata music. Mr. Ditson has reprinted for us all the sonatas of Beethoven; Mr. Reed the best of those of Haydn; Mr. Wade those of Mozart; and now a fourth Boston publisher adds Clementi to the list.

GEO. P. REED & Co. send us:

1. ROSSINI's "Soirées Musicales," eight of the twelve numbers being now completed. No. 7, the Barcarole, La Gita in Gondola, is one of the most beautiful of the whole, and reminds one of the admirable music in the first part of "William Tell." No. 8 is the famous Neapolitan Tarantella, Gia la luna, which Sig. Belletti used to sing with so much effect in Jenny Lind's concerts. Words Italian and English, happily rendered by C. J. SPRAGUE. We know of no more desirable collection of Italian songs.

2. "Italy," a collection of pieces for three female voices, from the best composers, including the masked Trio from Don Giovanni; the chorus: Sereni e vaghi, from Semiramide; a similar chorus from La Favorita; the song: Son vergin vezzosa (harmonized); a prayer by Curschmann; Rossini's beautiful "Charity;" Trio and Chorus of Vespals from Spontini's La Vestale, &c. For young ladies, who have cultivated the art of singing to a somewhat artistic point, and who want good things to sing together either in trio or chorus, here is something very serviceable.

3. "Beauties of MOZART and BEETHOVEN in form of Petites Fantaisies for young pianists," by TH. OESTEN. Themes are culled from the operas and the instrumental chamber music of these masters, and served up in simple arrangements, making agreeable pieces in several short movements. No. 1 is from the Septuor of Beethoven, and presents the leading ideas of the first Allegro, the Adagio and the Scherzo of that famous work. There is at least a guaranty that the pieces will have thoughts in them; and while they exercise the fingers and please the mind, they may also excite a desire to know these fine works in their original complete forms.

4. "Songs of Italy." The title page bears a long list of over ninety airs, cavatinas, Romanzas, duets, trios, &c., from all the favorite operas. Some of these "Songs of Italy," however, are of German origin, as those from Freyschütz and Don Juan, and the exquisite one now before us from GLUCK's "Orfeo:" Che farà senza Euridice, which has been the delight of generations of music-lovers, and which was recently revived here in our concerts by Miss Phillippa. Three others, already issued, are by MERCADANTE; viz, Spento ancor and Son giovin giuliva, from "Leonora," and A te mio suolo, from "Il Bravo."

5. "Prayer and Barcarole from MEYERBEER's L'Etoile du Nord." French and English words, the latter by J. C. D. PARKER. For soprano voice; by no means easy to sing well. The Barcarole is a florid bravura piece, of much grace and beauty.

6. "Fifty Studies in a brilliant style for the Piano," by C. CZERNY. We have already noticed Nos. 1 and 2 of these exercises in the "art of fingering with facility." Book 3 contains practice in rapid minor scales; extensions with the hand quiet; double octaves; practice of the Trill, and several other points. The name of Czerny is warrant enough for anything in the pedagogic sphere of music. Each of the six books contains about 23 pages, price $1.00.

7. "Robert of Lincoln." BRYANT's beautiful words set to music, by J. OSGOOD. The Bobolink never was guilty of so commonplace a song.

8. Songs of "Ossian's Bards," composed by OSSIAN E. DODGE. "We are growing old, Kate," "Bard's Greeting," (song and chorus,) &c., &c.

9. "Vestvali Polka," by A. BAUMBACH. "Lucie Polka," by F. F. HOELCKER. "Forest Hill Polka," by J. W. BLANDIN.

10. Piano Arrangements from Operas. (a) "Prayer from L'Etoile du Nord," by A. BAUMBACH. (b) "Selections from Il Trovatore," by H. CRAMER, a potpourri of 9 pages.

11. "Every Land my Home," ballad, by N. J. SPORLE.

12. "Tone Blossoms," by F. SPINDLER. Six characteristic little pieces of three or four pages each, of medium difficulty, for the piano; quite pretty. They are called "Alpine Rose," "Lily," "Nosegay of Violets," &c.

13. "Home," by A. BAUMBACH, a somewhat elaborate transcription for the piano of Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS's little ballad: "The dearest spot on earth is home."

14. "The Groves of Blarney," that old comic song, words by TYRONE POWER.

OLIVER DITSON has at length completed the twelve numbers of THALBERG's "L'Art du Chant appliqué au Piano." An excellent work, as we have before said, to turn the thoughts of the pianist towards expression in the rendering of the melody or air. The subjects treated are such as Beethoven's Adelaide, Stradella's "Prayer," Mozart's Lacrymosa and Il mio tesoro, the duet from Freyschütz, the quartet: A te o cara, from I Puritani, &c., &c. The whole are bound up in an elegant large quarto volume, price $3.00. Mr. Ditson has also issued:

"Robert le Diable (MEYERBEER), Grande Fantaisie Orchestrale," for Piano, by GUSTAV SATTER, pp. 21. Of course a difficult and brilliant concert piece.

"Six Morceaux de Concert," by G. SATTER. Short pieces of half a dozen pages each, with these titles: 1. "Impromptu Rondeau;" 2. "Une Nuit dans les Bois;" 3. "Les Clochettes," (the music box); 4. "Ronde et Barcarolle de North-Star;" 5. "Romances d'Amour;" 6. "Yankee Doodle!"

"Favorite Songs, Duets and Trios from MOZART." Italian and German words with new English version. Arranged and adapted by S. S. WESLEY, Mus. Doc. The table of contents on the first page of each number shows a most desirable list of songs. No.

3, now before us, is L'Addio, (the Farewell,) not an operatic song.

"The Harp of Italy," (Lira d'Italia.) A serial collection of the most striking concerted pieces from the favorite operas, with Italian and English words, beautifully engraved. The last two issues are the Septet finale from the first act of Ernani, and the Miscere at the conclusion of Il Trovatore, arranged as a Sextet by H. MILLARD. A useful collection for amateur operatic clubs.

"Twelve Studies Caracteristiques de Concert," for Piano, by ADOLPH HENSELT. No. 11. Dors tu ma vie (Sleep'st thou my life); No. 12. Pleins de soupirs. Beautiful and by no means easy pieces in the graceful and poetic vein of the author of "If I were a bird," which also forms one of the series.

"Forty new lessons in Singing, expressly for Bass or Baritone voice, with piano accompaniment, by J. CONCONNE. In two books, of 80 pages each. Book I. contains 25 lessons. The name of the author is warrant enough for the great excellence of these exercises.

"Sous le Balcon," three Nocturnes for piano, by TH. OESTEN. Op. 84. Published separately; 5 pages each.

Musical Chat-Chat.

AFTERNOON CONCERTS.—We are happy to learn that the demand for tickets to the proposed Wednesday afternoon feasts of orchestral music is quite eager. The Concerts are now positively announced to commence next Wednesday at 3 1-2 P. M. The orchestra, conducted by CARL ZERBAHN, will be the same, numbering about fifty instruments, which earned for itself so good a reputation at the late "Orchestral Concerts." The music will be an agreeable mixture of the popular and the classical. Each time there will be played an entire Symphony and two good overtures, besides arrangements from operas, waltzes, polonaises, &c. The series will commence with the glorious Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, which so many have regretted that they did not hear at the first Orchestral Concert. The very cheap rate of admission (six tickets for a dollar,) and the convenience of the hour for out-of-town music-lovers, who were cut off from the evening concerts, together with the reputation of the orchestra, insure a very large attendance. The signs indicate that the enthusiasm of the old Germania afternoons will be revived.

We are unable to continue this week the translation of Liszt's papers upon ROBERT FRANZ, as the Leipzig paper is not yet received. . . . The masquerade OLD FOLKS' CONCERTS of the "Reading Opera Chorus Class" still draw crowds at the Tremont Temple. This fun is so lucrative that perhaps other "Opera" companies would do well to drop Donizetti and Verdi, and take to singing old-fashioned Yankee psalm tunes.

Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS appears to have made a good impression in the part of Azucena in New York. The Tribune says:

Her voice is a contralto, or rather a mezzo soprano, of excellent quality, round and sympathetic. Her intonation is good; her method Italian, and her readings correct. Her appearance and bearing, too, are much in her favor. Altogether, herself and the good City of Boston may be congratulated on the success which attended her debut here. She was called for to receive the homage of a brilliant house.

Sig. ARDITI's new opera, La Spia, founded on Cooper's novel, "The Spy," is announced at the Academy for next week. . . . There is talk of a new German opera company in New York, to be under the direction of CARL BERGMANN. . . . GOTTSCHALK has reached his tenth Piano-forte Soirée. . . . Mr. T. F. BASSFORD announces four Piano Soirées in Dodworth's hall. . . . A musical journal is soon to be commenced in Philadelphia.

AFTERNOON CONCERTS AT THE BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

A Series of SIX WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS will be given at the Boston Music Hall, commencing March 28th, under the direction of CARL ZERRAHN. The Orchestra will be the same which has given so much satisfaction at the series of Orchestral Concerts just terminated. The selections will be of a character suited to all the various tastes of the community, consisting of Symphonies, Overtures, Arrangements from popular Operas, Waltzes, &c.

The managers pledge themselves to make these Concerts worthy of the liberal support of the community.

Packages of six tickets, to be used at pleasure, $1. Single tickets 25 cts. For sale at the Music Stores and at the door. The Concerts will commence at 3 1/4 o'clock.

MR. R. W. EMERSON, having read Six Lectures, which have not been heard in Boston, will, by request, repeat them on Thursday Evening, 27th inst., and succeeding Thursday Evenings, in the FREEMAN PLACE CHAPEL. Tickets admitting one person to the course, $1.50, Single tickets, 50 cents, for sale at the Bookstore of Ticknor & Fields, and at the door.

NEW COURSE OF HARMONY, BY L. H. SOUTHARD.

The Publishers call the attention of the musical profession to this work, as one eminently calculated to lighten the labors of the teacher, and rapidly advance the pupil. It is emphatically a PRACTICAL work, serving both as a Manual of instruction on the one hand, and a Text-book on the other; and it is believed that the peculiar arrangement of the work, together with the very large number of exercises and examples, presents great advantages, to both scholars and teacher, over any similar work of the kind. Teachers highly commend the work. Mr. WILLIAM MASON says it is a work unsurpassed in the language. Mr. GEORGE J. WYNN says that it is a work perspicuous in diction, methodical in arrangement, and sufficiently copious to embrace all the essentials of the general doctrine of accord. It can be ordered through any respectable Music-seller, and will be sent through the mail on the receipt of the price, ($1.75,) postage prepaid.

The Mission of Mozart.

LEADING CHARACTERISTICS OF HIS GENIUS AND HIS WORKS.

BY A. OULIBICHEFF.

[Concluded.]

When we study Mozart's character on all sides, we seem to see in it not so much the image of an individual, as the type of the generic character, which we ascribe to that class of men whom God has ordained to be poets or artists. An uncommon indifference to the positive; an inexpressible contempt for all worldly prudence, or rather a complete ignoring of its maxims; a careless frankness, knowing no interest in concealing aught; a blind generosity, which did not know the worth of what it gave, nor count the consequences; finally, as the result of all this, an incorrigible tendency to allow himself to be deceived and cheated upon all occasions. These peculiarities, worse than sins in the eyes of a man of the world, although they are often nothing but the pledge of the poetic calling, were found united in the highest degree in Mozart, and for the reason that no one ever was so very much a poet as he was. But we must add one trait, which was peculiar to him alone, and which exceeds even the abstract idea or the ideal which we commonly shape to ourselves of characters like his. In different as poetic natures commonly are to their positive interests, there is yet one of these which occupies them always and in a high degree. Much as they seem to live for the future, we still see them eagerly striving to secure present fame, and this desire has ever been considered one of the noblest attributes of the artistic and poetic nature. Nevertheless, in all professions, and especially in Music, fame or popular applause leads to prosperity; and since prosperity is the consequence of fame, it is probable that the most zealous guests of Olympus would willingly resign themselves to accepting the consequence out of love for the cause. With Mozart it was just the opposite. He would gladly have accepted the consequence, but the cause was repugnant to him; his dislike, however, was not so much of fame among his contemporaries, as it was of the means by which this is acquired; which in the end comes to the same thing, for whoever desires the end must also wish the means. Hofmeister, his publisher, in one of his letters to him wrote: "Write more popular, or I cannot print and pay for anything more of yours." To which Mozart replied: "Well then, I will earn no more, and starve; what the deuce care I?"

We know of one other musician who despised popularity and worked only for the satisfaction of his conscience; but this musician, the great BACH, could, without harm to his interests, defy the fashion. He had a quiet, sure and honorable position, amply sufficient to support himself and his twenty children. Independent of the public in this regard, his labors were in a kind which withdrew them from the competency of ordinary judges. But Mozart depended wholly on the public, to which he looked for daily bread; he worked for the theatre. To please or not to please the public was for him Hamlet's question of "To be or not to be;" and as he wrote his operas to be performed and heard, he knew very well that he had to obey the taste of his judges or else cease to be. Unhappily the natural disposition, or if you will the conscience of the artist, got the victory over the urgency of the case. Mozart exerted his genius to please as little as possible, and his success was perfect.

With such small regard to the taste of the public, and with a habit of not very courtier-like speech at the courts of princes, Mozart might at least have won to his side a third power, upon which the fortune of his pieces at the theatre especially depended; we mean the Italian singers. Alas! this grand and despotic power he brought most against him. The still existing reasons of the aversion of these singers to Mozart's music are too generally known to make it necessary to explain them here. Suffice it to say, that this music for the most part robbed them of the means to which they usually owed their success, and on the contrary required of them a knowledge of music and a dramatic talent which were rarely found among them. Hence what Mozart might have foreseen really happened. The artists in their ill will treated him as a foe and a rebel; they did their best to ruin him in the place where they were obliged to sing him, namely in Vienna; but in Italy, where they were the unlimited masters, they would not have suffered this hated music, so repugnant to the national taste, to be set before them. Hence it happened that Mozart, in spite of his great fame and his early triumphs in Milan, never received an order from an Italian direction after the manner of the composer of Mitridate had gradually degenerated into that of Figaro and Don Giovanni!

That being the state of things, Mozart would seem to have been all the more free to write for the lyric theatre of his nation, whose founder he in a certain sense had been. The Entführung aus dem Seraglio had had success in Germany, and the native artists had not the same reasons as their Italian brethren for hating Mozart's operas. They were far less virtuosos and they understood music better. To what, then, must we ascribe the oblivion in which Germany allowed the only national dramatic composer that existed, beside DITTERSDORF,* to languish? More than one reason may be adduced for it; but I will limit myself to that which appears to me the most decisive.

No one of the great native masters before Mozart had seen fit to labor for the native theatre. The operas of HANDEL, GLUCK, HASSE and GRAUN had been composed to Italian texts; some of them to French and English texts. On the other hand, the theory of musical drama was still in the simplicity of childhood with the Germans; the text-makers sought in a certain manner to excuse the introduction of song; they purposely arranged the course of the action so that the singer should be called upon to sing, or that he should find occasion for it in himself without injury to probability. Hence arose a comedy with little airs (Operetta,) which in respect of kind still stood under the head of Vaudeville. Then, too, there were fairy operas, very ordinary farces, for the most part borrowed from some popular tradition, and eked out with national songs and dances; this was called the Viennese style. The good singers of the country, like the good composers, consecrated their talent solely to Italian opera. Thus it was quite natural that the true music-lovers recognized no other spectacle. The national opera, or what passed for such, they abandoned to the people. Upon such pieces followed the Seraglio, a music which is by turns melodic, brilliant, pathetic and comic, but of an original and learned kind of comic. As a whole, the work was easier understood than the Idomeno and some of the subsequent operas of Mozart. Still it was such an infinite departure from all that the native frequenters of the opera had so far known and loved, that many years had to pass before the taste of the many could raise itself to the standpoint of this system of composition. Formerly the common belief was in the country of a Bach and Mozart, that the good melody was that which everybody carries away with him on leaving the theatre, and sings. FORKEL, on the contrary, thinks that these melodies are always of the most ordinary kind. In my view, both these rules suffer too many exceptions to allow of either of them being set up as a universal principle. Marlborough is a very trivial melody; God Save the King is not so; yet both are equally popular. Be that as it may, the arias of Belmonte, of Constance, and of Osmin, did not belong among those which every one easily retains; still less among those which every one can sing. The connoisseurs no doubt extolled the work very highly; but the theatre directors were probably of another way of thinking after they had taken their treasurers into council, as the most undeceivable of critics.

* Dittersdorf composed, between 1786 and 1798, fifteen or sixteen German operas. Mozart composed only two, for want of opportunity and not of will.

It seems clearly made out that the taste for mediocrity reigned at that time in the German public. The respectable dilettante of the counting room and of the shop liked to hear again upon the stage the little arietta which his daughter sang with an accompaniment of two chords, which she had learned to play upon her four-octave spinet; and he liked again to be able to bring home to his Hannechen or his Gretchen something from the theatre, by which her stock of songs should be increased. This, too, was the good old time when every body read with rapture GELLERT and SOLOMON GESSNER. The music of a given age is a no less faithful mirror than its literature. GESSNER and BYRON—HILLER and BEETHOVEN—lies there not between these the whole gulf that separates our present world from that of our fathers?

The psychological sketch we have just given shows us nothing but the outward moral temperament, if I may so express myself, or the visible man. Some of Mozart's peculiarities—I speak of the less good—were, as we have seen, the unavoidable reaction of the physical upon the moral; others, such as his generosity and his habit of speaking the truth even when prudence and courtesy forbade it, resolve themselves, when closely examined, into pure negations, the consequences of a complete indifference to worldly interests. In this way the outside of the character of Mozart shows us the happiest and most amiable disposition that can be imagined; a nature noble and good, but not great and virtuous, for virtue is a victorious combat against ourselves, and Mozart was just what he was for the very reason that he always yielded to his nature. But there was yet another man in him that seemed to stand in opposition to the first, because they both together made up one. The artist was cast upon the citizen, or vice versa, just as a medal is cast upon its mould, so that all that is sunken in the latter stands out boldly in the former. May I be pardoned this bizarre comparison, which, however, fully represents my thought. The relation between what is called the real and ideal world, found itself reversed in our hero. Art was his actual world, his serious and real life; the positive world upon the contrary was a shadow, entertaining him at times, without ever occupying him much. But even in this he sought only the poetic side—love, friendship and enjoyment. Consequently all his moral and intellectual powers, which he developed in his capacity of citizen of an ideal world, revealed themselves in all his daily life through a proportionate improvidence, or a negation. The more calculation and logic he employed in composition, the less he had left for his household economy; the more deeply he fathomed the mysteries of the human heart in its musical analogies, the more easily was he deceived about the most prosaic thing in the world, pecuniary interests.

In the same way his unexampled and persistent application, his inflexible will in the pursuit of the goal which he had set before him as an artist, left him no more force of will and energy than just enough for the fulfilment of his social impulses and duties. Apparently his other self had scarcely opportunity to manifest itself in him, either in his sayings, which were of no more value than the spoken dialogue in the opera, or in his doings, which were limited to the narrow sphere of an industrial who earns a painful living by hard work. Mozart could sometimes show his inner self, without his willing it. To sentimental talk he had, like many persons of deep feeling, an aversion. He did not like to speak of his feelings, and he strove to hide them under a blunt and confident language. It happened only very seldom, in exalted moments, that he was heard to express a deep-felt view, even in badly chosen words, about things which connect themselves with the most serious side of human life and destiny. Then a few sudden flashes would illumine the most hidden interior of the individual. But such outpourings were involuntary. Indeed one might say that when Mozart had betrayed himself in this way, he felt a certain shame; he relapsed very quickly again into his droll and nonsensical chat, filled his glass, and from that moment it was impossible, as ROCHLITZ says, to get another rational word out of him. Does it not seem as if Mozart had felt, that he had been stealing somewhat from the musical improvisation, or from the ruled sheets of paper, which alone were worthy to receive his confidential communications upon such matters? In these and these alone are we to seek the true man, the earnest actions of his life, his power, his greatness and his virtues. Nay, I do not hesitate to compare the labors of Mozart with the most virtuous actions, whether we consider the moral principle which called them forth, the sacrifices of all kinds which they cost, or the results which they have had and will have for his fellow men. How many men have blessed Mozart and bless him still, as the beneficent genius, to whom they owe some of their noblest enjoyments and of their sweetest recollections of the past, or as the immortal wizard, who awakens in their soul a new breath of poesy, when poesy on every side is dead!

The Country Singing-School.

Let us step in a moment. It is in the district school-house. You may easily know that, by the benches hacked and inked with aspiring initials, and the general aspect of inconvenience that pervades the precincts.

It is seven o'clock, P. M. Tallow luminaries on wooden pedestals flicker on the window-sills, while a more imposing column of sperm lights up the desk in front. By it stands the Polyhymnian professor, a little, wiry man, with bald sinciput and shining face. He has taught the singing-school in this same place for a score of years, at least. With a hickory ferule for his baton, and fiddle-bow under his left arm as a badge of authority, he raps to order. The chaos of voices is hushed. The school begins.

It is rather amusing to see how different people sing. There is the leading soprano, in the front seat. She evidently supposes herself to be the prima donna of the evening. And as the full chorus dies away for a measure of rest, she assumes to herself a superfluous semibreve, in order that her vocal powers may be duly noticed and appreciated. Alas! for her apparently inexhaustible wealth of breath, after an unusually protracted effort her voice suddenly becomes bankrupt, and her gratuitous solo ends like a juvenile rooster's incipient attempt at song.

A little to the right sits the leading alto. You know her to be such, because in all duets she accompanies the leading soprano. But she does her part in a very modest, unassuming way. She takes no airs upon herself. These belong exclusively to the soprano. She is evidently conscious of being the lesser luminary, and makes no effort to outshine the intenser brilliancy of her companion. But we strangely always like the looks of the moon better than of the sun. And, no less strangely, the gentle unobtrusive alto imprints upon our susceptible hearts far more mental notes of admiration than the lofty trills and quavers of her more pretentious sister.

The leading bass considers himself of fundamental importance, especially in a quartet. Between certain limits he displays a prodigality of breath truly surprising. But if he undertakes a tone above a certain pitch, his voice changes to a dwindled, piping tone, wholly unlike its former sonorous self, as if he had handed over his part to a brother of lower, or rather vocally speaking, higher degree, for a moment, while he stopped to take breath. But only in a chorus, and within his legitimate limits, does he display his full abilities. Then he rolls forth a volume of sound like the pedal pipes of an organ, and unless he practices extraordinary self-denial, the other voices are merged in his, like tributaries in the ocean.

The main characteristic of the leading tenor, is his versatility. In chorus, he is usually content to lean upon his own staff, and display his powers only by the insertion of here and there a grace-note, and an artistic turn in the cadence. But in a quartet, he by no means preserves the even tenor of his way. If in a difficult passage, he imagines that the treble wavers on her part, he forthwith deserts his own, and flies to render the needed assistance. True, he scarcely ever strikes upon the right tone, in his tergiversation, but then he rarely fails of coming within one of it—and that is not far out of the way. On the whole, whatever be our opinion as to his execution, his musical taste is unquestionable, if we may judge from the decided smack of satisfaction he emits from his lips at the close of every performance.

Rap, rap, rap! It is for recess. Chaos begins again. A Babel of voices fills our ears.—exortur clamorque virum—a clamor of boys and girls and a cracking of peanuts arises. Yet with the aid of our eyes, we can guess at the whispers of that pleasant pair in close communion on the back seat. And we have no difficulty in distinguishing above the confusion the "gentle roar" of the leading bass, who forms the centre of the hilarious group around the stove. It is amusing, the display of generosity which we see around us. Intensely red apples are in various quarters exchanging hands, and reflecting their rosy glow upon the cheeks of the fair receivers—unless we attribute this to the whispered compliments which accompany them. Hunks of home-made gingerbread are produced from capacious pockets, and distributed variously among hungry little expectants, while a munching of candies and condiments is heard on every hand. Oh! it is really a very delightful time.

Rap, rap, rap! Recess is over. The Babel of voices subsides into silence. Sentences begun aloud are finished in whispers. The singing begins again. We settle back into our seat, and with the lullaby of pleasant 'Greenville' soothing our senses into forgetfulness of the present, we lose ourselves in memories of the past. What famous old times we used to have in a school-house just like this—just as inconvenient, just as uncomfortable, and just as dear to recollection! Some of these same old tunes were favorites of our boyish days. We think of the old friends with whom we used to sing them. Some we have not seen for years—some are dead. Change creeps upon everything. Only true music, like true morality, never changes. Those grand old strains of Handel and Beethoven! They are as grand now as ever. The majestic chorals that rolled through the dim aisles of old German cathedrals two hundred years ago, are still pealing on to new generations; and in other lands.

But a sound, so strangely in accordance with the spirit of our thoughts that it rouses us from our reverie, greets our ears. They are singing 'Old Hundred.' It puts a finale to the evening's entertainment, and our own. Amid the general confusion at the closing, we catch a glimpse of the stentorian bass moving off in unison with the alto, and perceive the leading soprano led away in triumph by the chivalrous tenor.

First Performance of Signor Ardit's Opera, "La Spia."

Quite a large audience assembled last evening at the Academy of Music to be present, in spite of the storm, at the first performance of Signor ARDITI's Opera. It was received with marks of decided favor; and though its positive merit is not great, many a work in no way superior has been produced with considerable success at the principal theatres, of Italy, and thought worthy of publication.

The plot, founded in a measure upon the story of COOPER's novel of the same name, is not happily selected. It lacks dramatic progress. Such movement as it has, neither tends, nor seems to tend, to the accomplishment of any particular good or ill to the personages; and it therefore lacks one great element of legitimate and permanent favor. Dramatic situations and characters of decided traits also are wanting in it; and its power to interest depends entirely upon its association with the incidents of COOPER's novel and the music with which the composer has clothed Signor MANETTA's graceful verses.

Signor ARDITI has displayed talent and accomplishment in the composition of this opera. His work is plainly that of a thoroughly educated man: it shows none of the crudeness and awkwardness which might well appear in the first work even of a man of genius. It moves smoothly and steadily on,—the melody flowing, the harmony satisfactory, the instrumentation skilful, and the vocal parts conducted with that knowledge of the capacity and requirements of the voice which is so rarely acquired except by Italians. It shows too the possession of that facility for writing not ungraceful airs based upon not incorrect harmony, which is another peculiarly Italian gift:—that fatal facility, the result of which has been so much drivel in DONIZETTI, so much bombast in VERDI. —We write with a full recognition of the great talent of both the dead and the living composer, and a lively and grateful appreciation of beauties salient in the Lucia of the one and the Ernani of the other. Signor ARDITI has made DONIZETTI his model in solos, while VERDI generally guides his pen in concerted music. It is never difficult to discern which composer he is seeking to emulate, or even to determine with some approach to accuracy the particular composition in the beauty of which he has found his inspiration. Indeed, throughout the opera we are continually called upon to admire the skill with which he prevents that which we are not sure that we have not heard from becoming that which we are sure that we have heard. We listen with apprehensive pleasure to something which is trembling giddily upon the verge of something else.

La Spia is written, as we before remarked, in an easy, flowing style; the prettiest music is that of the chorus of female voices in the Second Act, followed by a duet for soprano and mezzo soprano accompanied by the same chorus; but after two hearings we are unable to remember any melody of sufficiently decided character to become popular, or any concerted piece which can claim more than what it is now the fashion to call a success d'estime. But we are happy in believing that the Opera as a whole, will be for a while a favorite with the public; long enough to repay the manager for the excellent style in which he has produced it, and we trust to reimburse him in a measure for the expenses of the trying season through which he has passed with such credit to himself. Among the elements of the popularity of La Spia as an entertainment, is the scene of a burning house, very skilfully painted and adroitly managed by Signor ALLEGRI, who never paints without touching his laurels with a fresher green. To this may perhaps be added the conclusion of the Opera with Hail Columbia. It was, perhaps, necessary that this should be; and Signor ARDITI has shown much taste in not overdoing it.

The Vocalists, Madame LAGRANGE, Miss HENSLER, Signor BRIGNOLI, Signor MORELLI, and Signor GASPARDONI, all acquitted themselves with credit, and with the composer received hearty expressions of the good feeling of the audience.

And now we wish to ask why this opera is called an "American opera." Because its subject is American? Then is Don Giovanni a Spanish opera, Norma a British opera, Semiramide a Babylonish opera, and Orfeo e Euridice a Hottish opera. Then is Much Ado About Nothing an Italian comedy, Timon of Athens a Greek tragedy, The rape of Lucrece a Latin Poem, and Susanna and the Elders a Jewish painting. Written by an Italian, to Italian words, in the Italian style, for Italian singers, there is not even the shadow of a ground for calling La Spia an American work. Let us not deceive ourselves. It is well for the arts to flourish here; but it is not well for us to be deluded with the idea that we have American Art, when we have no such thing, but are cultivating an exotic. The time will come when we will have American music; but it will come; we cannot bring it, or hasten its arrival. There has yet to be the first step taken towards the formation of an American school of music; all the music which has been composed here, worthy of the name, has been, of necessity German or Italian, whether written by Germans or Italians or Americans; and so it will be for long years to come. But when music in this country does assume a character of its own, we can only wish the composer of the first American opera the good fortune to meet with a manager so ready to encourage him and bring him advantageously before the public as the present director of the affairs of the Academy of Music.

Burning of Covent Garden Theatre.

(Correspondence of the Evening Gazette.)

Anderson, the 'wizard of the North,' has been doing all he could for some time past, to keep himself before the people, and has just succeeded in making himself famous in a way not presented on the bills. For some time the metropolis had been placarded with announcements of a monster "Carnival benefit," a l'Americaine, to last four and twenty hours, and to conclude with a grand masked ball. That sort of thing (said the bills) was unknown in Europe, but the enterprise of caterers for public amusement in the United States of America provided such protracted entertainments, of a splendor far surpassing the wildest dreams! Covent Garden Theatre was the scene of the "Carnival." A pantomime commenced the entertainment, followed by an English drama, then a Scottish drama, then a ballet, then an opera, then a divertissement, in which Charles Matthews imitated Anderson, and Leigh Murray personified Matthews, the whole to be concluded by a grand bal masqué. All went off in accordance with the programme, and the evening terminated by the theatre taking fire, and its entire destruction followed. The theatre was originally opened Dec. 7, 1732, by Rush, the noted harlequin, and on the 20th of September 1808, it was destroyed by fire, when thirty persons lost their lives. It was rebuilt and re-opened Sept. 10, 1809. Its history is closely connected with the annals of the British Stage. Many first appearances took place there. Incledon, the singer, 1790; Charles Kemble, 1794; Mrs. Glover, 1797; G. F. Cooke; ("Richard III.") Oct. 31, 1800; Miss Stephens, (Countess of Essex) 1812; Miss O'Neil (Lady Beecher) 1814; Macready, 1816; W. Farren, 1818; Fanny Kemble, 1829; Adelaide Kemble, 1841. Here Edmund Kean last acted, 1833. Braham's first appearance on the stage was at the old Covent Garden Theatre in 1787.

The value of the property destroyed, says a journal, is something fabulous. An approximate estimate may be formed from the fact that in mounting the several operas contained in the repertoire of the theatre, when under the management of Mr. Dalafield, no less than £60,000 was expended, of which the four operas of the "Prophète," the "Hugonots," "Lucrezia Borgia," and "La Donna del Lago," cost £25,000. The valuable dramatic library belonging to the theatre—unique of its kind—is gone in the general wreck. The original manuscripts of "The School for Scandal," "The Miller and his Men," the opera of "The Slave," and hundreds of other curious works, were here preserved. The armory, consisting of more than 100 suits, and occupying a series of rooms, is wholly destroyed. In fact, nothing is spared. Four original pictures by Hogarth, representing the Seasons, which hung upon the walls of Mr. Gye's private room, within only a few paces of the box-office, could not be saved, so rapid was the progress of the fire.

The building belonged to four or five proprietors, (among them may be mentioned the Kemble family, the family of the late Mr. Harris, Mr. Surman, Mr. Robinson, Mr. Thomas Grieve, and others,) who had issued shares to upwards of a hundred gentlemen; but as it was not insured they lost everything, and the shares, which were hitherto worth hundreds of pounds, are now not worth the paper upon which they were written. Her Majesty's private box at this theatre, was magnificent. There were also five rooms fitted up most magnificently, the retiring room having a very handsome fire-place, a splendid looking-glass and mirrors, with an inlaid circular glass table, in gold and blue, and allegorical devices. All that now remains of the beautiful suite of rooms is a few pieces of scarlet cloth, which was used as the carpet, and some burnished iron springs used in the elaborately appointed sofas and chairs used only by her Majesty and attendants. The whole of the conservatory adjoining the Queen's box has likewise been totally consumed. The expenses of erecting the theatre are said to have amounted to £150,000, of which £44,550 was received from the insurance offices, and £50,000 raised by subscription shares of £500 each. The architect was Sir Robert Smirke, and the statues of Tragedy and Comedy, and the two bas reliefs on the Bow street front, were by Flaxman. The stage was 55 feet in length and 86 feet in width, the depth from the curtain to the back of the pit was 66 feet and the theatre had a saloon, the dimensions of which were 56 feet by 19 feet.

The fire broke out in the rooms over the stage, in that seventh heaven known as "the flies," which were reached by a narrow staircase from behind the scenes. It would appear that the workshops had been on fire, for some hours, before the persons below were aware of it, and the first intimation they had was the burning through of the upper floors and the falling of burning beams upon the stage. Attempts to extinguish the conflagration were, of course, in vain, and in a very short time the roof fell in, and a column of flame shot out up from the chasm, and cast a glare that was seen from every part of London. Not being of a poetical or imaginative turn of mind, I am unable to portray the scene of some couple of hundred masqueraders.

Covent Garden, under the management of Mr. Gye, was one of the most popular places of amusement in London. Its properties were of the richest descriptions, and reached the value, probably, of £100,000 sterling. All the requirements for the operatic season, about to commence, were in the theatre and are totally lost. This loss falls on the lessee, Mr. Gye, and on the shareholders. Not one farthing is covered by insurance. Anderson had rented the house since Christmas, and his tenancy was about to expire. Gye gave him notice that he would not permit the masked ball to take place; Anderson persisted, and they say Mr. G. applied for an injunction, which was refused. The "wizard" had taken the precaution to insure his own effects for the sum of £2,000 sterling,—so that he was pretty safe,—and when the fire was discovered he made a rush at the cash box and secured that likewise. The peculiar construction of the edifice rendered abortive all attempts to extinguish the flames.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAR. 29, 1856.

NEW VOLUME.—Subscriptions are now in order for a new year of the Journal of Music. With the number for Saturday, April 5, it will enter upon its fifth year, and sixth volume. With that number we shall commence the publication of a translation, made expressly for this journal, of a beautiful Art novel by Mme. GEORGE SAND, in which the characters are musical, and which has never yet appeared in English. It will make pleasant reading for the summer months.

Our readers generally, as well as our agents, are earnestly requested, as they wish this Journal not only to continue its existence, but to improve in character and variety of matter, to exert themselves a little now to send us in the names of new subscribers.

TERMS, as heretofore, by mail, $2 per annum; by carrier, $2.50, payable in advance. This condition of prepayment will hereafter, especially in the case of out-of-town subscribers, be more strictly enforced. The really serious losses which have been the reward of our indulgence hitherto, compel us to this measure.

All who do not expressly notify us of their wish to stop the Journal at the expiration of their term, will still continue to receive it, and be counted as subscribers for another year.

Prize Songs.

There is much cause to doubt the real benefit to literature or Art of the competitive efforts stimulated by the offering of prizes. It seems to be the fatality of such efforts to result in mediocrity; and as a general rule one takes up a prize poem or a prize song with the preconceived conviction that had it been of first-rate excellence, it would not have been very likely to have won the prize. A collection of prize poems, after deducting a few exceptional instances of decided merit, would be but an indifferent contribution to literature. So in other arts, at all events in music. Creative genius somehow always seems to find its truest inspirations anywhere but in these competitions. Even in musical Germany, where there have been prize songs, prize choruses, prize symphonies, we have never heard of one which has outlived the factitious importance which it enjoyed only so long as curiosity was fresh about the prize. Ten to one, if a true work of genius wins the prize, it is a work not originally written for the prize, but tossed into the competition as an afterthought, more from the humor of the thing, perhaps, than from ambition to come out the winner.

Still smaller are the chances of success to excellence, when the largest jury sit in judgment. Think of collecting the votes of all the crowd who enter the Athenæum Gallery or the rooms of the Academy of Design during a season, as if that were the best picture which should receive the greatest number of said votes! No one dreams of such an absurdity in the art of painting; why, then, in other arts? Yet this very thing has been done, and much stir made about it lately in the sphere of music. The publishers of the New York Musical Review some months since offered prizes for the two best songs; there were a hundred and fifty or more prompt responses to the call. Out of the hundred and fifty, the vast majority of which, we hear, were found beneath contempt, a competent committee were to select eight, which should be published in successive numbers of the Review; then time was to be allowed for the subscribers to the journal, the members of choirs and singing schools throughout the land, the enlightened and the ignorant, of all ages, classes and degrees of culture, to send in their votes, and that song which shall receive the plurality of voices is to receive the prize; the polls to be kept open until the middle of April. The copyrights of all the eight remain the property of the Review. Of course a thrifty speculation for that journal, in a double sense; first, as giving it the copyrights of eight saleable, and in this way self-advertising songs, whether they be good or bad; and secondly, as piquing the curiosity of hundreds or thousands to such a pitch that they shall be eager to have a vote in the great question, and so help to swell the subscription list of the Review. A shrewd commercial stroke! But how will it affect the real interests of Art, of Music in America?

Let us see. The eight songs have been duly published; we have no doubt the committee made the best selection; and (with the exception of a single one, in which all good judges recognize the work of an artist and a true gift of song—perhaps, too, of one other, which is clever, if not quite original,) they are about as ordinary, namby-pamby, uninspired, mechanical a set of songs, in spite of the exceedingly careful Italian phrases of expression, the molto espressivos, affetuosos, &c., which their authors have prefixed to them, as one may find in the portfolio of any boarding-school miss. We risk little in the belief that such is the opinion of all artists and cultivated music-lovers who have looked them over. Now here is the point. If there were any certainty or any chance that the one really fine song of the eight would win the general vote, then indeed would a true service to the cause of Music as an Art be done; for the very attention of the many which such éclat would concentrate upon this real work of Art, bringing it as it were within the focus of a magnifying glass beneath their eyes, would awaken in many a mind the first perception of the superior worth of true Art over common elaptrap. But is there any, the least chance of that? We would there were. On the contrary, we know too well on what the preferences of the multitude are based. They will vote for the taking, rather than the good song; for the pretty, rather than the beautiful; for one that appeals to personal or patriotic associations, rather than to any poetic ideal; for one that only sings them, with seemingly new and ingenious variation, what they knew before; for one whose sentiment is not above the level of their own every-day lives; above all, for one which they can easily sing and easily accompany on the piano—that is to say, one of which the accompaniment is the usual see-saw between tonic and dominant chords, instead of being an integral organic portion of the song, as it is in all true works of Art. Hence the true musician, to have any chance for this prize, must renounce his loyalty to Art, and write down to the tastes or no tastes of the million, or else any "Ossian" of any travelling company of bards, black or white, will have fearful odds against him. We all know this too well, and are so sure that the best song will not win the prize, that it becomes a matter of no interest which of the poor ones wins it. We shall be too happy should it turn out otherwise. But mediocrity, the false in Art, will win; young ideals will take form and color from that triumph; young germs of musical feeling will look up to that they should be taught to look down upon, will imitate that they should avoid, and so the good day is put back in which the true in Art shall find its recognition.

The eight prize songs are announced with great blowing of trumpets as soon to be published in the most elegant style of music type and paper. They are to form "a collection of the most charming songs ever published in America." The fortunate purchaser of the copyright anticipates, with reason, the most extensive sale of them. It is said that even now he has received 6,000 advance orders. No one can blame him. His business is merchandize in music and he must make his calculations shrewdly. He will have his reward. And if Art loses by his rapid gains in this venture, it will remunerate itself out of the more slowly paying truly classical productions which he has published and will publish with a true eye to the approbation of the "appreciative few." But we ask, suppose Mr. Richardson should announce in like style the eight best songs of MENDELSSOHN, or, FRANZ, or SCHUBERT, or ROSSINI, or HANDEL, MOZART or BEETHOVEN, would there be 6,000 orders in advance, think you? The very question shows how much artistic value is to be attached to the factitious notoriety of such prize songs. We have said so much, because it is the duty of a Journal which devotes itself to the elevation of the musical taste in a community, to estimate such things severally according to the artistic and not the commercial standard. If there are to be prizes, let them at least be awarded by competent judges. Then might some good be hoped, beyond the interests of those who invite the competition; although, as we began with saying, the world's experience associates more of mediocrity than of excellence with all prize products of the brain.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, March 24th. EISFELD'S Soirée last Saturday attracted a goodly audience in spite of Passion Week. The programme was a very heterogeneous one, bearing the names of no less than seven different composers, old and new, for only five numbers. The first of these consisted of selections from quartets by HAYDN, MOZART, BEETHOVEN, and ONSLOW, an arrangement which I cannot approve of. To be sure, the musical critic of one of our dailies says this morning: "No connection is preserved in the four movements of a quartette, and no object aimed at except the production of certain effects by contrast, such as heightening the effect of a quick movement by preceding it with a slow one;" (!) but he thereby advances a new theory, which I think the musical world will hardly accept. For if it be true, where would be the idea, the mainspring of a composition of this character? What becomes of the "Moonlight Sonata," and the many other love poems of the great master? of his "Pastoral," "Heroic," and Ninth Symphonies, to quote the highest examples? For the critic will acknowledge that what applies to the quartet applies also to these and all other compositions which are constructed upon the same model.

To me, this compilation had a most disjointed and unsatisfactory effect; although each movement had its own beauty, (the exquisite Adagio from Beethoven's Sixth Quartet the most,) and the whole was interesting in one point of view, namely, in giving us an opportunity of hearing the four composers in genealogical order, and comparing them.
